The sex attraction! He caught his breath. "Linda, you infernal little villain!" he said, and he went to take her in his arms.

She thrust out a hand. "Don't touch me! I crush wherever I'm touched and I'm worth about a guinea a square inch in this." She braced back her knees and bent forward from her hips toward him and held her lovely face close to him and pouted at him with her bewitching mouth. "Only that," she said, and, bewitched, he kissed her and drew a heavy breath and said, "You witch!"

HERE was the challenge, and he defeated in it. She ought not to have gone; he had forbidden it; she had defied him. These should have been thorns, but they were delicious thorns, and it was beneath their rapturous pricking that he thought of her all that day and beneath it that he longed for her return that evening. "I am bewitched by my wife," he thought to himself—and there was in the thought something that ravished him.

Those were early days. If, as their married life matured, this his bewitchment might have staled, there came to whip him up an event which at once stimulated his thraldom and gave to Linda immense enlargement—four dizzying years of it.

The war came.

Andrew went to France. The hunger of separation from her; the intoxication of reuniting with her on leaves that were as nuptial ecstasies miraculously lived again—these even further enslaved him.

It was easy for Andrew, Lord Staverton regretting but acquiescing, to obtain a commission. He went to France in 1915. At the end of that year, the war then being realized as a business best to be conducted on business principles with the right men in the right places, he was withdrawn from his battalion by the Staverton influence and given a staff appointment in which his organizing abilities were likely to be of value, and proved of value. He looked splendid, Linda cried, in his red tabs and brass hat; and, tall, straight figure, impressive face, splendid he did look and felt, and splendidly was treated by his lovely wife, and his leaves became orgies, with no intervals, of fond and fierce delights.

His one idea now, living from leave to leave, from honeymoon to honeymoon, was for Linda to have the best of times, the best of everything, and for him, on the honeymoons, to have her at her most gratified and liveliest and loveliest by having the best of everything with her. It had been a complaint of hers that they did not live up to their income. She had now, in his absences, the run of his income, freely—and freely she ran it. (Her card clubs began in these absences). But when the war was over——

When the war was over, Andrew put aside with his khaki the new, the different man that it had caused him to be, and resumed with his black coat the old, the stern, the purposeful that he had

WHAT THE DECLARATION MEANT TO THE YOUTH OF YESTERDAY, IT MEANS TO YOUTH TO-DAY. ITS SPIRIT SHOULD BE THE ESSENCE OF THE NEW FOURTH

IT IS strange, though ordinary enough in our experience, how great happenings, tremendous forces that move through our lives carrying us forward to regions we scarce dared hope to enter, slip into their destined day, make their mark and merge into the dynamic power of our unconscious life, without our being in the least aware that they have tilted the axis of our spiritual world and that never again will the shadow of darkness fall as far or as deeply upon it. We see the result, but not often do we seek or discern the cause.

We are about to celebrate the one hundred and forty-ninth anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence. There are about one hundred million of us, and I venture to say that out of every hundred who will make holiday scarce a handful would recognize the Declaration were they to hear it. Now how does it happen that events of such lasting and far-reaching importance make so little conscious mark upon us? We are, as a people, amazingly unconscious of the Declaration of Independence.

To the men who framed it and to the generation who fought and suffered and endured that it might be made manifest in the life of the new nation, it was but the record of the moving finger of destiny. They were too deeply engaged in clothing the spirit in deeds to regard its creation as tremendously important. They were the Declaration of Independence.

But what of those who came after? They knew neither the letter nor the spirit. They felt the effects of its beneficent power, but they had no knowledge of the source. They accepted the ease of body and mind it endowed, but the true inwardness of its flaming spirit they knew not at all. This has continued to the present day, so that now the Declaration is something printed in small type in the back of the school histories or a vague reference in the speech of the Fourth of July orators. It is worthy a more intimate knowledge.

The Declaration is the most perfect expression of the dignity of the human soul that has been written since the Sermon on the Mount. It is more than a record; it is far, far more than the record of an historic event. Its words are majestic, royal, in their absolute rightness. Its message is an anthem of victory, an exultant announcement of the definite end of an age of suffering and oppression. It is a herald proclaiming the kinship of men with their Father which is in heaven. The freedom of the peoples of the earth is shadowed forth in this document.

Yet Thomas Jefferson, who wrote it, slipped his original draft among his papers and seemed glad to forget it. He was too close to the creation of his masterpiece to know it for what it was. He had suffered, as the soul of the creative artist must ever suffer, from the criticism his work had called out in the debate on the floor of Congress. That over and his work accepted, he was glad to let the memory of the grueling struggle rest.

There was tumult in the Colonies. George III had exhausted the patience of patient men, and they were gathering their forces toward rebellion. Virginia had called a convention to dissolve her relationship with the Crown, and Jefferson had drawn up a list of charges against the king which he intended to incorporate in the Virginia Constitution. The Virginia convention sent Richard Henry Lee to the Continental Congress meeting in Philadelphia to present a resolution declaring the independence of the Colonies. Mason had already written his Bill of Rights. The thirteen Colonies were seething.

Do you know of some touching relic of a great man, or the scene of an important historical event that you would like to see preserved?

Perhaps you can do little by yourself to mark these spots so that future generations of Americans may be inspired thereby. But you may be entitled to join one of the patriotic societies which have made it their work to commemorate outstanding figures and events in our history.

You will find, too, that these societies are doing other work of tremendous importance to your family and community. Your association with the members will enrich your social and civic life.

"Patriotic Organizations for Women" tells you all about the important societies, to which of them you are eligible, and how to join. The booklet will be sent to you promptly upon receipt of twenty-five cents, if you will write THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

The members of the Continental Congress knew that Lee's resolution would be adopted, and appointed a committee to present the case for the Colonies to the world. Jefferson did the work of the committee. His material was at hand. He used the Bill of Rights for the second paragraph, followed that with the charges against the king which he had drawn up for the Virginia Constitution, and closed with Lee's resolution. He welded these with the pen of the artist under the inspiration of a pure patriotism.

Franklin and Adams read Jefferson's draft, and Franklin is credited with eleven changes that show his magic power over words, his keen insight into the workings of men's minds and his firm faith in the undertaking.

Where Jefferson had written, "When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for a people to dissolve the bands," etc., Franklin made it read, "When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the bands," etc. How strong is the power of one word!

Where Jefferson, in doubt about the possible action of the Congress, had written, "They should declare the causes which impel them to threaten separation," Franklin, scorning doubt and affirming his faith, made it. "They should declare the causes that impel them to the separation."

The sharpest change he made was in the familiar line, "We hold these truths to be—" Jefferson had written, "sacred and undeniable," but Franklin crossed out the weaker words and wrote "self-evident." Now read it and see the power of a strong man's vision as it shines through his words. Read it again, and know that the Declaration of Independence is not a bit of fine writing, not a faded parchment intended for the musty archives, but the evidence of the spirit of a nation inscribed by the burning spirit of its inspired patriots. The words of the famous pronouncement are like the everlasting rocks; they are words that stand for their own purpose and intent and none other; they are words that will outlast the years and but shine the brighter in the mellowing light of time.

For years the people of the country seemed to have forgotten the existence of the Declaration. It had served the purpose in telling a "candid world" the cause of the quarrel between one people and another and in setting forth the principles upon which this people intended to live. Then one day a writing-master thought it would make fine copy for his facile pen and he arranged for the publication of a decoratively inscribed copy. Immediately his publication was attacked by a rival publisher, and in the heated quarrel which followed the Declaration was well advertised. Copies of it were to be found in

OPEN WIDER, PLEASE!

Three hearts in a dentist's office

By SHIRLEY SEIFERT

MATHILDE THANKED THE FARMER WARMLY FOR HIS GIFT OF SPRING CHICKENS, BUT ALL THE TIME SHE COULD FEEL DOCTOR FRED LAUGHING AT HER

MATHILDE was tired. And happy. She loved doing fussy things, and there were many fussy things to do in young Doctor Madden's office. He was newly graduated from dental school and had put every dollar that his uncle had given him for the start of his practise into equipment. There was no other office like it in Meldon. It was so gleaming white that even the crusty janitor who served it and the drug-store below took a pride in scrubbing the tiled floor. The floor and the high windows and the walls of the inner room and the furnishings of the waiting-room Mathilde granted to the janitor. The rest was hers—the porcelain fixtures to be kept spotless and in order, the trays and trays of shining instruments to be sterilized and graded and put away, the racks of little bottles of many-colored liquids to be placed so that her hand might never fumble for the one demanded—and uncounted other things and duties that appealed to her sense of cleanness and order and precision. Any unpleasant aspects of her first job as office assistant she got past in two ways. When dental surgery seemed temporarily cruel, she thought hard about its ultimate healing mission. And the grisly aspects of facsimile jaws and the like became humorous when she considered her present possession of intimate facts about persons who had before this held exalted places remote above her. She wrote a little poem about the banker's molars that was a scream and giggled over it in private.

Doctor Madden said she was a crackerjack of an assistant. He meant to express his satisfaction in the success of his new practise. Part of that success was due to his youth and blond charm, slightly offset by his known betrothal to a stunning girl in the city where he had attended medical school; part of it was due to the reputation of the retired uncle who had endowed his nephew; but Mathilde liked to think (because it gave her a share) that the greatest part was due to the atmosphere of his office.

But this had been a hard day. Every half-hour period had been full and there had been some scenes of violence.

"HO-HUM!" yawned the doctor from the little alcove where he took off and put on his white jacket, scrubbed his hands and taught Mathilde how to make casts. "What a day, Miss Matilda! What a day!"

Almost nobody called Mathilde's name correctly except Mathilde, and she had to whisper it softly to herself, because it would have sounded foolish had any one overheard her doing such a thing. But she minded Doctor Fred's "Miss Matilda" less than any of the other versions. It meant that he had stepped down from his professional pedestal and remembered that once upon a time he and Mathilde sat in the same room at school.

So, though the doctor looked quite pale and spent when he left the office, Mathilde, lingering over her trays, was happy. She hummed a nondescript little tune that went round and round in circles like a buzzing bee in a sunny garden. She was still singing when she went in to change from her white uniform to her street dress.

She always took off her uniform wistfully. The people of Meldon called the white uniform, the cap, the white oxfords and stockings—white oxfords all Winter—an affectation. Perhaps that was why Mathilde adored them. Certainly they had affected her. She had always worn rather plain, old-fashioned dresses, not because she chose to do it, but because her clothes always had been made over from a relation-box of substantial garments several seasons old. Now these uniforms, ordered from the same place as Doctor Fred's jackets, were hers exclusively. Putting one on in the morning was like getting into a masquerade costume. They were stiff and starchy and perky and smart—undeniably affectations. A month of wearing them and Mathilde had bobbed her hair—her hair so heavy and long that she had worn it helplessly in Dutch braids—but the cap demanded fluff, it seemed to her. Then the fluff, having to be worn out of office hours as well, Mathilde, reenforced by her first payment of salary, turned her back on the relation-box with its hideous dresses clinging stubbornly to biological waistlines and bought herself a one-piece flannel dress with no waistline at all.

The short curly brown hair and modish silhouette were very becoming. So were her latest extravagances—a pair of smart pumps. Still, she preferred the uniform.

BUT it wouldn't have done to wear the uniform back and forth through the streets—especially to-night. It was raining. Mathilde, up-stairs, busy and absorbed in other matters, hadn't really noticed the weather. But when she came down the long steps beside the drug-store, she could see the pools of water on the paving. At the door she stopped. Besides her new shoes she wore also a new Spring hat. She had no umbrella. So she decided to wait in the sheltered doorway until the shower was over and she might safely venture on the short walk home to the Elm Street cottage where she lived with her mother.

Her doorway was dark and she waited alone, but in the lighted entrance adjacent to the drug-store others gathered. Several women were talking there. Their words carried over to Mathilde. She heard plainly what they said. But it was so terrible, so incredible, so cruel that at first she didn't comprehend—and when she did comprehend it was too late to run or to hide, for she had heard it all.

One of the speakers was Doctor Madden's aunt with whom he lived, a talky person at whom Doctor Fred in his jolly way poked a lot of disrespectful fun. The women, as Mathilde realized too late, were discussing the doctor's imminent marriage to the stunning Miss Lois Blair. And this was the gist of Miss Madden's revelations.

"Well, I gave him to understand he wouldn't have the easy-going time that he's always had at my house. She's a fine young woman, no doubt. And she's got plenty of money and lots of ambition and she'd make a hustling wife for him. She'd pull him up, whether or not. But he wouldn't enjoy that by a good deal, for he's got bossy ideas of his own and she'd be bound to have her way. She only consented to him setting up his practise here because it was on that condition his uncle gave him the money. Look how she picked out his office help! She wasn't going to have him working along with any of the pretty girls out here in Meldon, and there was plenty applied for the place. She was the one picked Mattie Farish, and 'twasn't because Mattie was bright and willing. It was because she was such a dowdy, homely little thing that it looked like no harm——"

Mathilde walked out into the rain. Only a kindly god of weather kept her Spring hat from ruin over her burning face. The rain stopped in a moment, but she didn't know it.

MATHILDE choked over a dish of canned plums at supper. Her mother was saying:

"Mattie, I saw Henrietta Madden to-day. She stopped me on the street to tell me how well Doctor Fred says you're getting along. He seems to think you're just wonderful, says he could about leave his practise to you if you had a diploma. Maybe when——"

And the plum-juice seeped into a suddenly uncontrollable windpipe and finished things. It was a terrible spell. Out of it Mathilde went into hysterics. Such sobbing and gasping and carrying on the four walls of the little house had never before contained. It was ridiculous. Mathilde couldn't stop it. She meant to be very still and proud and secret over her hurt, but that hateful plum-juice had beaten her. Mrs. Farish became alarmed. Mattie never acted so. So her mother decided it was from overwork and she'd have to speak to Fred Madden about it. At eight o'clock she had her daughter in bed with an ice-bag at her head and the electric pad which Mattie had given her for Christmas at her feet.

As soon as her mother left the room, Mathilde kicked the pad out of bed and threw the ice bag into a far corner. It is maddening when your heart is broken to have people insist on hot and cold applications.

HER heart was broken because she loved Doctor Fred with all of it. But it was the kind of love that few could understand. It was white and pure like a gardenia blossom—blooming in the secret dark, and so delicate that the least touch would curl the petals and turn them brown with bitter blight. That was how Mathilde, lying on her cool white bed, felt inside—all shrinking and curling.

Ever since the old days in school Fred Madden had been her hero. He was so jolly and rollicking and unafraid and she so shy. He was beautifully callous to the taunts and gibes and bruises of daily existence. His spirit carried him over them like strong wings. The skin over Mathilde's sensibilities was gossamer thin. And if her spirit had wings, they were the wings of a dragon fly—beautiful, but of slight carrying power. One precious Winter her desk had been across the aisle from his at grammar school, and many a sentence did she diagram, many an adverb clause did she classify, many a cubic content of weird arithmetical dimensions did she figure in duplicate to save him from the terrible things that teachers would say.

That was when he began to call her "Miss Matilda" in mock deference to her superior intellect. It was also the year when they graduated and he nominated her for class president. She wasn't elected and he was, but he had demonstrated his loyalty and esteem and she was very proud.

On into high school and the teens and they began to drift apart. He was a heartless growing boy and she wasn't pretty. She was also quite poor. She and her mother lived on an insurance income just large enough to maintain the tiny house on Elm Street and feed them and warm them. Their clothes all came out of the annual relation-box—and made-overs are at their worst when their wearer is in her teens. There was one dress, she remembered, of gray-green serge that had to be pieced out with Persian figured taffeta. It obscured her like an opaque curtain drawn across a sunny window. She went only to those parties where every one was asked. Fred Madden was nice to her when they met socially. Occasionally he danced with her and he always called her "Miss Matilda" in his friendly teasing way. But he had that sort of sunny friendliness to everything—puppies, tramps, classmates. Mathilde knew that he was growing away from her, and that her adoration would thin out into a haunting dream.

BUT that wasn't why she had gone to work in Fred Madden's office when he had come back to be a surgeon-dentist. At this point in her reflection Mathilde turned uneasily in bed. Miss Henrietta Madden's blundering comments, however cruelly true in some respects, were unfair in their implications. Before Doctor Madden had come back Mathilde had been wishing and wishing that she could find something to expand the life in that little brown cottage. She wanted to "do something." Then Doctor Fred had come back and let it be known that he wanted a town girl to help him in his office. And suddenly, quite apart from her devotion to her hero, Mathilde had known that here was the thing she could do. And her instinct had been right. The little details of this job appealed to her, and she was a born helper. Never would she do big, bold, conquering deeds; but never did a conqueror live who would not have been glad of her alert, obedient assistance.

She did do well. Moreover, she developed a pride in herself that took the sting away from her envy of the beautiful girl whose picture stood on Doctor Fred's desk in the outer office. It was inevitable that Doctor Fred should some day marry some such person. He was so handsome himself and had always liked pretty girls. Mathilde had seen Miss Blair in the flesh as well as in a photograph. She was about perfect. She had bright brown hair, waved very close to a high, proud head, shining with expert professional attention. She had bright blue eyes that looked squarely at anything she chose to see; and what she did not care to see she turned her back upon. She wouldn't go into Doctor Fred's inner office, for instance. She loathed dentist offices and preferred to think of her lover in other than his professional aspects. It was an exquisitely gowned back that she turned. The very seams of her clothes looked expensive. And with her always came a wonderful fragrance. Mathilde wondered if it was a drop of liquid extract or the soft powder on the smooth face. Only one thing about her Mathilde didn't like. Her nose. It was very straight and pointed, almost sharp. Always it seemed too bossy. But then, it was exactly the kind of nose to go with success.

DOCTOR FRED would marry this handsome person. He'd been coming to that, but not she nor any other wife that he might have chosen would have of Dr. Fred just what Mathilde had. Precious gifts he would pile at his wife's feet, but never would his wife know the joy of working by his side day in and out, of helping him to be the man he was, of just handing him things, the right things always as he wanted them. This proud wife wouldn't hear him cuss softly under his breath when he was exasperated or jubilate over silly little triumphs.

"Come here, Miss Matilda, and look at this!"

And she'd have to come and peer appreciatively into the gaping jaw of potentate or menial and say:

"That's wonderful!"

"All right, Miss Matilda, if you pass on it!"

The joy of that! And she had come to think when her work had gone so well that perhaps Doctor Fred had chosen her, remembering the good qualities she possessed and anticipating her value to him; at least had picked her out of friendliness.

And now Miss Henrietta Madden, his own aunt, and perhaps all of the town of Meldon, knew that he had selected her for the place because his sweetheart had approved of her homeliness, her dowdiness, had feared the attraction of a prettier girl placed in similar intimacy. That was just as if vandals had gathered up mud from the street and thrown it all over the white purity of the doctor's office, over her in her white uniform.

At first Mathilde thought she would never go back. She just couldn't, feeling horrid and sick and somehow ashamed. Then she remembered that she wasn't quite through with a crown which she was making for a farmer who would be in at eleven in the morning. He came many miles and must not be disappointed.

She'd have to go back. Well, then, she would go back all homely and dowdy. She'd brush her hair down slick and tight and hunt out that black crêpe dress which she had worn when Doctor Fred had first chosen her. She thought she wouldn't even put on a uniform. She'd just be the dull, drab person that they wanted her to be. Why not? What was the use of being otherwise?

But not even that mournful solace was permitted her. She remembered suddenly that her mother had used the black crêpe to reline her Winter coat. Other dispositions had been made of similar old ugly garments as new ones accumulated. The annual relation-box had been turned over immediately on receipt this time to a church society. So, if she went back—and she must, because of that crown—she would have to go back to-morrow as she had gone to-day.

THEN a wonderful thought came to Mathilde. Of course to-morrow would be the same. What Miss Henrietta had said, what all of Meldon might say, couldn't alter facts a bit. It hurt only to realize that Meldon knew what Mathilde had always known. She knew that she was homely. She hadn't thought of it too much, had rather grown used to the fact, as you might grow used to English sparrows though you preferred bluebirds. But she knew she was homely. She also knew that when she went to work for Doctor Fred she was dowdy. She rather thought she wasn't so dowdy now. If she had changed that way, however, it was not for any horrid reason that outsiders might impute. It was just her new pride in herself.

Could they take that from her by saying things? Not if she didn't let them! For the first time in her life she felt she had something to defend, and all her subdued instincts arose to the call. She had gone into Doctor Fred's office in the first place knowing that soon he would marry a Miss Lois Blair, that she and he would always be strangers that way. She would go back to that shining office to-morrow, knowing the same thing, of course, as she

An authority gives the where and how of motor camping

By JOHN D. LONG

YOUR STURDY CAR

Where will it carry you this Summer?

It can take you to sources of new joy and health; on Gipsy tours that will teach you the charm of fires glowing under the trees, the fragrance of hot coffee, and the sizzle of steak over an open flame.

Fifteen million Americans turn Gipsy every Summer. But they are comfortable Gipsies rolling along smooth highways in gasoline caravans.

You will want to join these happy millions after reading this article by a motor camper of many years' experience and author of a number of important articles on camping.

When you pack for your tour you will also want one or both of the valuable leaflets Mr. Long has prepared for THE DELINEATOR. "Cooking Equipment for the Motor Camper" and "Sleeping Equipment for the Motor Camper" will help speed you on a pleasant and carefree vacation. Send your letter (with a two-cent stamp to cover postage) to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. We will gladly send both leaflets if you wish, or you can tell us which one you want.

A NEW army has come to possess the land. It is an ever-moving, happy-hearted, adventure-seeking army, an army of motor tourists.

Some of this army—more than a hundred thousand a year—are coast-to-coast travelers, many of them in cars equipped with every motor convenience; some are gasoline hoboes, begging a lift from one filling-station to the next; but most of them are families or parts of families awheel for a short vacation, frequently limited by no definite schedule or goal, following their horns, like the family who carried on their car the legend, "We don't know where we're going, so we can't get lost."

Why has motor camping become so popular? Why do such cities as Los Angeles, with its twenty motor camps, Denver, Seattle, Portland and other places register in a single season nearly a hundred thousand visiting vacationists in a single tourist camp?

There are three reasons: First, motor camping is economical. Vacationists awheel can spend as much or as little as they please. Often the expenditure for a vacation of months, stretching over thousands of miles to the far horizons, is little more than that of staying at home.

Furthermore, motor camping has become the greatest of national sports because it is not, like hunting, an affair for the menfolk alone, but takes in the entire family, from grandmother to the baby. Dogs, cats, birds and other pets are often seen with the travelers. Less frequently chickens are carried along in pens, and even occasionally a cow in a trailer. We have even heard of a family, needing a supply of fresh milk for an infant, that took along a goat which was carried in a crate strapped on the running-board of the car and was let out to be milked and fed when the tourists pitched their tent.

Lastly, there is the pioneering spirit, still fresh in the hearts of many of us.

That's why fifteen million people every year spend their vacations on wheels.

This figure may seem large, but Government reports bear it out. Official registrations show that more than nine million motorists visited the national forests in 1924, and fully one million the national parks. Most of these were campers. Besides, there are literally hundreds of State parks and forests, little Connecticut having twenty-nine and New York two score, whose areas combined reach about four million acres, a tract greater than that of the entire State of Connecticut. Also, there are some thirty-five hundred localities in all parts of the United States which have tourist parks; and these, counted with the fifteen hundred camp-sites in the national forests and those along the great highways, are estimated to make up a grand total of at least ten thousand camps.

It must be remembered, however, that vacationing awheel is a game, one for which you must learn the technic if you expect to really enjoy it. Last August, camping one night by a lake on Bear Mountain, Palisades Interstate Park, we had next to us a tent occupied by two adults and two children. It had been a scorching August day, but the sun had no sooner gone down than the temperature also began to drop, in a way unforeseen by the inexperienced campers. They were sleeping, or rather trying to sleep, on cots. Now a camper who has had any experience knows that when sleeping on a cot in a tent he should have two blankets under him for each one placed on top. Also, the experienced camper knows that it is much warmer on the ground, with the floor-cloth of the tent underneath and all the blankets on top, than it is above on a cot.

Our neighbors soon found it getting too cold on their cots for comfort or sleep, and we heard the man say quite plainly that it was his first night in camp and would also be his last.

Had these people received a little preliminary instruction, they would have known that even in July and August, near a body of water or at some elevation, as on a high hill or mountain, the moment the sun goes down the temperature follows suit with surprising promptitude.

THE first consideration that arises in preparing for a vacation on wheels is usually the matter of money. How expensive is it?

A definite answer is difficult, for you may be either lavish or lean in what you spend, and the limits are far apart.

After expense, or perhaps before it, the next thing of importance to consider in taking your vacation on wheels is the question of sleep; for driving and sleeping in the open are wonderful soporifics; if your arrangements are carefully made, most of the good of your vacation on wheels will be derived from comfortable sleep.

To have comfortable sleep, you must have some sort of a comfortable bed, whether in hammock, on cot, in tent or in the car. You can get comfortable beds for adults that go into even the smallest sedans or touring cars; and sleeping in a car you need only one-half the bedding required in a tent. But if there are more than two adults in the party the car will not be roomy enough.

There are likewise many types of folding beds and cots that pack into compact bundles. Then there is the floor of the tent, upon which you may spread blankets or where you may place an air-bed. Some campers prefer sleeping-bags, which are all right in cold weather, but liable to be overwarm in Summer. The hammocks already mentioned have their advantages, but at first it is somewhat of an athletic stunt to enter them.

After a long day of driving you'll be willing to admit that food and drink are also pretty important. When in the country, care should be used as to water, but

Good-mannered Babies

You cannot begin too early to teach courteous behavior

By ELSIE C. MEAD

IN THESE articles I shall not attempt to explain why most children when left to their own devices behave like little savages, but I shall try to offer a few practical suggestions which may be of service in training children to act like civilized beings. I believe it is conceded by all that good manners are essential, and to the disheartened parent I would say that the teaching of them is possible, even though it may mean harder work, a more rigorous régime and more patience than the teaching of an academic subject. For just as any normal child can learn to read, he can also learn to deport himself properly. Indeed it is during childhood that every individual must learn the fundamentals of good breeding. Reading, writing and arithmetic can be mastered by the adult mind, but ease of manner and the niceties of behavior are rarely acquired later in life.

We all have our own interpretation of the term "good manners." To some it may present a picture of simpering artificiality. But as used in this article it signifies the behavior which reflects thoughtfulness of and interest in others.

To the assertion frequently made by the discouraged parents of an unmannerly child, "He was just born that way," I should reply that while some children are born with a gentler disposition than others, parents shirk their responsibility by blaming bad manners wholly on a child's inherent qualities. For after all it is chiefly home environment which is reflected in the conduct of the average child.

Rarely do we see a polite child whose environment we know to be rough and rude; yet you may ask, how is it then that so often a rude and overbearing child comes from the gentlest of homes? I can only answer that this discrepancy between what a child is and what he should be is traceable to two major causes. The first of these is carelessness in the parents' own manners and speech, and the habit of demanding of the child courtesies which the adults are too heedless to practise themselves. The second cause is an unbalanced love, where overfond parents can not bear to interfere with their child's freedom of expression or thwart his untutored desires, but indulge the child's every whim. The result is a spoiled child who is a menace to the happiness of a home and a bane to society in general. In this category are included the children who have never known the blessing of brothers and sisters. These little ones have my especial sympathy; for all the discipline so easily supplied by brothers and sisters in the give-and-take of childhood's little world has to be administered directly from the adult to the child or, as is more frequently the case, alas! not at all!

ANY attention an only child receives from a grown-up, whether it be disciplinary or in the form of admiration, is sure to enlarge his ego to an insufferable extent. The best method of rearing an only child is to secure companionship for him as early as possible, either by borrowing a neighbor's child for an hour a day or taking him to play with other children. Even a child a year old enclosed in his own little pen, playing with his own toys, with only his own impulses to consider, soon learns to resent any interference.

Kindergartens are of real value to all youngsters, but especially to the overindulged only child; for in kindergarten tasks and games he learns to think less about himself and more about the principles of team play. He discovers his own relative unimportance in this scheme of things.

A mother can not begin too soon to think of good manners for her child. Even before the little one is born, she should visualize a well-disciplined, sensibly-brought-up infant. There isn't an expectant mother who hasn't this ideal, I am sure, but she doesn't always realize how much her own state of mind has to do with bringing about the proper results.

MRS. ELSIE CLEVELAND MEAD

I can not resist quoting here what we hear so often: "Our children would be all right if only their grandmothers didn't spoil them." Some day, perhaps, a prophet will arise whose special mission will be the training of grandparents; for an old-fashioned grandmother can prove the greatest obstacle in the path of the young mother who desires to profit by modern methods in child hygiene and child psychology.

IT IS said that a child's mind develops more in the first year of his or her life than in any other subsequent year; so it is well to assume that the very little baby is sensitive to the world about him. Our training in proper deportment, therefore, should begin with a firm but gentle hand in the very first months of the infant's life. For instance: the snatching habit, while it may be cunning in a babe-in-arms, is offensive in an older child.

"Habit formation" is the well-established psychological law on which we base all child training before reason comes into play; and when we realize the fundamental invariability of this law, we should be encouraged to persist quietly in its practise even in the face of resistance. The modern mother, for example, is told not to pick her baby up when it cries, if convinced there is nothing the matter, as the mother who does give in is almost certain to find later that she has a crying baby on her hands. The little brain has quickly formed a habit, one which is merely a forerunner of imperious demands for attention later on.

It is well to say "please" and "thank you" in one's dealings with a baby, even in its first year, even though scoffing friends and neighbors may consider such formality with a wee baby absurd.

Early attention to such courtesies and the use of the child's name after "yes" and "no" will tend to obviate more difficult maneuvering later on.

An English father of a family of six of the best-behaved youngsters I ever met explained his tactics in this fashion: "I make it a point to talk more slowly and more distinctly to my children than I do ordinarily. I also exaggerate my 'thank yous' and my 'pleases' and my 'beg your pardons,' and emphasize my appreciation of every little courtesy or thoughtfulness shown me or shown each other. It takes time and thought, and I am sure I should not have the patience to pursue this policy if it were not for the gratifying results." As I said above, this father was English, and that may account partly for the deliberateness of his method, which is rather contrary to our way of direct instruction. But his method will successfully disarm the perversity of many children. A soft answer turneth away wrath and, to paraphrase for a moment, it also turneth away "pertness."

ONE would rather see a child really naughty than impertinent or "fresh." Sarcasm invites the "sassy" answer, and this is very often a child's means of expressing his feeling of equality. For instance, you ask a child to come to you "at once," and if he tarries you may say sarcastically, "How quickly you obey!" Almost instinctively the child says, "I'm as quick as you'd be." Such an answer is the child's effort to justify itself and may be said in an attempt to meet the level of the parent's misplaced humor; it is not necessarily intended to be disrespectful, but a parent who continues correcting in this vein will stimulate a habit of saucy retaliation. A better way would be to speak peremptorily or even crossly if the child did not respond to your command as quickly as he should. To a parent who has a youngster who is inclined to argue back I would say, nip the habit in the bud, never let it get a real start by allowing your commands to be argued about; by any reasonable means insist on obedience first and explanations after the child has done as he has been told.

I do not believe that slapping a baby ever brings about desired results. It may seem the only way to teach certain lessons; but I believe, on the contrary, it usually ends in a child's learning by example to hit at anything whether animate or inanimate. I always suspect a child's early training when I see him hitting at his toys or slapping a pet cat.

To illustrate what I mean: let us suppose that a child sucks his fingers and his mother slaps him for it. She may think she can thus break the habit. But she can not. The act itself must be prevented; the desire must be broken at its source. To accomplish this, a wise mother will either put mittens on her child or else wrap his fists in some clumsy covering; and in a short time the desire will have died out for lack of response to the original impulse.

We must remember that if we crown our baby king of all he surveys we shall find ourselves, when he begins to walk, slaves to an overindulged, ill-mannered "runabout."

A CHILD CRYING

IS EITHER PATHETIC OR ANNOYING

Much as we may love a child we are irritated when we know that it is fretful merely because it is too much humored and can get anything by being peevish.

But it's not the little one's fault. Even in childhood it can be taught to adapt itself and to consider the comfort of others.

Mrs. Mead's experience and her thorough knowledge of social usages fit her especially well for the work THE DELINEATOR has undertaken in this new series.

Read "Good-Mannered Babies" and watch for the other articles that are coming. They will help you give your child that gentle, patient training necessary to instil the principles of courtesy and helpfulness. These principles give social poise—and poise can prevent so much discomfort and unhappiness in later life!

The family Medicine cabinet

"The world is mine!"

PREPAREDNESS in the home for the inevitable combat against the arch-enemy disease is of vital importance, for the coming of sickness or of accidents is unexpected and unannounced. The watchword should be "In time of health prepare for sickness." At no age of life is this as necessary as in that of childhood.

The mother job is a most versatile one, and an efficient mother not only concerns herself with the cooking, sewing and housekeeping, but she feeds the body and the mind, binds up the wounds, kisses away the tears, smooths the pillow and cares for her sick child. She must be prepared and in readiness for any and every emergency, whether it be sickness or accident. First of all she should equip a medicine cabinet. No home with children is complete without it. In this cabinet should be kept all the household remedies and articles for use in illness and emergencies. The cabinet should be large enough to hold the necessary articles, and placed high enough to be out of reach of the children—preferably in a bright spot where the contents can be clearly seen day or night when the door is open.

Small medicine cabinets can be purchased at slight expense in furniture stores. There should be two shelves, making three compartments, and the cabinet should have a lock and key. The key should be hung on one side near the top of the cabinet with a string attached so that it can not be mislaid and will always be available. The importance of this precaution can not be overestimated. In my own experience a young child who was playing doctor almost fatally dosed his small baby brother with "medicine" obtained from an unlocked medicine closet.

The top shelf should be reserved for poisons only. It does not require much space to keep the poisons needed in a family medicine chest, but during sickness the doctor may order other poisons and they should also be kept here. There are two poisons that should always be kept in the medicine cabinet. One is tincture of iodin, which is used only externally and is applied as a disinfectant on cuts and lacerations and whenever the skin is broken. It should be gently applied with a cotton swab or gauze and never poured on the surface. If too much is used it will blister the delicate skin of the child. The iodin bottle should be distinctive, clearly labeled and unmistakable. Poison bottles with knobs or sharp projections can be bought at drug-stores, or several bands of adhesive plaster can be put around the bottle so that both the hand and the eye will know that it contains poison. The other poison to be kept on hand is a five per cent. carbolic acid solution and this also must be put in a distinctive and labeled bottle. This is for external use only and always in dilution of a strength not greater than half a teaspoon in a quart of water. This is used in contagious diseases, especially in typhoid fever, to disinfect the hands and the discharges.

Bichlorid of mercury, either in solution or in tablet form, and carbolic acid in full strength have no place in the family medicine cabinet. They may be required in case of illness when ordered by your physician, but after the illness is over they should be destroyed. Many tragic deaths and accidents have been caused by these poisons being given by mistake or in the excitement of an emergency.

There are only a few medicines for internal use that should be allowed in this cabinet. Many and various medicines may have been prescribed by your physician at different times, but these should never be kept or treasured for future use. Throw all such medicines away and do not let them accumulate and clutter up the cabinet. What the doctor prescribed for one condition is not intended for some one else suffering from what may appear to be a similar ailment. Many drugs do not keep well. For example, a solution of argyrol, which is considered by many mothers to be a household remedy, is very unstable and to have any value must be made up fresh, as it is inert after a few weeks.

THERE should be space for at least ten bottles of medicine on the second shelf, and the ones to be described will meet nearly every emergency or request of the doctor. In the country districts all of these remedies should be available at a moment's notice. And they are nearly as important in the cities, for it is sometimes very difficult to procure any of these household remedies at night when most drug-stores are closed. So the city mother should have a complete and well-equipped medicine closet if she is to be prepared for any emergency, day or night. All of the bottles should be plainly and clearly labeled. The cabinet should not contain any unlabeled bottles. The ten remedies recommended for household use are:

EVERY HOME SHOULD HAVE A CABINET FOR HOME REMEDIES AND FIRST-AID SUPPLIES

ALCOHOL—Pure grain alcohol can not be obtained except by a physician's special prohibition certificate, and he is not allowed to prescribe more than eight ounces at one time. The medicated alcohols sold in drug-stores answer all the purposes of pure grain alcohol for sponging, cleansing, compresses, etc. A six-ounce bottle of medicated alcohol will be sufficient for all uses of the sick-room.

AROMATIC SPIRITS OF AMMONIA—This is a temporary stimulant and in fainting and other forms of unconsciousness revives the heart and breathing until the doctor can come to diagnose the trouble. The best way to administer it is to mix one-half teaspoon in a glass of water and give the child one teaspoon every ten or fifteen minutes until the condition is relieved. It can be used to inhale in the nostrils in cases of fainting or collapse. A rubber cork should be used in this bottle.

CAMPHORATED OIL—This is a popular household remedy which is applied externally to relieve pain and reduce swelling. It may be rubbed on the chest in cases of bronchitis and pneumonia, and is helpful for enlarged glands of the neck. There is no better liniment for strains and sprains and stiff muscles. It is best to heat it before rubbing on the skin as this renders it more absorptive.

CASCARA—As an ordinary laxative one-half teaspoon of the aromatic extract of cascara will answer all purposes. This is best given at bedtime. It tastes like licorice and is not unpleasant. Your physician may prefer some other mild and simple medicine to open the bowels. Laxatives should only be given occasionally when absolutely necessary and never as a routine measure. It is only too easy for a child to acquire the pernicious laxative habit.

CASTOR OIL—This is a time-honored household remedy for which we have no substitute, and no home—much to the disgust of the children—should be without it. However, it must clearly be kept in mind that it is a purgative and not a laxative for every-day use. In cases of sickness when it is necessary to clean out the intestinal contents quickly and thoroughly there is nothing to equal it. It does the work in four to six hours and so well that there is little left in the bowels, and constipation lasts for a day or two after its use. Castor oil is one of the bugbears of childhood. A young baby does not object to its taste and may even lick the spoon, but it must be disguised for the older children. One method is to put one or two teaspoons of sirup of any flavor in a small wineglass and incline and turn the glass so as to coat the inside up to the brim. The oil is now placed in the center of the glass, care being taken that it does not touch the sides. Then a tablespoon of orange-juice is carefully placed on top. The entire dose must be taken at one gulp, which is difficult for very small children. It is very unkind and unwise to mix castor oil with milk or any important food, as it may create a disgust toward the article of diet which may last for years. The dose ranges from one teaspoon for babies to a tablespoon for older children.

LINSEED OIL AND LIME WATER when combined make a thick mixture called Carron oil, which is used in the first-aid treatment of scalds and burns. It is best to have four ounces of each in separate bottles and then mix them before applying on the burn. Petrolatum with bicarbonate of soda comes in three-ounce collapsible tubes and can be used as a substitute for Carron oil. It can be procured from any druggist, and the New York State Department of Labor requires it in all first-aid outfits.

SPIRITS OF CAMPHOR—This should be included in any list of household remedies. A few drops internally often relieve a cold in the early stages, and when inhaled it helps clear the nostrils. It is used as an external application for the relief of toothache, cold sores, etc.

SIRUP OF IPECAC—Given in doses from half a teaspoon to a teaspoon sirup of ipecac will cause vomiting and should be given at once when a child swallows a poison or some unknown medicine. When he chokes up with spasmodic croup in the wee small hours of the morning there is nothing which affords quicker relief than the vomiting produced by large doses of ipecac. It is also used in small doses—two to four drops every hour—for colds and coughs and is an excellent remedy.

SWEET SPIRITS OF NITER is a popular household medicine. It is commonly used to reduce fever and is a safe and harmless remedy. It also increases the secretion of urine. The dosage is from two to fifteen drops in a little water every two or three hours. A half-ounce bottle is sufficient, as this medicine does not keep well and should be renewed every three months.

It is well to have on this shelf some powdered BORIC ACID. This should be kept in a tin box and plainly labeled. It is of value only for external application in a solution of one or two teaspoons to a pint of water. It is not a poison. This solution is used to cleanse the eyes and mouth, and is excellent to wash wounds and apply over wounds as a wet dressing.

An eye cup affords a convenient method of bathing the eyes in cases of irritation and inflammation.

FOR YOUR "PERMANENT FILE"

Particularly on a question of your baby's welfare, it's never wise to trust your memory.

THE DELINEATOR has, from time to time, collected the important articles which have appeared in its pages and reprinted them in pamphlet form for its readers. Now we are ready to offer these three additional pamphlets, in this series, which every mother will want to keep on her reference shelf.

"The Development of Personality," by Dr. Arnold Gesell, Director of the Yale Psycho-clinic and Professor of Child Hygiene, Yale University.

"Weight, Growth and Health," by Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw. Includes new Height, Weight and Age Chart for Children, and a treatise on the dangers of constipation in children.

"Widespread and Dangerous Diseases." Includes: "Whooping Cough," by Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw; "Rickets," by Dr. Henry Rawle Geyelin, Assistant Professor of Clinical Medicine, Columbia University; "Measles," by Dr. Matthias Nicoll, Jr., New York State Commissioner of Health

The price of each booklet is ten cents, and the ones you want will be sent promptly upon receipt of the proper amount, together with a list of the booklets previously issued in this series. Address The Happy Child Department, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

SWISS NUMBER

EDITOR—HARRIET IDE EAGER

PICTURE EDITOR—ROBERT GRAEF

READ THE STORY OF THIS PICTURE ON PAGE FOUR

DEAR CHILDREN-ACROSS-THE-SEA:

Your editor is writing this from Switzerland. What a hard time I've had trying to squeeze all the interesting things I've seen into the eight little pages of THE LITTLE DELINEATOR. There's so much more I want to tell, but I can't do it next month, because that's the Italian number. I hope I've helped you to understand a little of Switzerland. I chose the tale of "The Three Milks," because, besides being a nice story, it helps you to see the Swiss peasant life, and how important cows and milk and cheese are, since they even make up stories about them.

If you really like our first foreign number and want more to come, please prove it by trying for the Clock Contest and writing to the children of the International School (page six).

Good-by, children-across-the-sea!

Your editor in Switzerland, HARRIET IDE EAGER.

P. S. Please save these foreign numbers to show your teacher next September.

WIN A REAL SWISS CLOCK

The most interesting, helpful letter, telling your editor what you like best in our Swiss number, and how it has helped you to understand more about Switzerland, will win as first prize this real little carved Swiss clock, bought by your editor in Geneva. The second prize is a beautiful big framed picture.

Send a stamped, self-addressed envelope, if you want an answer, telling you games the Swiss children play. Contest closes July 20th. Address, Swiss Clock Contest, THE LITTLE DELINEATOR, NewYork, N. Y.

The Three Milks

An Old Swiss Shepherd Story

ONCE upon a time, on a Swiss mountain top, lived a poor boy named Eucharist. He was helper to the shepherds who pastured and milked the cows and made cheese for the folk of the village. Eucharist was a good boy, but timid and fearful, and always afraid to go out alone at night hunting for a missing cow.

"We must cure the lad of this," said his good old master. So one black night of rain and thunder, he ordered the boy down the mountainside, to fetch their great cheese stirrer, left in another chalet, where the cows had pastured the week before.

Eucharist begged and wept, but all in vain. At last he set out, trembling and stumbling, groping his way only by lightning flashes that broke the blackness.

It was past midnight when he reached the deserted chalet. But what was this light streaming from every window and crack?

Frightened, he crept nearer and peeped in.

Four strange peasants stood inside, making cheese. An old man, who seemed to be master, was using the very cheese stirrer which Eucharist had been sent to fetch. A youth in white held a bowl of the fairest and whitest milk, but in the vessel held by the third, the milk was gray and spotted, while the fourth, a dirty wretch, crouching in a corner, clutched a bowl of black, black liquid.

"In Heaven's name," cried Eucharist, "who are you?"

And he of the fair white milk made answer in the voice of an angel:

"I was Joseph, a shepherd boy like you. This old man was our master. One of us beat his cows cruelly, so his milk is ugly and spotted. One stole three pieces of good cheese, so his milk is black as charcoal. Even our master failed in his duty, for he should have kept count of the cheeses and reproved the shepherd who beat his cows. So he too must suffer here until a shepherd boy, like you, comes to ask for his cheese-stirrer.

"As for me, I was but a lad, but I too am punished, because I feared to tell my masters when the older shepherds did wrong."

Then the youth in white bade Eucharist to seek out their old village and beg the priest and all the good folk to pray for the souls of their lost shepherds. This done, he began to sing with the voice of an angel, and rising in the air like a lark, vanished in a cloud of fire.

Then the old master gave the great cheese-stirrer into the hands of the boy, and said: "Obey orders, and you shall be blessed. You shall never fear again, and you shall have the most beautiful voice in all the countryside."

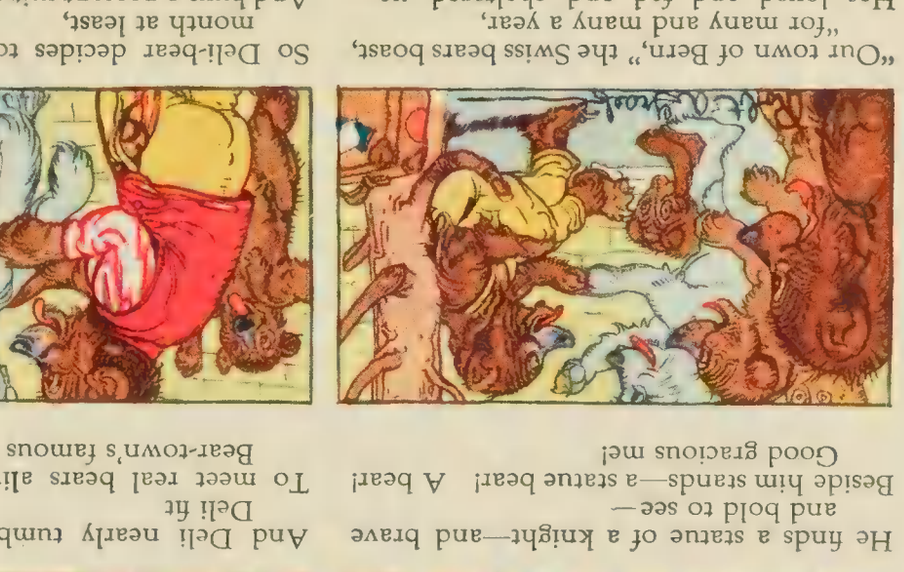
Suddenly the chalet was dark, the shepherds had vanished, and the storm beat furiously outside.

But brave and of good cheer, Eucharist set forth, in the blackness, singing as he went.

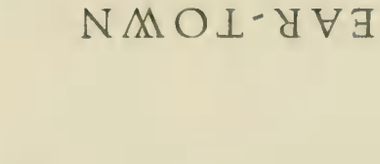
The older shepherds, waiting on the mountainside, were amazed to hear his deep voice echoing through the night in a beautiful song no one had ever heard before.

To his old master, Eucharist told all.

He told of seeing the four strange peasants: of the one whose milk was pure; the one whose milk was gray and spotted, and the one whose milk was black.



The old master of Eucharist listened with interest to all he had to say, and told him, next morning, to seek out the village of the strange shepherds, as he had been told, and beg the priest and all the poor folk to pray for their souls.



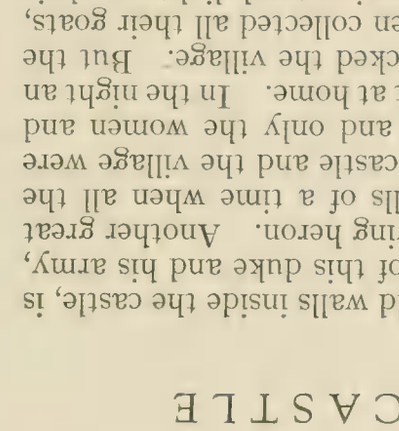
The very next year, Eucharist was made leader of the shepherds. One night, as he hunted for a missing cow on the dark mountainside, singing as he went, three doves rose in the air before him, and he heard a voice saying:

"God will reward thee."

And from that day on, he saw nothing strange, but only prospered, and was happy through all his years on the mountainside, tending his cows.

Where Children Of Nine Nations Go To School

FORTY children from nine different parts of the world learning reading, writing, and 'rithmetic together in an old Swiss chalet! Doesn't that sound fun? It is called the International School ("inter-national" means "between nations," you know), and it is in Geneva in Switzerland.



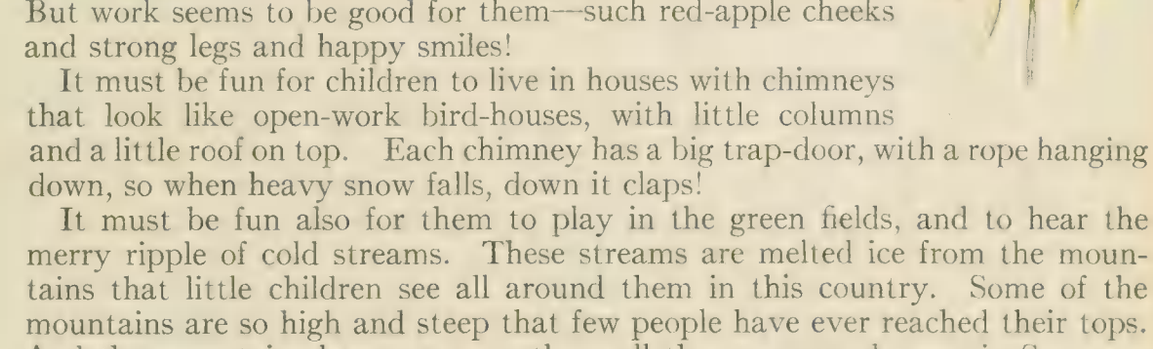
You see, fathers and mothers from America and France and England and Spain and Italy and Denmark and Russia and Switzerland come to Geneva for the League of Nations meetings and for many other reasons. So they decided to start their own International School.

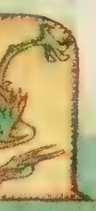
Sometimes the teachers speak English and sometimes they speak French, but the children do not care, for they understand both, and many of them know even three languages.

The nicest part of all is that the place doesn't look like a schoolhouse, for it is an old Swiss chalet. The farmer and his family live in the other half, and the children of the nine nations can look out of their room, with its pleasant open fire, and watch ducks and chickens.

Do you want a letter from the children of the International School, written on foreign paper and mailed from Geneva, with a Swiss stamp? Write a friendly letter, telling about yourself and your school, and THE LITTLE DELINEATOR will send your letters to Switzerland. The children of the nine nations will answer, writing about themselves and their school in the chalet. Be sure to send five cents in stamps, for that is the cost of foreign postage. Address Swiss Letter, THE LITTLE DELINEATOR, New York, N. Y. Don't forget five cents in stamps!

cows, quite as though she knew all about it! On many of the barns you see rows of little tin shields tacked above the door—they are prizes for good cows and good cheese won at fairs for years and years back.



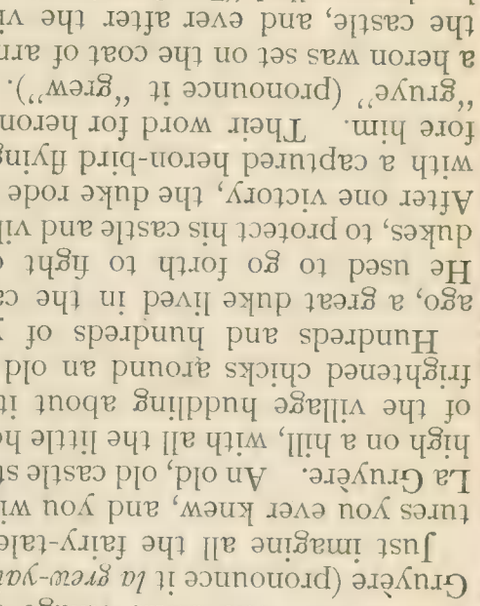


Children help their fathers and mothers too—boys tend the goats and hunt for missing cows, and girls help with the baking and care for the babies. But work seems to be good for them—such red-apple cheeks and strong legs and happy smiles!

It must be fun for children to live in houses with chimneys that look like open-work bird-houses, with little columns and a little roof on top. Each chimney has a big trap-door, with a rope hanging down, so when heavy snow falls, down it claps!

It must be fun also for them to play in the green fields, and to hear the merry ripple of cold streams. These streams are melted ice from the mountains that little children see all around them in this country. Some of the mountains are so high and steep that few people have ever reached their tops. And the mountains have snow on them all the year round, even in Summer. Winter has thrown a white cape over their shoulders and they never take it off. On the Fourth of July, when most of you find it pretty warm, it must be fun for little Swiss children to take a special train up the mountainside and soon find themselves in plenty of snow, enough to make a sturdy snowman or to build a fort.

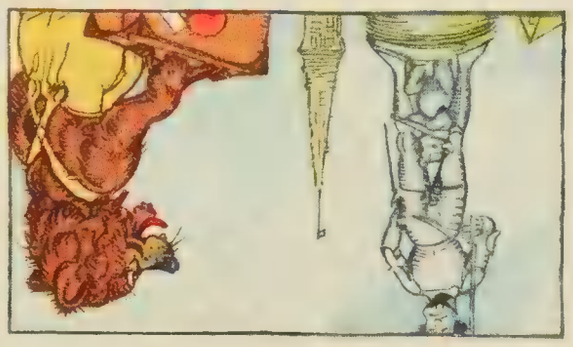
It must be fun to live in a house trimmed with wood-carvings made by your own father or big brother. When cold Swiss Winters snow them into their little chalets, the men while the time away carving wood, while the women make lace and embroideries, and some one tells a story—about shepherds and cows and goats and chamois and dark mountains—inside at night. One of the stories the Swiss peasants tell around their fires in Winter you can read on page four of this number of THE LITTLE DELINEATOR.



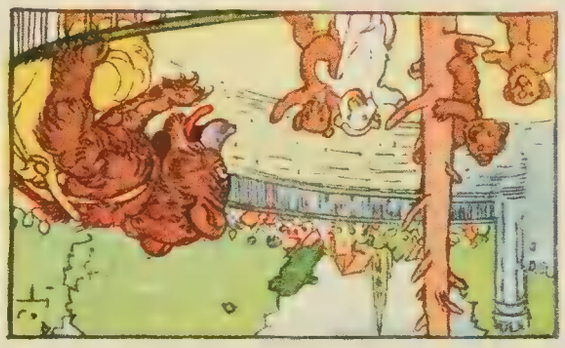
THERE is a famous cheese called Gruyère, sent all the way to America, as well as the Swiss chocolate children like so well. If you have never tasted Gruyère cheese, father and mother have, and they will like this true story of your editor's visit to the little Swiss village of La Gruyère (pronounce it la grew-yair).

Just imagine all the fairy-tale pictures you ever knew, and you will see La Gruyère. An old, old castle stands high on a hill, with all the little houses of the village huddling about it like frightened chicks around an old hen.

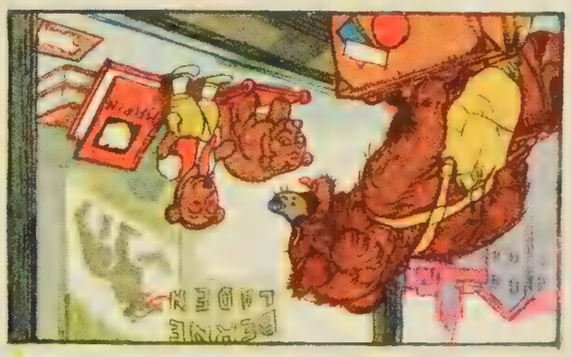
Hundreds and hundreds of years ago, a great duke lived in the castle. He used to go forth to fight other dukes, to protect his castle and village. After one victory, the duke rode back with a captured heron-bird flying before him. Their word for heron was "gruye" (pronounce it "grew"). So a heron was set on the coat of arms of the castle, and ever after the village has been called "La Gruyère."



THE CHEESE THAT WAS NAMED FOR A CASTLE



On the old walls inside the castle, is a painting of this duke and his army, with the flying heron. Another great painting tells of a time when all the men of the castle and the village were off at war, and only the women and children left at home. In the night an enemy attacked the village. But the brave women collected all their goats, and tied burning torch-lights to their horns. Then, with torch-lights in and tied burning torch-lights to their horns. Then, with torch-lights in haughtily and stares down the other



DELI-BEAR GOES TO BEAR-TOWN

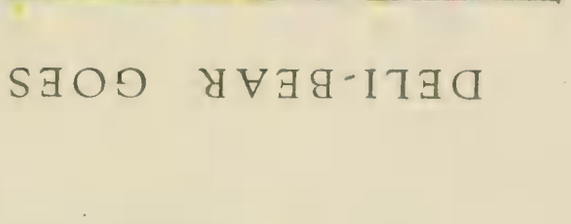
Beside him stands—a statue bear! A bear!
Good gracious me!



And Deli ft nearly tumbles in and has a Deli ft
To meet real bears alive and proud, in Bear-town's famous pit!

Our Deli-bear has gone to Bern— for Bern, of course, you know
Is capital of Switzerland, the land of goats and snow!

In every shop he sees himself—and walks into a square bears have it easy here!"

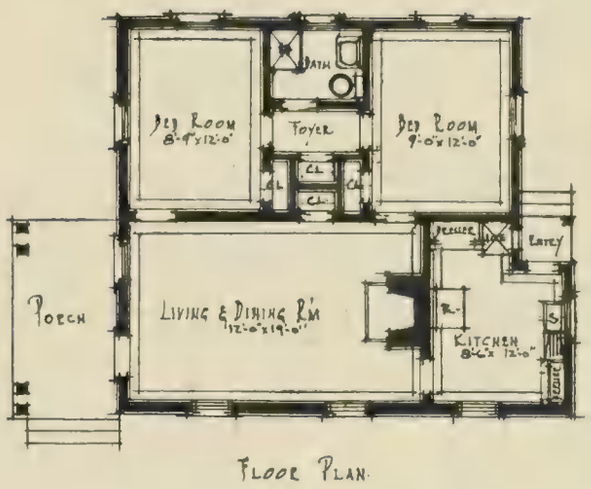
So Deli-bear decides to stay in Bern a month at least,
And buys a peasant suit to show he's friend to man and beast!



Houses for Mountains or Seashore

By DONN BARBER

Fellow of the American Institute of Architects, and Architect of the New York Cotton Exchange

WHAT could be more satisfying to the lover of the out-of-doors than to possess one of these two interesting small houses? Whether your holidays last from June to October or are limited to week-ends, such little houses will often solve your vacation problems.

For mountains or foot-hills the small house of logs would be most appropriate, though the little clapboard house could be developed into a most charming hillside cottage. Window-boxes and a garden, enclosed either with a white picket fence or privet hedge and a lattice gateway, would make the whole a miniature estate.

to the mountains, the woods, or the seashore, where a cool little cabin awaits us.

A blue-print showing floor-plans and elevations of either one of these charming cottages will be sent for one dollar. A two-cent stamp for postage will bring you the sheets of other DELINEATOR homes—for which you can also purchase blue-prints.

When the Summer cottage is built, ask Mrs. Sanders to help you plan its furnishings. She will gladly answer any questions if you will send your letter—with a two-cent stamp—to the House-Decoration Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

FRONT ELEVATION

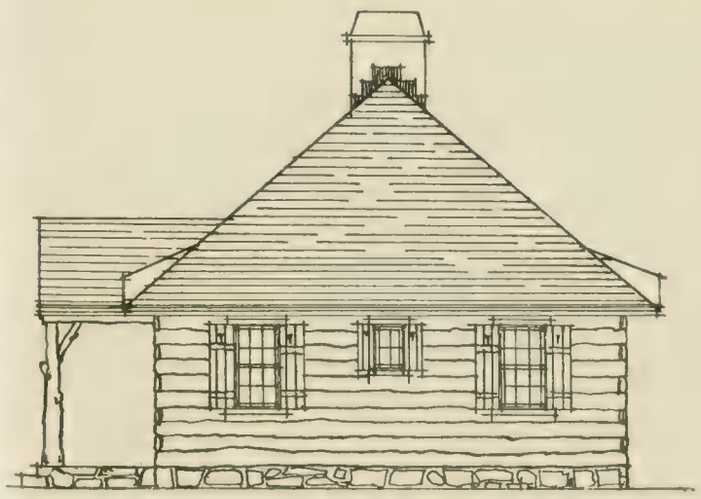
The location of a Summer home is all important, and in determining what it shall be, health, conveniences and scenic beauty are the points to consider. An inexhaustible supply of good water is the first thing to look for. If town or village water is not obtainable, a driven well with a good pump is generally the next best thing, though occasionally a lively, uncontaminated brook and a ram will furnish all the water a small family needs. Lovers of the ocean will be happy if they can choose a site overlooking its salt expanse, and can plan the house so the living-room and porch will face south or southwest. These rooms will then be in the path of the prevailing Summer breezes.

Log cabins have a peculiar fascination for those who love the woods and wish to live in a civilized dwelling that will blend with and beautify the landscape. But before building your cabin, better have the timbers or logs cut in the Winter or early Spring before the sap rises and left out to dry in the sun, so they will be properly cured and usable. To many, a house built of logs with the bark on is more picturesque than one built of peeled logs, though there is always the possibility that the shaggy bark may dry and fall off. Peeled logs take on a very lovely quality when dressed with creosote and oil.

Aside from the heat it gives, which is so desirable on cool mornings and evenings, a fireplace is beyond all doubt the most decorative feature a log cabin can possess. The chimney indicated on the floor-plan of the log cabin illustrated has two flues, one for the kitchen range and one for the stone fireplace. This arrangement allows for plenty of hot water at all times, which is the greatest joy and luxury of rural living.

Whether one decides on the log cabin or seashore cottage, the floor space devoted to the kitchens is very small, and the proper choosing of a stove and other kitchen equipment is most important on each plan. The architect has carefully indicated space for the ice-box, dresser and table, which may be of the built-in type or bought after the house has been completed.

One who simply builds a log cabin and thinks his wilderness home is then completed is far from right. There is also the question of furniture. That cut from materials at hand in the woods is by far the most attractive and correct for this kind of house. Window-seats, chairs, bunks, stools, tables and sconces all may be most interestingly made from rough logs of spruce or hemlock. Even beds can be very comfortable when made of pine boughs laid over a frame of rough hemlock. This is done by bolting together four posts, with the bark on, to strong side and cross pieces. Several cross-pieces at top and bottom act as head and foot boards. From the head to the foot of the bed between the side-pieces you can lay even-shaped, springy pieces of wood about two inches in diameter. A good wool blanket and some balsam-filled pillows will complete the outfit.



The clapboard cottage furnished with the simplest type of wicker and painted furniture would need little else to make it quite charming and complete. Striped awning canvas, brilliantly colored Indian Head, turkey-red or some bright oilcloth for chair cushions or curtains wear well under the strong seaside sun, and give to a simple little cottage color and individuality galore.

For those who must consider the seaside dampness, water-proof chintz and the pastel-colored rubberized silks are just the fabrics for curtains and cushion-covers. Even the motor-boat can be included and appointed with cushions covered with either of these practical and beautiful materials.

After the house is built—those illustrated here may be constructed of either brick, stucco or wood—and the piles of rubbish are cleared away, a little grading, sowing of grass-seed and planting of hardy shrubs will make the tiny house so alluring that the Summer months will be only too short.

Summery coolness achieved by using a sunfast cretonne for both bedspreads and living-room chair slip-covers

THE art of making interiors cool and summery can be applied to both apartments and houses in city or country. There is no better investment for comfort than putting the house in Summer clothes. It not only refreshes the spirit after long, drab Winter months, but cools and rests the body from the care of deep-piled carpets, overstuffed furniture and heavy draperies. The use of special Summer curtains and furniture slip-covers is now considered a necessity in every well-regulated household. Certainly it is an economy, for velour furniture and all dust-catching fabrics will unquestionably last longer if carefully brushed and, if possible, dry-cleaned and covered. Slip-covers are the best-known way to protect furniture from the strong rays of the Summer sun. These should be made and fitted with care and precision, for nothing is more irritating to the eye of a good housekeeper than those that are loose and badly fitting.

You can easily make attractive slip-covers at home. Our new bulletin, "Slip-covers that amateurs can make," tells how to do it. The price of the booklet is twenty-five cents. If you are perplexed about any other house-furnishing problem, write to Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders, House-Decoration Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage, and she will send you a personal answer

A slip tedious to make but worth the labor

Such a protection is necessary when portières are not taken down

Above—Table tops and lamp-shades may be protected by slip-covers. Below—Ruffled slips of plain glazed chintz reflect summery charm

Often the quantity of material required to cover all furniture and the labor involved in making, cause the home-maker to hesitate before investing in Summer clothes for her household. If the subject of economy is foremost, purchase just enough material to cover the most essential pieces, such as those upholstered in the most soilable or warmest-looking fabrics. The remaining chairs, stools and tables may have runners or squares of material tied to the seats and backs by means of tapes. One advantage of this type of cover is that it is easily laundered. Besides being a saver of furniture the slip-cover opens up a variety of decorative possibilities. Materials such as plain crash, upholsterers' sateen, plain glazed chintzes and cotton reps may be bound or piped with a plain contrasting color; plum-colored glazed chintz, for instance, may have seams bound with jade green; a tobacco-brown rep may be piped with orange, or a cool green may be trimmed with a bright blue. Sofa-cushions and curtains, runners and lamp-shades may be made of the same material as that used for the piping, the effect of plain colors being slick, cool and most inviting on a hot Summer day.

The cretonnes (sun-proof, if possible), printed linens, gaily striped reps and the lighter-weight colored striped canvases or ducks make gay and summery-looking dresses for either house or porch furniture. Hammock and wicker chairs often need freshening, and there is no better way to make them attractive than by covering all detachable cushions with any of the above-mentioned materials.

Slips of figured materials may be bound with plain-colored dress tapes or strips of plain-colored materials in the predominating color note of the figured material.

The commercial wall oilcloth has been found most satisfactory and practical as a material to cover cushions for chairs and seats on boats or uncovered porches. The salt-water spray and dew may be wiped off without harm to the material.

A simple way to cover wintery soft cushions is to make slips for them bag fashion, providing the open ends with snap-fasteners or buttons and buttonholes. This permits a quick and easy removal of the covers when it is necessary to wash them or to take them out for Winter use.

Occasionally, instead of taking down portières or overdraperies, it has been advisable to make slip-covers for them. These slips are no more nor less than long tubes made the width of the hanging when pushed back, and fastened either to the rings with pin-hooks or brought over the pole and closed with either button and buttonholes or hooks and eyes. Before putting hangings in such a bag, however, it is wise to safeguard against moths by having the portières dry-cleaned or brushed thoroughly and to use camphor or tar balls.

Summer curtains should be as thin and sheer as possible, and should be made so as to encroach in no way on the admission of air. If possible, choose materials in the cool, soft colors suggestive of Summer flowers and leaves. Often two thicknesses of tarlatan or voile will combine cool colors, such as soft blue and green. Sheer fabrics in soft greens, blues, lemon-yellows and violets may be obtained in sunfast gauzes, sheer ginghams, swisses, mulls, voiles and organdies. Any of these materials can be most effectively used in the smaller and more intimate rooms, the heavier-weight cotton fabrics, such as crinkled cloth, unbleached muslin, Russian crash and Indian Head in more formal rooms.

And now the Summer rugs seem to be the next problem. For floor coverings you may use the very desirable rag, hooked or braided rug, the linen fiber, the reed, rush or straw rugs—which now come in a variety of colors, and which can only be matched by the grass fiber rugs which are made in separate square blocks, enabling them to fit any size floor space. Their use almost doubles the life of Winter floor coverings.

To the timid Brave

By CELIA CAROLINE COLE

PASCAL, or somebody, says that when a book gets hold of you, makes you feel that it is genuine, you may depend on it that its author wrote it on his knees. Whether this article which I am about to kiss good-by, straighten its tie, give its hair a last smooth and send out into the world, gives out any sincerity or not, you may depend on it, that I wrote it on my knees. It's to men.

Every now and then letters like this seep in: "Look here, Celia, my hair is coming out like the dickens—why don't you give us a turn?" Or, "It may be true that 'men marry women for their beauty and women marry men for their strength,' but my wife says that she married me for my fatal handsomeness and that I'm not holding up as I should! Come on, tell me how!"

All right. Here's all I know about what's what in being handsome. You probably know most of it too, but the trouble is that you don't get your knowledge of how to look groomed and successful into your daily living—you lay it away in some drawer, along with your religion; you're going to use it some day, maybe, but you're too busy now.

And yet it isn't so much a matter of time as it is of intelligence, the little, right touch, the right materials and the right way to use them.

LET'S begin at the top. Thinning hair around the temples, receding from the forehead, fading away into a minority on the crown. It's their airless hats, it's their brains (they have to use them too much), it's inherited, it's washing their hair too often and not brushing it enough—all sorts of reasons. Never mind! The thing to do is, the moment it begins, massage the scalp, feed the hair. Then, if you don't notice a decided improvement in two weeks' time—hair no longer falling, little new soft hair coming in—go to the finest hair specialist you can find and get diagnosed. Don't just dash off to a barber and let him put things on; that's silly and frequently ends in sure-'nuff baldness. If you have dandruff, the falling kind, and your hair seems dry, you haven't real dandruff at all, and it can be absolutely and easily cured by a good pomade; we know of only one that we stand back of with every inch of our self-respect. Your "dandruff" is simply dead scales from an undernourished scalp. If your hair is oily, your dandruff is a sort of superficial crust formed by dust and scales and excess oil. This same pomade will cure that, is doing it every day, because it nourishes the scalp and then the scalp feeds the hair, and then the glands which have been leaking oil take a new lease on life and, used in connection with a cleansing, astringent tonic we know, get back their verve.

Real dandruff, the germ kind, sticks close to the head and, like the parasite it is, saps the life out of the hair. This kind is not very common, happily, and it can be cured, but it takes longer.

Treatment for falling dandruff is massage every morning for five or ten minutes. And there is only one really right way to massage: Begin at the nape of the neck, pressing the thumbs firmly into the base of the skull, and work with circular motion around the neck to the ears. This gets up the circulation quickly. Then the scalp all over the head should be lifted, pressed and kneaded in circular sweeps of the finger-tips and cushion at the base of the palms until the entire scalp is pink. Make your circular motion back from the face rather than toward it so that the muscles of the face are lifted rather than pushed down. Then use a cleansing tonic once a week, to free the scalp from scales and dirt, and at least twice a week touch the middle fingers to the pomade and, parting the hair in rows, go all over the scalp with it. And every day of the world brush your hair at least ten minutes. You'll not only lose your dandruff, but you'll find your hair softer, shinier and much more alive. There is a cleansing tonic for oily hair and one for dry, and a special tonic for tired, "nervous" hair. But all need the pomade if there is dandruff. And all need the pomade three or four times a week on the temples and where it is receding from the brow and the thin place on the crown.

The correct way to brush is with even, steady strokes up away from the scalp, every stroke touching the scalp as if to make the hair stand on end and then long sweeping strokes down again to polish. Brushes should be kept as clean as you hope your son's character will be. The bristles should be flexible. A very stiff brush is a lot of fun to use, but it doesn't polish and it doesn't cleanse, and it very often irritates the scalp. It is false economy, as most of you probably know, to buy a cheap brush. A good one lasts for years. When you brush the hair, use a towel, and about every five strokes wipe the brush off on the towel. You'll see how much brushing cleanses. Wash the brush in good, warm, soapy water, swishing it up and down, rinse in cold water thoroughly, dry quickly in the sun or in a current of air. Never use artificial heat and never stand a brush on its bristles.

There is a complete and perfect little book on care of the hair you can have for the asking. It has a questionnaire that is a detailed diagnosis. It was written by a certain shop in New York that knows everything any human needs to know about hair. No one who has ever gone to this shop leaves it for any other place. And it is the only hair-shop we know of that husbands come to as faithfully as wives.

All sorts of men go there, doctors, lawyers, actors, opera-singers and plain (or handsome) business men. You see, it isn't like a boudoir, as most salons are—it's like a doctor's office. And though the head of this favored-of-the-gods shop says that the first time a man comes in he usually acts like an antelope or a kangaroo or any of the timid tribe of the wild and free, and says that his wife or the man friend who told him about the shop assured him that nobody would fuss over him, and that all other persons there would act as if he weren't there—he soon settles down, does everything they tell him, never breaks his appointments, and so gets marvelous results.

Graying hair is very often just hungry hair. It needs a nourishing oil or a fat pomade. Hot oil rubbed into the hair two or three hours, or one, before it is shampooed, will take away the lusterless, dry look and thicken up the hair.

Men who take a shower every day should wear rubber caps in the shower. Hair should be washed only once or, at most, twice a month, using in the interim the cleansing tonic and the brush.

There's a beautiful soap, with a clean, outdoors, man smell, not perfumed or dainty at all, that is fine for shampoo and also for the bath and hands. The manufacturer who makes this also has a hand lotion, very nice for men and for after shaving, which softens the skin and is healing for irritations.

We are told that every man in the world thinks he has a stiff beard. We were also told that the manner of shaving, like politics and religion, is often handed down from father to son. But a great authority on men in relation to good looks told us this about shaving. Wash the face first, whether you use cup or stick or cream or latherless cream. Then with the face wet, good and wet, dab the cream on and rub it in, not with the fingers but with the brush. Rubbing with the fingers stretches the skin and brings up the blood, and then if you do make an abrasion, it's more serious. Use plenty of water; you are trying to remove that oily coating which each little hair wears like a coat of mail.

It isn't vanity; it's common sense to use tonic or powder after shaving, to protect the skin and tone it. And of course men are nicer to look at when their skin doesn't shine! Most men put the powder on with a stroke from ears toward the mouth. Very, very bad, that. It pulls the facial muscles down and makes sagging cheeks and lines from the nostrils to the corners of the mouth.

There's a big, man-sized, beautiful compact powder been put on the market that is perfect for men. No shower of powder on the coat. And very smart-looking on his chiffonier. Just a sweep of the firm puff across the chin, then out toward each ear, across the nose, the forehead, and you don't shine, and you do look groomed, and your pores are protected against dirt.

Most shaving lotions make the mistake of being a bit too dashing in smell. Man things oughtn't to smell like a flower or a houri, but have a good, outdoors, clean smell. We found a talc that was just right and two toilet waters or tonics. Wich-hazel, of course, is very good. If it seems too drying, dilute it.

Here it is—the end of our space and we haven't begun to tell you! Next month, then, we'll tell you men, and women too, how to keep cool though hot in the city, and all about teeth and tobacco stains, and baths and nails and puffs under the eyes; about luster in the eyes and no lines around them. Au revoir!

"MEN DON'T CARE

about their own looks," somebody's wife said to C. C. C. a little while ago. But they do, don't they! The up-and-coming kind of men—they know how much a fresh, well-groomed appearance means to their business and social success.

So Mrs. Cole is ready to help them if they will write to her or if solicitous wives or sisters will write, should the "Timid Brave" not dare.

There's a leaflet on the care of the hair, another, on the care of the mouth, and a timely one on treatment of sunburn and tan. Both masculine and feminine readers will welcome the leaflet on "How to Keep Cool" these sweltering days. Send a two-cent stamp for postage on any two of these.

Questions on your individual problems, too, will be cheerfully answered in a personal letter. Always—with just a two-cent stamp to cover postage—you can get advice on any problem of health or beauty for any member of the family. ROCKY PATHS TO GARDEN BEAUTY

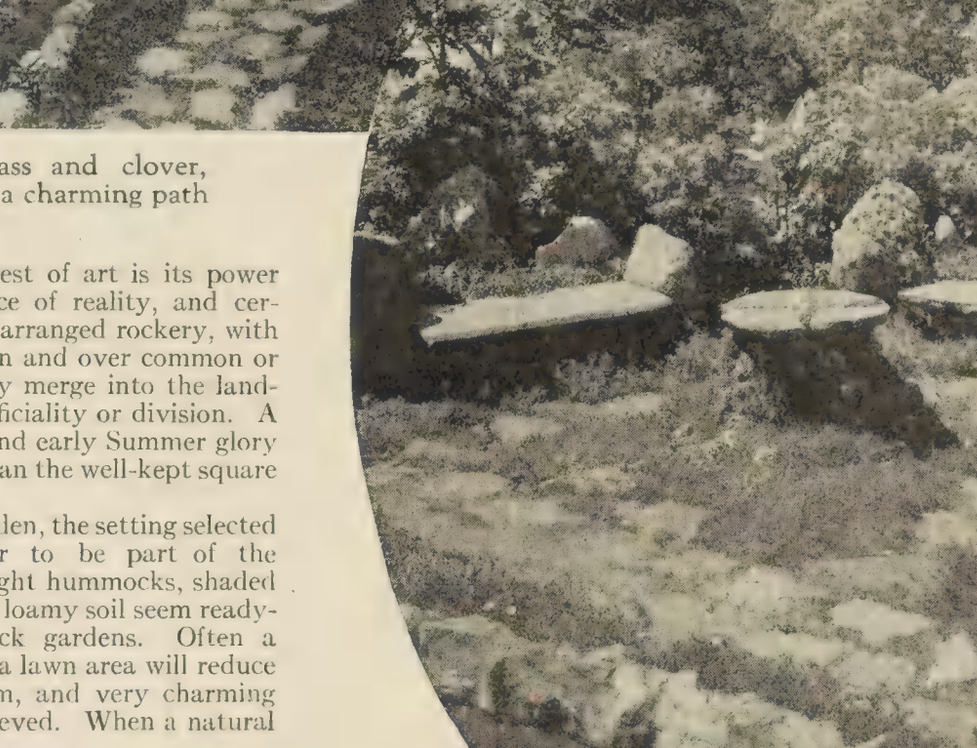
Art and nature meet in the creation of a rock garden

By Ewen MacKenzie

Landscape Superintendent for Mrs. Nicholas F. Brady

We have a list of plants that will thrive nicely in rocky places. Our Garden Department will be glad to send it to you if you are interested. Just address them care of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., enclosing a stamped return envelope

Set in beds of grass and clover, paving-stones make a charming path



The water supply for brook and pool is hidden behind a flowery mound

PERHAPS the highest test of art is its power to convey a semblance of reality, and certainly an artistically arranged rockery, with its skilful planting, between and over common or garden rocks, will naturally merge into the landscape with no sense of artificiality or division. A rock garden in its Spring and early Summer glory is often even more lovely than the well-kept square of old-fashioned flowers.

In considering such a garden, the setting selected should, if possible, appear to be part of the natural soil formation. Slight hummocks, shaded dells or steep banks of good loamy soil seem ready-made backgrounds for rock gardens. Often a natural ledge of rocks near a lawn area will reduce construction to a minimum, and very charming effects may be quickly achieved. When a natural setting is not to be found in one's own garden spot, earth and rocks must be transported from some loamy section or an excavation, and the garden developed by simply piling up rocks on irregular mounds of soil.

THE garden shown in the illustrations is a rare and beautiful bit of garden architecture and artistry, yet it is developed and constructed along a simple and easily workable plan. Any part of it would make a graceful addition to a rural garden.

The ground chosen lay between two natural bluffs which formed a little dell. This was well shaded on either side with pines, maples and elms, and sloped slightly to the south, broadening into a piece of flat lawn area.

In the little grotto dwarf plants and vines decorate the rock benches and table roughly fashioned of four stones. In the table crevices they make a delightfully unique and perpetual floral decoration

An irregular ditch lined with rough stones forms the channel of the artificial stream

Before operations on the rock garden were started there were natural projections of rock formation on the banks of the little bluffs. About these it was simple to add additional, but smaller, rocks. However, in those places where no natural rock formation aided the course of construction, irregular and low mounds of earth were added, about which it was necessary to set broken pieces of rock, leaving always, of course, little spaces and crevices for planting. Such little rockeries were continued along either side of the little dell.

At the lower end of the shaded slope, where it broadened into a lovely patch of lawn, a huge pile of soil and rocks was developed in much the same manner into a flowery mound. This not only constitutes the central rockery, appropriately topped with a bronze sun-dial, but is a camouflage for a little electric rotary pump and a deep cement basin of water. Except for a small aperture on the rear side of the rock pile, these are both entirely hidden from view in a cave-like opening. The purpose of the pump is to elevate the water in the basin to a rock-edged pool at the upper end of the garden slope. The overflow from this refreshing mirror pool bubbles merrily down in a lively stream to the lower part of the garden, where it disappears under the huge rock pile back again into the cement basin, ready to be used over again.

To keep the little overflow stream from becoming too unruly, it was necessary to build a channel for its course. This was done by digging a somewhat square, irregular ditch, not more than a foot deep and two feet wide at its widest point It was then given a lining or coating of ordinary cement, into which were placed—both in the bottom and along the sides—pieces of broken rock and small stones. The charm of this artificial stream lies in the careless manner in which the stones are grouted into the cement.

Moss, lichens, flowers and vines have now covered the sides and linked the rock edges of the brook with the surrounding bank. At one side of the brook, starting at the base of the large rockery, is a paving-stone pathway. This crosses and recrosses the stream until it reaches the pool and little tea-house at the top of the slope, where it broadens into open, unplanted spaces. Between each irregularly shaped flat paving-stone white clover and grass seed were generously planted, and now each stone lies in a soft, downy bed of green.

THE pool at the top of the slope, which reflects the trees and little house, was constructed in much the same manner as the bed of the artificial stream, with the exception that it was dug deeper, and is about forty feet long and fifteen feet wide. Close to the edge of the pool, so that their leaves overhang, is an assortment of ferns, laurel and evergreen shrubs mingled with Japanese maples and Evonymus alatus, the latter injecting a seasonal color effect that is so much desired in rock gardens.

Perhaps one of the most interesting features of this garden is a small stone table built in the center of a semicircular alcove. The thick base of the table was constructed by standing three or four pieces of tuffa rock, about two feet in height, upright in a bed of cement. The round top was fashioned by crudely chiseling four paving-stones into pie-shaped pieces and putting them together in the cement. These four table-top pieces were adjusted so as to leave deep crevices between the four pieces of flat stone from which are growing Sempervivum house-leek, Thymus sedums mosses and other dwarf plants, which make a perpetual and unique floral table decoration.

They who have not seen a rock garden in its Spring or early Summer glory have missed a lovely sight, but should not feel that it is beyond their attainment. Time, imagination and patience are the only requirements.

Soft overhanging foliage surrounds the little tea-room and is mirrored in the quiet water of the pool

THE NEW IN NEW YORK

BY EVELYN DODGE

MY SUBJECT this morning, dear friends, I know you will find delightful. My text is "How you can reduce your hips three inches in three minutes without diet, drugs or exercise and still eat your way through June without giving up strawberry shortcake, asparagus and any of the other pleasures of the season."

Everyone to-day wants to look slender and reducing is a subject of greater interest than operations and the extinct servant girl. According to fashion and science, women are rapidly becoming a disappearing sex. The boyish figure sans bust and curves and waistline is the ideal silhouette.

I can't tell you how you can become slender, but I can show you very easily how you can look several inches slighter and thirty or forty pounds lighter than you do now. Almost any woman can reduce her actual measurements appreciably by proper corseting, proper lingerie and the proper size clothes. Old shapeless corsets with bent and bulging bones, too much lingerie cut on too wide lines and made of clumsy materials, clothes that are too large, too long and too wide for the present fashion will make a mountain out of any potential feminine molehill.

THE CORSET AND THE CORSELET

A FEW years ago during the vogue of the sweater with its concealing lines, women took off corsets, drew a long breath and let their figures go. Some of the results were good, others were bad. The large waist with the resulting lowering of the bust and straightening of the hip has a youthful air. But the diaphragm bulge, the middle-aged spread, the very pronounced increase in weight, have proved ugly and stubborn. Many women who have tried going without corsets are now wearing them again—not to make their waists smaller, but to flatten the abdomen and lower back.

Most young girls and practically all women need some sort of figure control. If they don't need it as a corrective, they need it as a preventative of the figure defects that come upon us so rapidly as a result of the motor, the bridge table and the increase in office and executive work among women. Not all women need corsets. Women with young slender figures find that the corselet, which is a combination brassière and hip-confiner, is sufficient. It is unboned and is therefore as soft and flexible as the natural figure. It keeps the figure straight without making it rigid. It is made of soft light fabrics such as brassière material, broché coutil and fine washable satin and has elastic gores to fit in at the hip. You can either buy or make your corselet. It is very easily made, and if the figure is large or small at one point or another the corselet can easily be fitted when it is being made. These corselets have been enormously successful for several reasons—their excellent lines, their inexpensiveness, and the fact that they can be washed as easily and as often as any other piece of lingerie. They are supple enough for sports and dancing and their unbroken lines are perfect under the light fabrics of evening gowns.

For the figure that needs a firmer hold than the corselet gives there is the corset. For average figures it is almost as light and boneless as the corselet. It is made of soft brochés and satins, usually in flesh pink, and is almost always combined with elastic gores. The firmer material is used at the front and back and is sometimes reënforced at those points to flatten the abdomen and the back. It is always wide in the waist, practically topless and not very long, more a hip-confiner than a corset. The brassière takes care of the upper part of the figure.

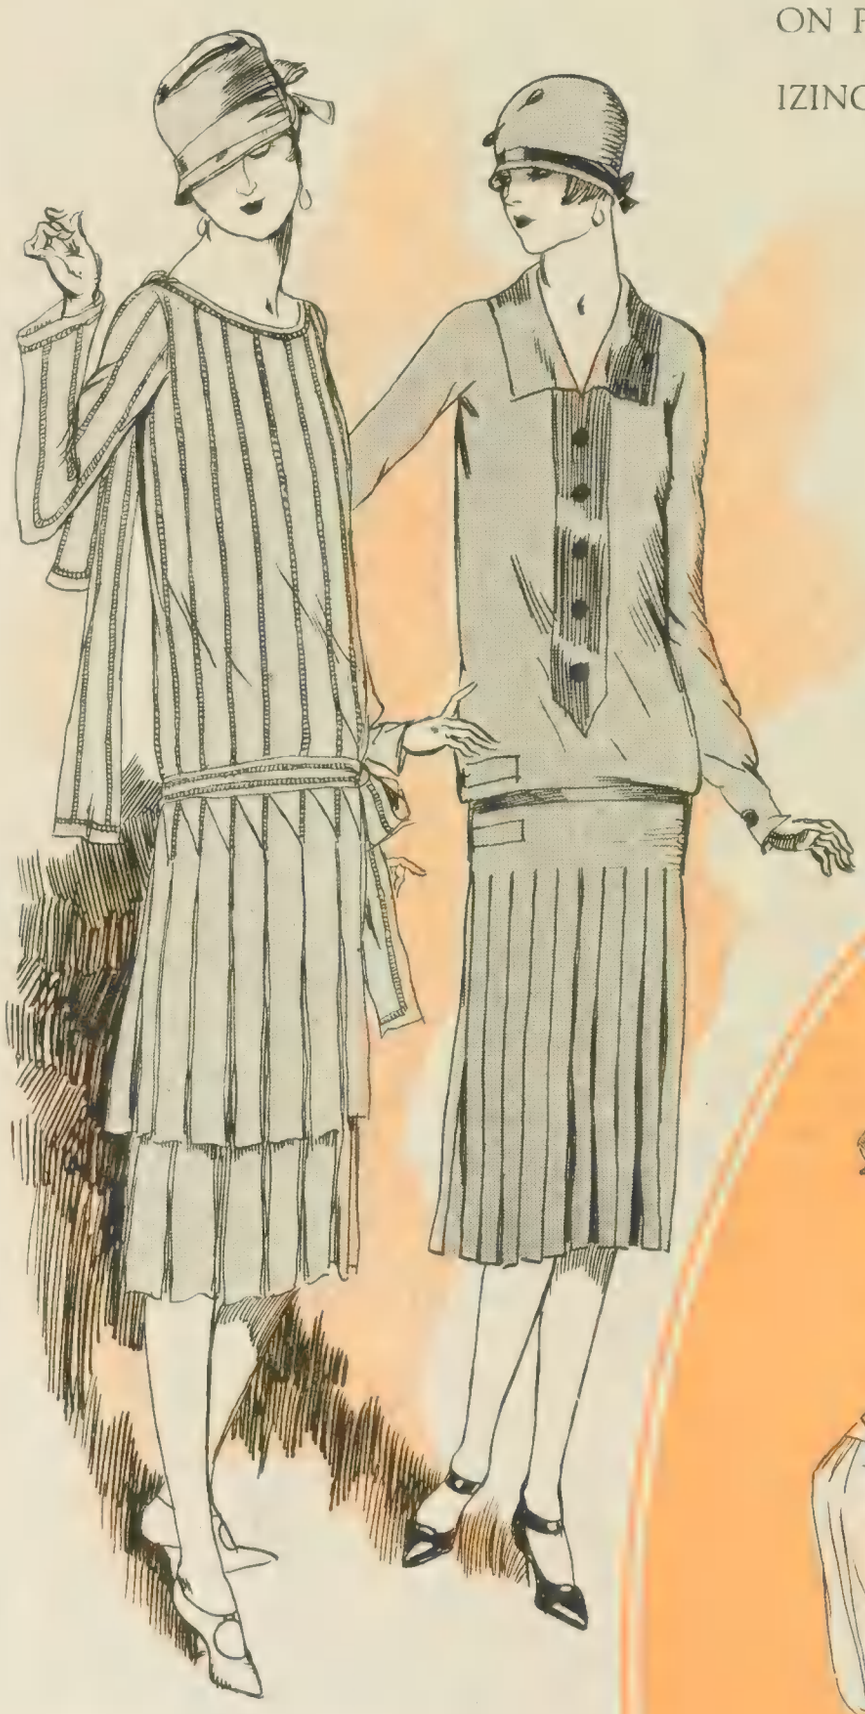
For the figure that is heavier and more mature the corset becomes heavier with heavier material, more bones and more bust and with lacings. The laced corset should always be put on with the laces loosened. After it is clasped it should be drawn down in back, up in front, and the garters should be fastened. It should then be laced and tied. It is slack corsets and bent corset bones that make many women look larger than they really are.

LINES AND ELIMINATION IN LINGERIE

THE second step in reducing is to leave off about two-thirds of your lingerie and cut down what's left to the present fashionable straight line. There are still women in the world who wear two petticoats and a chemise instead of a single slip with a shadow-proof hem; who wear drawers drawn up on a string around the waist and make their lingerie of good strong muslin or heavy sateen on wide billowy lines. I have actually seen women reduce their hip measure three inches instantaneously by putting on proper corsets and the right lingerie.

No one to-day needs either a petticoat or a slip under a cloth frock or tailored skirt. A very short chemise cut on narrow lines and made of a bodyless material such as crêpe de Chine, radium silk, crêpe satin, glove silk, fine nainsook or long-cloth is all one needs to protect the brassière or corselet. As to your nether limbs, bloomers, preferably of glove silk if you're stout, answer every practical need and don't add an eighth of an inch to your circumference. Under light-weight or transparent frocks all you need are the glove silk bloomers and a slip of crêpe de Chine, soft satin, crêpe meteor, radium silk or fine sateen. See that the slip is cut on narrow lines to give the straight silhouette and with no more width than you actually require.

French women of fashion always have their lingerie made to order for them by their dressmakers and fitted as carefully as their frocks. Women who want to reduce their size should follow the same plan, making their lingerie themselves so that they can fit it properly and see that it doesn't carry an unnecessary inch of material. And the material, as I have already said, should never be heavy, clumsy and thick. You can save enough by cutting your lingerie on narrow lines to use good materials in soft, clinging qualities.



THE LAST INCH

THE last inch that can be removed will come off with the right size and the right fit in your clothes. Large women usually fall into one of two errors. Either they wear their clothes so tight that they look as if they were about to burst out upon an astonished world or else they wear them so large that their size is increased. Clothes should be skilfully planned to hide curves and to straighten and lengthen lines, and a good deal of their success in this respect lies in having them exactly the right size. When you buy a pattern, be sure to have your measures taken over your new corsets and lingerie. You will be delightfully surprised, especially if you have been buying your clothes ready made. Most manufacturers cut their clothes on very scanty lines in order to save material. As a result you have probably been buying sizes forty-four and forty-six when you only measure forty or forty-two. The sizes of good patterns are absolutely exact. A forty fits a forty, and if you bought a forty-four as you do in ready made clothes it would simply drape on you. The right size is most important because it takes less material, cuts out all the work of unnecessary alterations and gives you a smart trim figure.

NOW there you have the three undietary laws that will bring down your figure by as many inches. You might add a fourth rule and take off a fourth inch. Choose your styles and materials with care. If you're large and want to disguise the awful truth don't wear large hats, large plaids, bold zebraic stripes and vivid colors. Don't choose crosswise stripes, crosswise designs or tiers. Wear long sleeves that don't fit the arm too closely, V necks, surplice lines, draperies and panels that break the line from side to side and carry the eye up and down instead of across.

Remember that half the slender women you see are of no mean weight on the bathroom scales and it's not the way you weigh but the way you look that counts.

SOULIÉ'S SKETCHES SENT FROM THE BUTTERICK PARIS SHOP SHOW THE NEW PLAY ON PLAITS AND FULNESS CHARACTERIZING MANY OF THE SUMMER MODES

Gabrielle Chanel never employed the umbrella-case sheath, and her frocks keep consistently to a soft and gracious silhouette that varies more in detail than in line. For the frock at the left she uses wine-red chiffon with lines of openwork and with box plaits in the double skirt

Jeanne Lanvin makes la robe sportive of red crêpe trimmed with black buttons at the prevailing shirt closing. What appear to be fine box plaits in the lower part are in reality ribbon-like pieces of the red crêpe falling free over a black skirt

Agnès (Mme. Havet) uses white crêpe printed in black and green and trimmed with green ribbons and plaited organdy frills. The long sleeve has a full lower part gathered in at the wrist, and there is a slight suggestion of a blouse in the body

Premet makes one wonder why we ever wore black and somber colors by offering a jumper frock of lilac kasha bound and collared with peony-red crêpe. The pockets are of perforated red suède and the scarf is of the peony-red crêpe to match the collar

Soeur Anne belongs to a worldly order judging from her delightful habit of navy-blue serge, bound and faced with blue satin, and with a double collar, cuffs and jabot of candy-pink organdy bound with cherry red. The overlapping tiers are interesting. From Premet

PATOU RAISES THE WAISTLINE, MOLYNEUX OFFERS A FLARED COAT, AND LELONG TURNS TO BLACK FOR AN ENSEMBLE AND A DINNER FROCK

Molyneux looks to Persia for the lines, color and fabric of a coat which might be used for formal afternoon or evening wear. It has the new front flare and is made of Persian brocade with green, orange and gold designs on a black-satin ground

Lucien Lelong uses black alpaca and white piqué for a Summer ensemble costume stitched in white and trimmed with white buttons. The small black and white hat carries on the ensemble effect and the tie is black-and-white plaid silk. The white collar is new

Frills of black lace overrun the soft skirt of a black chiffon frock, while a band of the same lace is veiled by the bodice. With this frock is worn a coat of black satin, collared in ermine. From Lucien Lelong

Patou's justly famous waistline appears in its new elevation in a frock with a bodice and skirt of rose-colored taffeta, veiled with tulle and trimmed with gold lace. The higher waistline curves in at the sides and is considered the most important new note of the year

Patou fits a frock of black chiffon and lace to indicate his new higher waistline and trims it with cascade frills at the front and sides. The higher waistline makes a fairer division of the figure with the very short skirt

THE vogue of the front flare, so suddenly successful with frocks, casts about for other styles to conquer and falls upon the Summer coat. Temperamental fashion, while putting width in the skirt on one hand, takes it away from the shoulders on the other, giving to a new coat a slim shoulder line. The slender silhouette, however, is not seriously affected by the new flare, even though exaggerated charmingly by a border of ruching or fur, for it ripples at the front only. In back the figure is as straight and slim as ever.

Dresses, also, cling to the becoming slender line, but allow themselves width in the swirl of inserted godets. A narrow sleeveless overdress slashes its skirt for the double purpose of showing its lovely printed dress beneath and of obtaining a little freedom in its slender lines. The tunic blouse, remaining narrow, almost covers a costume slip which hides its width in an inverted plait.

The jabot, confident of favoritism, intends to go as far as it likes on Summer frocks. It may stop at the throat or any point south, but the hem is the limit at present.

The new prints and borders find the tunic blouse as smart a medium for presenting themselves to the public as the frock. The plain contrasting material of the slip beneath and of the trimming bands and jabot emphasizes the colors in the print. The peasant styles also look with favor on the tunic blouse as an effective way to display their graceful sleeves and colorful embroideries.

6152—If a straight narrow back is unbecoming to you, choose this slip-over dress with a one-piece front and fulness in a straight skirt attached across the back. Use prints or stripes in heavy crêpe de Chine or silk crêpe with plain to match, or flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine or crêpe faille of one material or with contrasting.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 39-inch printed silk. Lower edge 54½ inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 52 bust.

6134—5952—A square-neck frock, with collar and cuffs that may be detachable, fits at the hipline closely and has a straight lower edge Use heavy silk crêpe or ribbed silk with satin, heavy satin with silk crêpe, wool crêpe, plain, striped or plaid flannel, etc., for this slip-over one-piece dress. The faille silk, etc., hat has a six-gored crown.

36 bust and 22-inch head measure require 3¾ yards 27-inch flannel for dress, ½ yard 35-inch silk for hat. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses; hat for ladies, misses and girls.

6112—Tucks make their own crosswise design on a one-piece frock of plain Georgette, plain crêpe de Chine or plain chiffon voile. The smart double jabot and round collar may be in a contrasting color of the same material. This tucked dress slips on over the head and it may have a long sleeve. Lower edge 46½ inches.

36 bust requires 4⅛ yards 39-inch Georgette (cut crosswise and pieced under tucks).

The dress is attractive for ladies 33 to 42 bust, also misses.

6142—The long surplice line distinguishes this dress with its straight skirt attached to a long body. Make it of printed or plaid light-weight cotton crêpe, gingham, prints in cotton broadcloth and heavy crêpe de Chine, with plain to match and with Val. lace frills. Or use light-weight cotton crêpe, silk or cotton broadcloth, or heavy crêpe de Chine, striped with plain or plain with contrasting, etc. Lower edge 1½ yard.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

6160—The newest of the new styles is the circular flounce in a fancy outline across the front of a slip-over one-piece frock close fitting at the hipline. Use crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma or Georgette, of one material with Venise edging and insertion, or with contrasting; Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe satin or flat crêpe with contrasting; Georgette, prints in crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, etc.

36 bust requires 3 yards 40-inch crêpe satin. Lower edge 44 inches.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6154—One unbroken length of 40-inch material without underarm seams makes the dress part of this slip-over one-piece frock, in certain sizes, when a contrasting material makes the vest front and jabot. Use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin or crêpe faille with printed crêpe de Chine, etc. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge 46 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6168 — 10208 — Decidedly new is a gathered straight skirt attached to a long body. Embroidery trims this slip-over dress. Work in color. Use crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma, Georgette or crêpe satin; or prints in cotton voile or fine cotton crêpe, with organdy collar, etc.; prints in crêpe de Chine, Georgette, etc., with plain to match. Lower edge 1⅞ yard.

16 years needs 2¾ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is attractive for misses 15 to 20 years.

6167—6089—The long French jabot is satisfyingly smart on a one-piece slip-over dress with gathers at the sides. Use crêpe de Chine, Georgette, silk crêpe, pongee, cotton voile or fine cotton crêpe—printed with plain to match, or plain with contrasting; without the jabot use cotton broadcloth, cotton pongee, etc. The lower edge is straight. Make the six-gored crown hat of plain cotton poplin, cotton homespun, shantung, etc.

12 years and 21¼-inch head measure require 2⅛ yards 39-inch printed crêpe, and ¾ yard 39-inch plain crêpe for dress; ½ yard 32-inch silk for hat.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years; hat for girls 2 to 12.

6151—Flowerlike, the attached petals of this frock lap softly one over the other. The fabric flowers at the waistline are hand-made, and made very easily. This one-piece dress slips on over the head and is delightful in thin materials such as Georgette, chiffon voile, chiffon, crêpe Roma or crêpe de Chine. With taffeta or satin make the flowers, leaves and petals of Georgette or chiffon. Or use printed Georgette, printed chiffon voile, etc.

17 years requires 5⅛ yards 40-inch Georgette. Lower edge 41½ inches.

The dress is lovely for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

6088—The popular blouse ensemble or jumper dress is excellent for the new stripes in heavy crêpe de Chine, radium or flannel matched with plain; or—except for the plain tab, etc.—make it entirely of striped silk broadcloth, heavy crêpe de Chine, pongee or radium, etc.; or wool jersey, plain flannel, etc. It consists of a slip-over blouse with a straight lower edge and a straight skirt with a center front inverted plait attached to a camisole body.

17 years requires 1⅜ yard 32 or 35 inch novelty material (cut crosswise) and 2 yards 32-inch plain. Lower edge with plait drawn out 51 inches.

The blouse ensemble is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

6166—The contrasting ribbon and jabot are arresting features of a slip-over one-piece dress with inverted tucks at the sides and a straight lower edge. Use wide borders in crêpe satin, silk crêpe or crêpe de Chine, with plain to match; or flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe Roma, crêpe satin, crêpe de Chine, etc. Lower edge 45 inches.

16 years requires 1½ yard 54-inch bordered crêpe and ½ yard 44-inch plain.

It is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

6165—10283—Tucked and frilled, a simple dress seems to suggest parties. Embroidery trims the yoke. Work in one-stitch. It slips on over the head and the lower edge is straight. Make it of Georgette, crêpe de Chine, cotton Georgette, fine cotton crêpe, cotton voile or batiste with Val. lace frills; or printed small designs in Georgette, crêpe de Chine, cotton voile, cotton Georgette or fine cotton crêpe, or pin-dot swiss or pin-dot voile, with plain to match.

7 years requires 1⅞ yard 39-inch cotton voile.

The dress is adorable for girls 6 to 10 years.

6141—For afternoons the collar turns its back on a slip-over dress and ties itself behind. For evenings the armhole is cut down. The dress closes at the left underarm, and the two-piece circular skirt is attached to the basque, slightly below the normal waistline. Use Georgette, crêpe Roma, crêpe de Chine, taffeta, satin, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe or pompadour taffeta with hand-made ribbon flowers; or prints in Georgette, crêpe de Chine, etc.

17 years or 34 bust requires 3¼ yards 39-inch crêpe faille (cut crosswise to avoid piecing). Lower edge 3¼ yards.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, small women and ladies 38, 40 bust.

6147—A flowered gown of Georgette makes a lovely dance frock. Or make it of flat crêpe, crêpe faille, Canton crêpe, crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin, crêpe Roma or taffeta with hand-made flowers to harmonize; or printed crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, satin, Georgette, novelty crêpe satin or pompadour taffeta, etc. It slips on over the head and the two-piece circular skirt is attached at the hipline. Lower edge 2⅞ yards.

17 years requires 2⅝ yards 39-inch flowered Georgette.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

"I've never seen such fine vegetables used for making soup!"

The soup when you're hungry!

Sometimes we are asked why we insist on using such perfect vegetables for soup-making. It takes the best vegetables to make such good vegetable soup as Campbell's!

So we spare no effort, we search the world's markets, we maintain our own great farms—all to put into our soup unusually fine vegetables.

Thirty-two ingredients in one hearty soup! As much a meal as a soup, many people think!

I ride 'em rough for I am tough
You ought to feel my muscle.
The soup inside gives me my stride
My vigor, pep and hustle!

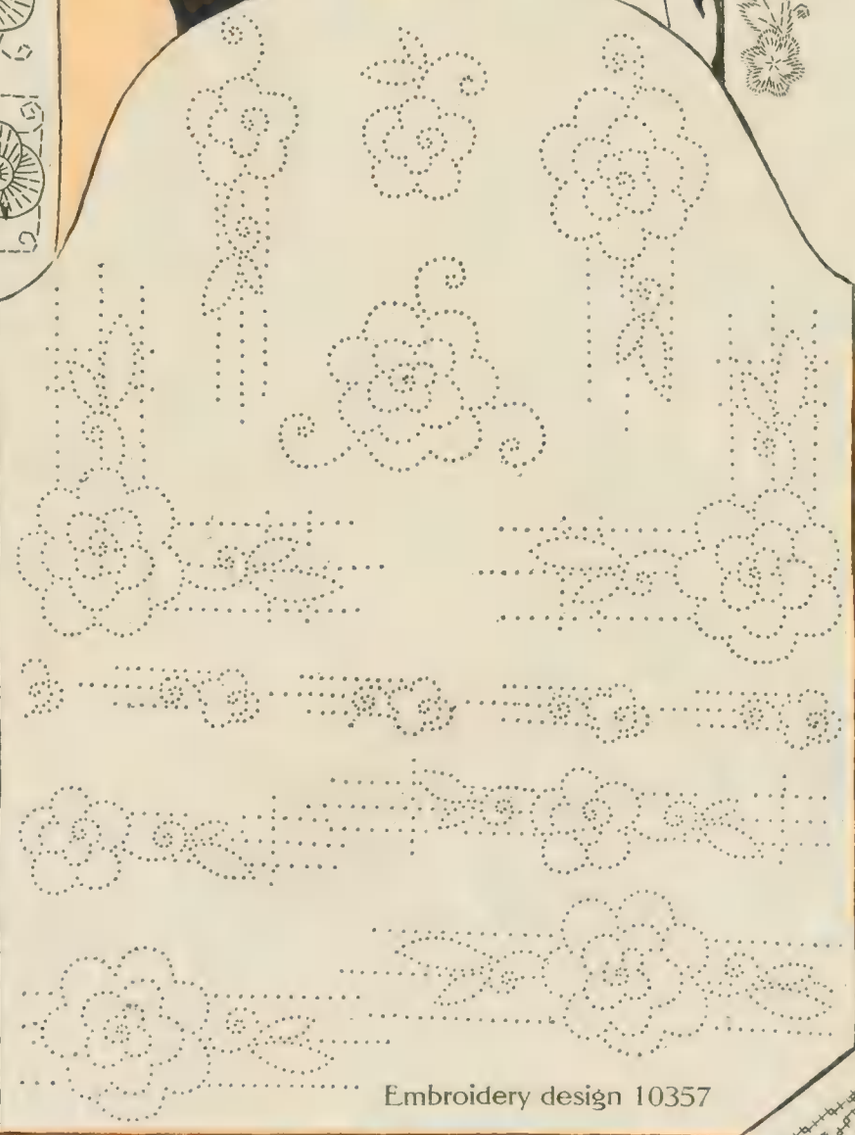
EMBROIDERY SENDS LOVELY FLOWERS TO SUMMER CLOTHES AND LINENS



Embroidery design 10356

10356—These striped flowers are worked in a combination of one-stitch and outline embroidery, and are used on dresses, blouses, coats, hats, etc. The design can be adapted to 2⅝ yards each of banding 1¼ inch, 3 inches and 4¾ inches wide, three motifs 3 by 13¼ inches, three motifs 10¼ by 12½ inches, six motifs 3½ by 5¼ inches, six corners 6¼ by 11 inches and three motifs 4¾ by 7 inches.

10355—With the magic of embroidery the needlewoman changes a simple frock into an elaborate one by hanging an enchanting wreath around the neck outline of a collarless frock. Then she brings the two dangling ends down to trim the bodice, and puts a bit of banding at the sleeve edge and a motif on a pocket. This design is to be worked in one-stitch and used for dresses, blouses, coat, hats, etc. It can be adapted to 2⅝ yards of banding 7¼ inches wide, 2½ yards of banding 2¼ inches wide, three neck outlines and twenty-four motifs in four assorted designs.

10358—One-stitch and cross-stitch combine to embroider this design—one-stitch claiming the flowers and cross-stitch the straight lines, spirals, etc. This is an interesting design for the new peasant styles. It can be used on dresses, hats, scarfs, etc. It also makes very lovely household linens. It can be adapted to 1⅝ yard each of banding 3¾ inches wide, 2½ inches wide and 1½ inch wide, and eighteen motifs in five assorted designs and sizes.

Butterick Patterns with the Deltor Picture Instructions for Cutting, Putting Together and Finishing may be purchased at leading stores throughout the world, at prices given on page 76.

BEAUTIFUL EMBROIDERIES IN CUT-WORK, LAZY-DAISY, OUTLINING, ETC., TO WHILE AWAY THE SUMMER AFTERNOON

Embroidery design 10359

10359—For house dresses or aprons one looks for a large design which, with few stitches and very little work, will give a decorative touch or a color contrast. This one answers the purpose admirably, and it can also be used for underwear, household linens, etc. Embroider it in a combination of one-stitch, lazy-daisy and French knots which work up very rapidly. Interesting harmonizing effects can be obtained on the solid colors of linen, chambray, etc. Varicolored daisies with black stems and green leaves are very nice on blue or gray. Brown, orange and yellow are charming on tan, or black and green on yellow. It can be adapted to fifty-four motifs in sixteen assorted sizes and designs.

Embroidery design 10354

Embroidery design 10353

10353—The moon rises above Fugiyama, lantern men guard the temple gates or Tori before the Shinto shrines, sampans head up-stream or drift under bamboo bridges, tiny temples sleep in the shade of spiky pines and lanterns are strung from branch to branch in a design that makes a quaint decoration for household linens. These figures also make interesting motifs for hats, scarfs, etc. The motif above was worked in black on a bit of green linen with a yellow lantern and pink and blue flowers. Black on cherry color is very effective. Work this design in a combination of one-stitch, outline-stitch and French-knot embroidery. It can be adapted to 1¾ yard of 4-inch banding, two motifs 9½ by 16 inches, two motifs 6 by 7½ inches, two motifs 4½ by 7½ inches and thirty-four assorted motifs.

"Suffering from habitual constipation and weak from a recent operation, it was impossible for me to continue my social duties and club work. So despondent did I become that I dropped out of everything. I felt fagged in the morning and was nervous and irritable. I knew I was a bore to everyone, self included. Finally our family physician prescribed yeast. In three days I noticed an improvement, while in three months' time with stomach trouble removed, habitual constipation conquered, vitality restored, I felt like a new person. I have now resumed all social and club activities—singing the praises of Fleischmann's Yeast."

Mrs. D. H. Webb, Anderson, S. C.

What Everybody Knows

The danger of clogged intestines
The evils of digestive troubles and disfiguring skin eruptions
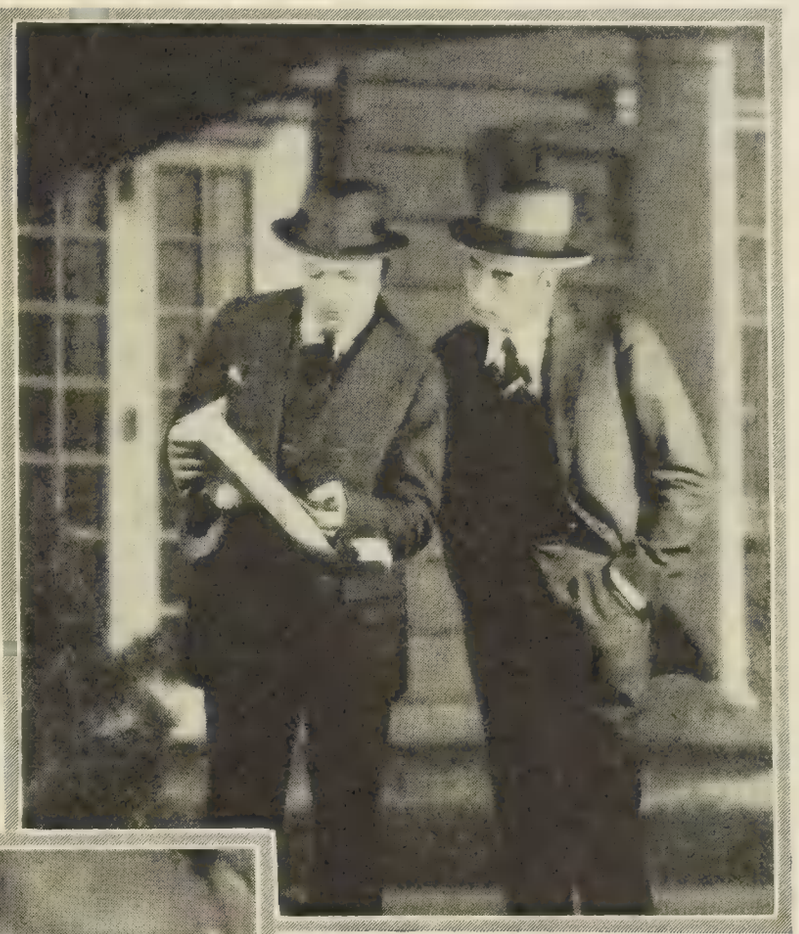
The tragedy of lowered vitality

"After I gave birth to my child, I felt very much 'run down.' I lost weight, was very anemic; food would nauseate me, had constant trouble with my stomach, and what troubled me most—I suffered from terrible sties. I tried all kinds of remedies. I finally went to an eye specialist. He prescribed Fleischmann's Yeast—three cakes a day. I am mighty grateful to Dr. S. After two months there wasn't a trace left of the sties. My complexion improved wonderfully. I no longer sit down at the table with an aversion for food. In spite of all the ups and downs in life, I manage to keep and look young with the help of Fleischmann's Yeast."



Mrs. Sarah Steinhardt, New York City

NOT a "cure-all," not a medicine in any sense—Fleischmann's Yeast is simply a remarkable fresh food.

The millions of tiny active yeast plants in every cake invigorate the whole system. They aid digestion—clear the skin—banish the poisons of constipation. Where cathartics give only temporary relief, yeast strengthens the intestinal muscles and makes them healthy and active. And day by day it releases new stores of energy.

All grocers have Fleischmann's Yeast. Start eating it today! And let us send you a free copy of our latest booklet on Yeast for Health. Health Research Dept. C-18, The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington Street, New York City.

"Our eight-year-old girl would lose four or five weeks of school work, besides being incapacitated while she was in school from attacks of stomach trouble. We tried many remedies with only temporary relief. I decided to give Fleischmann's Yeast a trial. I began with half a cake mixed with peanut butter on bread, and then as I found that the yeast was going to succeed, I served it in many different ways. My child has never had another attack of stomach trouble since I gave her yeast."

"Invalided from Royal Navy with chronic constipation. Went to India. . . . Advised to try Canada. Was just able to get into army, but after 2½ years in trenches, returned to Canada totally unfit and pensioned. In 1919 I gave Fleischmann's Yeast a fair trial, thank God. Six months afterward I passed for life insurance and my pension stopped. I am now absolutely fit and never need a laxative; and this is after over 20 years of suffering."

Herbert J. Parrott, Calgary, Alta.

"I am in the real estate business; built up a hustling organization; kept the force always keyed up, watchful of every opportunity. The high pressure undoubtedly did its work; the reaction set in, and I found myself slowing up. I needed something to restore the old vitality—the old punch.

"At last I hit upon Fleischmann's Yeast. Truly the result was marvelous: the mid-afternoon fag disappeared; I was again keen and alert; my color took on a clear and healthful glow, an out-of-doors look; and I was again the leader of my organization—thanks to Fleischmann's Yeast."

James F. Brown, Allentown, Pa.

This famous food tones up the entire system—banishes constipation, skin troubles, stomach disorders.

Eat 2 or 3 cakes a day before meals: on crackers—in fruit juices or milk—or just plain. For constipation especially, dissolve one cake in hot water (not scalding) night and morning. Buy several cakes at a time—they will keep fresh in a cool dry place for two or three days.

Gloriously Clear Teeth

Why you may already have them—and yet not realize it

Make this unique test. Find out what beauty is beneath the dingy film that clouds your teeth

DO you seriously want dazzlingly clear teeth?—teeth that add immeasurably to your personality and attractiveness?

You can have them, if you wish. That's been proved times without number. But not by continuing with old methods of cleansing and of brushing.

Modern science has discovered a new way. A radically different principle from old ways; and based on latest scientific findings. This offers you a test, free. Simply mail the coupon.

How to gain them—quickly

There's a film on your teeth. Run your tongue across your teeth and you can feel it. Beneath it are the pretty teeth you envy in others. Ordinary methods won't successfully remove it.

That is why this test is offered. For when you remove that film, you'll be surprised at what you find. You may actually have beautiful teeth already —and yet not realize it. Find out!

What that film is

Most tooth troubles now are traced to film. It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. Germs by the millions breed in it. And they, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea and decay.

That film, too, absorbs stains . . . stains from food, from smoking, from various causes. And that is why your teeth look "off color."

New methods now remove it

Old-time dentrifices could not successfully fight that film. So most people had dingy teeth. And tooth troubles increased alarmingly.

Now new methods have been found. And embodied in a new type tooth paste called Pepsodent.

It acts to curdle the film, then harmlessly to remove it. No soap, no chalk; no harsh grit dangerous to enamel.

It proves the folly of ugly teeth. It gives better protection against pyorrhea, of tooth troubles both in adults and in children.

Ten days' use will prove its benefits. And that 10 days is offered to you as a test. Why not make it then —have prettier teeth, whiter teeth? Send the coupon now.

HOW TO BE A PERFECT HOSTESS

By Ann Ogden

"STOP AT THE SCARRED BOUGH"

Mysterious directions on an old pirate's map—the long search for hidden treasure—thrills galore for your guests when they start "The Treasure Hunt!"

A few cars, a bright afternoon or evening, and a picnic lunch are the ingredients. Then use your imagination, with THE DELINEATOR'S description of "The Treasure Hunt," and there won't be a bored guest in your midst.

Send a two-cent stamp for postage to THE DELINEATOR'S Party Editor, Margaret Campion, and ask for this leaflet. We have scores of other parties, too—children's, grown-ups', birthday, and "special-occasion" parties for every season. Miss Campion is always glad to help you with your entertainment problems if you write to her, care of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage

"VISITING just wears me out," we heard a woman say the other day. We had heard other women make similar remarks and had heard many a tired hostess sigh with relief after a guest had departed.

For we moderns put too much effort into our entertaining. The weary traveler has hardly crossed our threshold before we pounce upon her with plans innumerable for her pleasure, and in our eagerness we are apt to forget the little thoughtful, comfort-giving details.

Yet there are three things which will add to the comfort of the guest in our home that even the poorest of us can afford.

First of all, let us give our friend a comfortable place to sleep. This means that the bed should be the best we can offer, soft, neatly made, with the sheets pulled tight, and with a plentiful supply of warm blankets in cold weather.

Our guest will also enjoy the opportunity of meeting the people she wants to meet. Many a woman makes the mistake of having a large tea a day or two after her friend has arrived and so "gets every one out of the way at once." This helter-skelter entertaining is far from satisfactory for the stranger. Most of the people present at a large reception mean nothing to her, while seeing a few people more intimately may afford her much pleasure. But the most-often-forgotten fundamental of entertaining is—to let the guest alone. That is, allow her some privacy. The true hostess does not shadow her guest with the relentless zeal of an amateur detective.

No matter how small the house, some time or other it is sure to have a guest—expected or unexpected. For such, the hospitality-chest is a boon. And what should you put in the hospitality-chest? A nightgown is perhaps the most important article; also an extra pair of pajamas for your men guests.

In addition keep two sets of straw sandals, which are inexpensive, very durable and take up little space.

If your home is near the seashore, or where there is swimming, you will need one or maybe two extra bathing-suits, since those are necessities which the guest frequently fails to bring.

Then there is the tooth-brush. Have one or two new ones always on hand. You can buy inexpensive tooth-brushes specially made for the use of the casual guest.

What other comfort shall you store away in this magic chest? Some good soap, cold-cream, talcum powder, face-powder and a bowl of cut cotton puffs with which to fluff it on, are almost indispensable. Think of what it means for the dusty motorist who has "dropped in" on you to find these small comforts all ready for her use.

If you want to be very popular with your husband's friends and the boys that your son brings home from college, keep an assortment of collars in one corner of your hospitality-drawer. Also have some shaving-soap and a razor, an extra collar-button or two and, if possible, a set of studs.

A writing-portfolio is a great convenience, too. If you haven't such a case, you can easily make one out of cretonne or some other inexpensive material. In it keep writing-paper, post-cards, telegraph blanks, envelopes, stamps, two or three sharpened pencils, a pen, ink and an eraser.

Then there is always the problem of the bathroom. It takes tact and forethought on the part of the housewife if there is but one bathroom in her home. Of course your guest should be given the time which is most convenient for her, even at the risk of upsetting the tubbing time of the other members of the family. In general, however, in the morning she will not want to go in until your husband and children have finished. But make sure that the bathroom is tidy and that there are plenty of towels on hand when her turn comes.

And there are many other little details that you can supply for your friend's comfort. A new magazine, an interesting book, a glass of water on the bedside table, flowers attractively arranged, or a bowl of apples are

So fairy-like and alluring it makes a game of breakfast!

A NEW IDEA IN CHILD FEEDING

Are you still telling your children "eat this, it is good for you"? Please stop—it's so much better to give them the food they need in a form they love! Thousands of mothers are learning the wisdom of this modern idea in child feeding. Try it . . . what happens will amaze you.

QUAKER PUFFED WHEAT is rich grain food with all the allure of a confection . . . a temptation no child can resist.

Different from any other cereal, it supplies the great adventure of variety in the morning menu.

Every grain is steam exploded to 8 times its normal size . . . food cells broken to make digestion easy.

The flavor is like nutmeats . . . crisp and crunchy morsels that entice the most indifferent appetite.

Test cases prove that almost 90% of children who ordinarily rebel at cereal dishes welcome this food with delight.

Serve with milk or cream, or in bowls of half and half.

That supplies cereal nutrition, vital food elements and the vitamines in tempting combination.

Try as a bed-time dish with milk or cream, or as a special treat with fresh or cooked fruit.

Try as a between-meal tid-bit to supplant too many sweets. Serve every day in as many ways as you can. Energy food . . . needed food . . . yet attractive!

sure to be appreciated. It is these little thoughtful things that say, "Welcome, dear friend," most sincerely.

There is nothing more annoying than being obliged to hang up your best frock on a hook. So be sure to have plenty of coat-hangers in the guest-room closet. Shoe-trees, also, should be kept there.

Why not serve your guest breakfast in bed? This arrangement allows you time to attend to your usual morning routine, and reduces the rush and confusion and increases the comfort and ease of every one concerned.

Ask your guest the night before what she would like for breakfast.

As most people eat a very simple meal, fruit, coffee, toast or rolls with marmalade or jam are quite suitable if she expresses no preference. Tap on her door a few moments before breakfast is ready, then carry the tray up-stairs yourself or let your oldest daughter do the honors. If you have a maid, she should carry up the tray.

Many people drink a cup of hot water before breakfast. It is no trouble for the hostess to provide this, but the guest often hesitates to ask for the favor. So why not inquire of your friend if she follows this practise and act accordingly? And another thing, try to keep your house as quiet as possible in the morning when she is resting.

Let your guest have some hours of privacy in her room, with a comfortable chair and a good reading-lamp

Misunderstandings occur oftentimes because an invitation is not definitely worded. When you invite your guest, specify clearly the time and extent of the visit. If the invitation is for the week-end, for example, say: "Come for the week-end of the third. We'll expect you on Friday for lunch, and hope that you can stay till Monday." If you are asking a friend to visit you for a week, say a week or from such a date to such a date. This plan eliminates uncertainty on the part of both hostess and guest.

As soon as your guest has had time to rest and unpack, tell her any plans that you have made for her. Find out if there is anything special that she wants to do, any old friends she would like to call upon, any acquaintances that she would like to add to the people you are entertaining for her. Hostesses sometimes forget these courtesies and it is difficult for the guest to make the suggestions.

If you have children and young people are visiting in your home, their entertainment will take care of itself. But if you have no children you will have to give the matter some thought. Include any friends they may have in the town in your plans for their amusement, and see that they meet the children—if they are near of age—of your friends. If a young man is taking a young girl who is visiting you to a dance or to a theater party, it is a very gracious thing for you to invite him to dinner on that evening, although it is not necessary to do this Deliver all mail, telephone messages or telegrams to your guest immediately. These are apt to be forgotten unless they are attended to at once. Turn down the bed in the guest-room at night, and put out the guest's slippers and nightgown. Find out what church she wishes to attend on Sunday, and make arrangements for her to go with a friend of yours if you go to some other church or are unable to attend with her that Sunday.

If the hostess observes the three fundamentals of hospitality and some of these smaller but equally important suggestions, she should have no trouble in making her guest comfortable. We should never forget that entertaining a dear friend in our home is a sacred privilege. The man or woman is indeed fortunate who has known the pleasure and happiness of gracious hospitality.

A hospitality-chest, with nightgown and toilet accessories for the unexpected visitor, will help you to be a perfect hostess

Why shouldn't she be proud!

Now—your jams and jellies can be perfect every time

By following this simple and easy method

EVEN the most skillful housekeeper never used to be sure of how her jams and jellies were going to turn out. It was the one place in cookery where experience just didn't seem to count.

But now—you can be certain of success every single time. You can make delicious jams and jellies from any fruit in any form—fresh, dried, canned, or fruit juices. And they are better-looking, better-tasting than ever.

Never a failure when Certo is used—never a re-cooking

CERTO is the substance in fruit that makes jelly "jell"—without that natural substance there can be no jelly.

But in some fruits this jelly-making element does not occur at all, in some only sparingly, and even in those fruits in which it is most abundant, it gradually disappears as the fruit ripens. But because Certo itself supplies the jelly-making property necessary you can now use the ripest, most flavorous fruits, and even those fruits which contain no jelly-making properties.

So quick and easy, and you save all the delicious fruit juice and flavor

IT'S less than 15 minutes from fruit to jam or jelly the Certo way—for one minute's active boil is all that's required. No more long standing over the stove and stirring on a hot day—no loss in steam of the delicious fruit flavor and natural color.

Half again as much jam or jelly from the same amount of fruit

AND Certo's brief boil saves, too, all the good jelly that used to be wasted—boiling away in steam. With Certo you get half again as much jam or jelly from the same quantity of fruit.

When you count up the cost you will be delighted to find that Certo has actually saved you money as well as time, worry and work—that the cost per glass of your jelly is less than it was the old way.

Millions of housewives use Certo

MILLIONS of housewives would never go back now to the old uncertain long-boiling process of making jams and jellies. Your grocer sells Certo. Order a bottle today; use Certo to make all your jams and jellies.

Let us send you a trial half bottle—enough for ten glasses—with a booklet of nearly 100 recipes including some new delicious jellies of fruits that never would "jell" before—fruits that lack that natural jelly-making substance that Certo now supplies. CHURCH OR COMMUNITY SUPPERS

By Lois Meek and Irene Nehrling

Recipes have been tested and approved by the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

A large supper is easily handled when the community has as completely equipped a kitchen as this one at the New Rochelle, N. Y., Woman's Club

FEEDING BIG CROWDS!

If you are helping with your church or community supper or are planning a large entertainment, you will have to think in large quantities. DELINEATOR experts tell you here how to plan meals for a hundred people or more, so that you won't run short, but won't waste food either.

Our Home-Making Department has some additional "large quantity" recipes which will be welcomed by women who are active in their communities. They are ideal for churches and schools.

Send a two-cent stamp to the Home-Making Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., to cover postage and ask for "Serving a Crowd"

HOW often have you been given charge of a church or community supper with two or three hundred people to feed and been filled with panic? Yet the thought of the proposition is really more upsetting than the actual work, though the quantities one should prepare for large groups are always puzzling. The recipes given in this article are figured on the basis of serving one hundred persons. Three types of church or community suppers are suggested.

First, a menu is given for a picnic supper to be served out-of-doors; second, a menu planned for an indoor supper to be served during warm weather; third, an indoor supper planned for cool weather.

MENU I
PICNIC SUPPER TO BE SERVED OUT-OF-DOORS

Baked Navy Beans
Whole Tomatoes or Celery Hearts
Shredded-Lettuce Sandwiches with White or Brown Bread
Pickle-and-Pimiento Sandwiches with Brown Bread
Apple Sandwiches with White or Brown Bread
Iced Lemonade
Fruit in Season as—Melons; Berries; Apples; Oranges; Bananas

MENU II
SUPPER TO BE SERVED INDOORS DURING WARM WEATHER

Ham Loaf (cold or hot)
Cold Slaw
Bread-and-Butter Sandwiches
Ice-Cream with Chocolate Sauce
Cookies

MENU III
INDOOR SUPPER TO BE SERVED DURING COLD WEATHER

Chicken à la King with Biscuit
Parsley Buttered Potatoes (Saratoga Chips may be substituted if facilities for preparation are limited. Twelve to twenty pounds may be needed)
Tomato Aspic or Cold Sliced Tomatoes
Hot Buttered Rolls
Coffee or Cocoa
Apple Pie

RECIPES FOR MENU I

BAKED NAVY BEANS

(SIZE OF SERVICE ½ CUP)

5½ quarts navy beans
⅓ cup soda
2 cups molasses
½ cup brown sugar
3 teaspoons mustard
3 teaspoons paprika
½ cup salt
1¼ pounds fat bacon or bacon scraps, or salt pork or ham fat
1 gallon tomatoes, strained, or tomato catchup

The beans may be reheated over an outdoor grate, or served cold, or at the last minute may be taken hot to the picnic.

If celery is served, one dozen and a half bunches of celery of fair size would give a sufficient amount.

For tomatoes, one hundred of medium size should be selected and the blossom end should be cut out so that the tomatoes may be salted and eaten out of the hand.

SHREDDED-LETTUCE SANDWICHES

4 quarts shredded lettuce
⅔ cup pimiento
8 hard-cooked eggs, diced
1½ to 2 cups (approximately) salad dressing

This amount will spread one hundred double sandwiches.

PICKLE-PIMIENTO SANDWICHES

5 cups pickles, diced finely
1⅔ cups pimiento, diced finely
6 cups (approximately) mayonnaise

This amount will spread 100 double sandwiches.

LEMONADE (200 CUPS)

5 quarts lemon-juice
12 quarts sugar
5 quarts hot water
10 gallons ice-water

Dissolve the sugar in the hot water; allow to cool, then add to other ingredients. If mint is used, crush the leaves and pour the hot water over them; strain them out before serving.

FRUIT IN SEASON

Canteloups may be cut in two or four servings.

Watermelons may be cut into eight to ten servings.

Berries. Nine to ten quarts when stemmed and culled will give about six quarts uncrushed. If one-half cup for each serving is allowed it will be necessary to buy twenty or twenty-one quarts of sound berries for one hundred people. If the berries are crushed and sugared, one gallon of sauce may be counted on from this amount.

These Eagle Brand twins were prize winners every time

WHEN THE WINNERS are announced in the health and beauty contests all over this country every year—it is amazing to see how many of them have been raised on Eagle Brand Condensed Milk.

Here are two more examples: Alice and Josephine Wilson. They are unusual children for several reasons. Their beauty for one thing; their health for another; and the fact that they have won prizes in all the contests they have ever entered, such as the second prize in the Asbury Park Baby Parade in 1922. But most of all, they are unusual because they are identical in height and weight!

ALICE AND JOSEPHINE WILSON
Twin daughters of Mr. & Mrs. James J. Wilson
289 Ege Avenue, Jersey City, N. J.

When these twins were put on Eagle Brand they were about three weeks old. They began to thrive at once and have been developing in the ideal fashion ever since. Now at five years they are wonderful examples of what this famous baby food can do.

Eagle Brand has been the leading baby food for generations because it is so safe, so digestible, so easy to use. If your baby isn't thriving on his present food, start him on the road to health with Eagle Brand. A million grateful mothers can testify to its value. For Eagle Brand is pure milk combined with sugar, and when properly diluted resembles mother's milk more closely than any other prepared food. It is highly nutritious—rich in essential vitamins, too.

If you would like further proof of the value of Eagle Brand for infant feeding, send to the Borden Company for their new booklet What Other Mothers Say. It gives interesting experiences of other mothers with their babies.

General information on the care of your baby is supplied in another book, Baby's Welfare, written for you by a physician. The Borden Company, 508 Borden Bldg., 350 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y.

Webster defines the Heinz way of preparing beans, exactly—baked in ovens with dry heat.

That is the meaning of the words "oven-baked" on the label of every can. That is why the beans themselves have that different taste.

Baking gives them their delicious flavor. Baking retains all of the nourishment of the beans. Baking makes them more easily digested.

Beans that are really baked are labeled "baked." It pays to read the labels when buying foods.

No ordinary supper here! In this concise little group there's chicken, tomato aspic, potatoes and a roll, with pie and cocoa waiting for the end

RECIPES FOR MENU II

HAM LOAF, HOT OR COLD

- 7½ pounds fresh pork (pork butts)
- 7½ pounds raw, smoked ham
- 12 eggs
- 1¼ quarts cracker or bread crums
- 2½ cups milk
- Salt and pepper

Grind the pork and ham. Mix with the slightly beaten eggs. Add the seasonings and cracker or bread crums, then add enough milk to make the consistency necessary to form into a loaf. Pour over loaves three quarts of strained tomatoes; bake two and one-half to three hours in moderate oven.

CABBAGE SALAD

- 12 pounds cabbage
- 1¾ cups chopped pimientos
- 4 cups chopped pickles
- 1¾ cups chopped green peppers
- 2 quarts mayonnaise

Shred the cabbage and let stand in ice-water until crisp. Drain and combine with other ingredients.

ICE-CREAM WITH CHOCOLATE SAUCE

12½ quarts or more ice-cream allowing one-half cup for a serving will be sufficient.

CHOCOLATE SAUCE

- 1 pound, or more if desired, chocolate
- 8 pounds sugar
- 1½ gallons boiling water
- ½ cup corn-starch
- 5⅓ tablespoons vanilla
- 4 teaspoons salt

Mix the grated chocolate, sugar, salt and boiling water. Let boil for five minutes. Add the corn-starch mixed to a paste with cold water. Let boil for ten minutes. Add the vanilla. Serve either hot or cold.

SUGAR COOKIES

- 1 quart brown sugar
- 4 cups shortening
- 2½ quarts flour
- 1 teaspoon soda
- 1 tablespoon vanilla
- 1½ cups water
- ¾ tablespoon salt

Cream fat and sugar. Then mix the dry ingredients and add with the water to the fat and sugar. This will make a soft dough which will not roll out until thoroughly chilled. Keep the dough in the ice-box and take out only the amount which may be rolled at one time. Roll very thin, cut into cookies three and one-half inches in diameter and bake on a floured pan.

RECIPES FOR MENU III

CHICKEN À LA KING AND BISCUITS

- 5 quarts cooked chicken meat, cubed (order 26 pounds of chicken New York dressed)
- 2 cups chicken fat
- 1 quart flour
- 1⅓ to 1½ gallons chicken stock
- ⅙ cup chopped onions
- ⅓ cup salt
- ⅓ gallon milk
- ⅔ quart chopped pimientos
- ⅔ quart chopped green peppers
- 2 cans canned mushrooms (if desired)
- ⅔ pound butter
- 10 egg-yolks
- Toast 100 half-slices of bread or 100 biscuits

Cook chicken as for stewing. Remove meat from the bones and cut it in cubes. Skim two cups of fat from the chicken stock, add the flour to the fat, and when thoroughly mixed add it to the boiling chicken stock, stirring rapidly. Add the onions, scalded milk, salt, pimientos, green peppers and cubed chicken. Sauté the mushrooms in the butter, and add them to the stock. Beat the egg-yolks and add if they are needed for color. Taste to be sure the mixture is well seasoned, and then serve it hot on toast or biscuits. If the chickens are very fat, skim off the excess which will float on the stock. Save it and substitute it for part of the butter in the parsley buttered potatoes.

PARSLEY BUTTERED POTATOES

- 40 pounds or ⅔ bushel potatoes
- ¼ cup salt
- ½ cup or 3 bunches chopped parsley
- 1 pound or more butter depending upon the money you have to spend (part chicken fat may be used in place of all butter)

Boil potatoes in salted water. Drain and pour the melted butter over them. Then sprinkle with parsley.

TOMATO ASPIC

- 3 gallons tomatoes
- 5 to 10 cloves
- 4 bay-leaves
- ¾ tablespoon salt
- ¾ teaspoon soda
- ½ teaspoon Cayenne
- ⅔ to 1 cup gelatin (for warm or damp days use latter)
- 3½ cups water
- 2½ quarts diced carrots
- 2½ quarts diced celery
- 1 bunch chopped parsley
- 8 to 10 heads of head lettuce

Cook tomatoes with seasonings, then strain. If non-hydrated gelatin is used, add to the soaked gelatin, if hydrated gelatin has been used add directly in either case, stir until all gelatin is completely dissolved. When mixture is partially set, add the vegetables. Mold in flat pans and cut in squares. Serve on lettuce leaves with mayonnaise. With the vegetables added, it replaces the salad and vegetables.

APPLE PIE

Pie Crust

- 6 pounds flour
- 3 pounds shortening
- ¼ cup salt
- 3 cups iced water

Weigh the fat and the flour. Add the salt. Work the fat into the flour, lightly using the finger tips. Add the iced water a little at a time. Avoid getting the dough too wet. This amount will make fourteen two-crust pies, using pie-tins ten and three-quarter inches in diameter.

Filling

- 14 quarts apples (after peeling and slicing)
- 2 tablespoons cinnamon
- 3½ quarts sugar
- 1½ cups flour
- 1½ cups butter

Fill each crust with one quart of apples. Cover with sugar, cinnamon and flour which have been well mixed together, using one cup for each pie. Dot each pie with a heaping tablespoon of butter and cover with the top crust. Bake in moderate oven.

"Tell me what your children eat and I will show you the kind of men and women they will be!"

THIS is the statement of a famous scientist. Of course, he referred to their physical future—their health, their size, their appearance.

Think how our food—the poor or proper balance of food elements—influences our welfare as adults! Then consider how much greater is this influence over children, whose bodies are just being formed—whose development is being determined, day by day!

For instance, it is startling to know that even the contours of the face and head—the very outlines which make up the appearance in later life—depend, to a surprising degree, on the exercise of the jaws and facial muscles. For normal development of these bones and muscles, children must eat foods that require chewing.

Essential food elements, plus crispness to encourage chewing

Much of our modern diet is deficient in one or more of the basic food elements. A lack of any one of these elements is serious—critically serious to children. But we can't all be food dietitians, and arrange each meal from the standpoint of basic food elements.

It was to help overcome this fault that Grape-Nuts was originated—a food designed, deliberately, to supply elements essential to the diet: dextrins, maltose and other carbohydrates for heat and energy; iron for the blood; phosphorous for the teeth and bones; proteins for muscle and body-building; and the essential vitamin-B—a builder of the appetite. Eaten with milk or cream, Grape-Nuts is an exceptionally well-balanced ration.

And Grape-Nuts is a crisp food! A food children like to chew. A food which exercises the bones and muscles that give the face its outlines.

Dentists agree, moreover, that the appalling prevalence of poor teeth is due largely to the soft food we habitually eat today. The teeth and gums are not properly exercised. Grape-Nuts corrects this.

A special baking process prepares Grape-Nuts for digestion—gives children the fuel and body-building elements they need, with the least digestive effort.

—no other food can bring these all-important benefits!

Give your youngsters Grape-Nuts for breakfast. Serve with whole milk or cream. Two tablespoonfuls are enough—for this food is rich in nourishment. They will love the nut-like flavor stored up in the crisp, golden grains—a flavor which is the favorite of millions.

The unforgetable fragrance of Cashmere Bouquet Soap is your best guarantee of its quality. Only in a soap made of the finest materials is it possible to preserve intact such a rare and subtle fragrance.

In Cashmere Bouquet you have a soap so pure and mild that it can be used on the tenderest skin with absolute safety. It will do all that any soap, even a so-called "beauty soap" can do. There is only one possible way that a toilet soap can produce beauty, or preserve it, and that is through cleanliness.

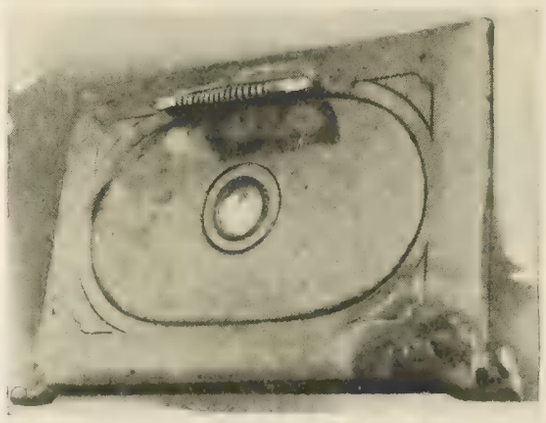
WHY NOT HAVE IT WELDED?

By T. C. Fetherston

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

INTO your town and mine has come a new kind of tinker. Sometimes he is to be found at the garage, sometimes at the machine shop, but often he has a little shop all his own.

His mission in life is to save money; and he does it by saving things you might otherwise have thrown away, metal things that can't be mended with a nail, a screw or a piece of string.



He is a carpenter for metals—the oxyacetylene welder. With a pencil-point of blue-white flame he melts the broken edge of metal things until they flow together and are joined, until there is no longer a break. The piece is as good as new; better if you ask him to reenforce the joining by adding a little extra metal.

Did you drop your cast-iron pan? The welder can quickly mend the crack

When anything goes wrong with the wiring in the house or the electrical connections, you call in the electrician. If something of wood is to be fixed, the carpenter answers your telephone call. Now you can add a new name to your list; when anything of metal breaks, call the oxyacetylene welder.

There are truly hundreds of parts that can be mended for much less than it would cost to replace them. There is the vacuum cleaner, for instance. The intake nozzle and the motor housing are an aluminum casting. If this is broken, or even if only cracked, the broom must come forth from its hiding-place in the closet. But in a few minutes and at a small cost the welder can make such a damaged part as good as new. Aluminum parts and utensils are often relatively costly; therefore their repair generally represents important savings. Percolators, teakettles and other cooking utensils and parts for electric dishwashers are often mended by welding.

Much of the metal equipment of the household is of cast iron. Although the words are commonly used as synonymous with strength, weight and hardness, cast iron is really weak and brittle as metals go. When stressed severely it is likely to break. Many have learned this from experience.

Common casualties are lugs on stove and furnace doors, food-choppers, water-heater shells, steam-radiator sections, sewing-machine parts and bedstead and crib sections. If you drop the heavy iron griddle or frying-pan, it is liable to crack. Anything of cast iron can be repaired by welding quite easily by one who knows how and has the proper equipment.

Sometimes the savings through reclaiming cast-iron parts are great indeed. For example: Father fixes the furnace in a hurry one morning, forgets to glance at the water-gage and one of the heater sections is cracked. There are two things to do: buy a new furnace or have the section repaired.

Have the cracked heater section repaired? Why, yes, easily! Just call up the welder we have been talking about.

Steel and wrought-iron parts, such as the runner on Bobby's sled, the bridge lamp, the andirons, the lawn-mower; copper parts—brass parts. The list runs on and on and on.

So give this tinker, whose business it is to save money, a chance to help you—this metal carpenter, whose magic wand, tipped with a pencil-point of flame, makes broken things whole again. When metal parts are bent, broken or worn, don't throw them away and buy new ones. Call in the oxyacetylene welder, and he will show you how much better it is to have the old parts repaired.

The repair of household equipment by welding is usually done in shops that operate as job welding shops, in automobile-repair stations, machine shops, or blacksmith shops equipped with oxyacetylene apparatus. There is usually no difficulty in finding one of them, for they are listed in the classified telephone book or are advertised in the local papers.

More welding—when a bone is caught in the food chopper

In most communities outside of the big cities such shops are generally quite well advertised by the location of the shop itself and personal acquaintance of the proprietor. If you are looking for the information, it is remarkable how many signs you will find on shops of the types mentioned above, notifying the public that the shop is equipped to handle oxyacetylene welding.

YOU NEED THEM

Fruits and greens are necessary in the diet all the year round. Stock your shelves with jars of the fruits that are so plentiful now, and you will always have delicious, nutritive foods when you want them next Winter.

"The Complete Canner," prepared by DELINEATOR experts, tells you how to can fruits and vegetables, make preserves, jams, and jellies, and crisp, spicy pickles. It gives easily-followed directions for efficient methods that will lighten the tasks of canning and preserving, together with a few recipes that you are sure to like.

The booklet costs only twenty-five cents, and can be secured from the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

SLICED PEACHES ~FROZEN!

Have them this EASY WAY~

Can you think of anything better—or more refreshing these hot days—than Sliced Peaches, frozen in their own rich syrup?

Well, why not try them? It's easy! Just pack a can of DEL MONTE Sliced Peaches in an ordinary bucket, surrounded by equal layers of chopped ice and coarse or ice cream salt. Let stand for three hours. Then take out the can, dip for an instant in hot water, punch an airhole in one end, cut off the other end as illustrated below, and there you have it—as delicious a fruit ice or frozen salad as ever made hot days cool.

And you'll find this method just as successful with other DEL MONTE Fruits—Peach Halves, Crushed Pineapple, Pears, Apricots, Berries, Fruits for Salad, or any variety you wish.

Only one precaution. This is distinctly a DEL MONTE suggestion. If you say DEL MONTE you are sure of the right results, because the fruit is always of the same consistency—the syrup is always rich enough to freeze perfectly—and more important, to taste right without other additions, just as it comes frozen from the can.

SUGGESTIONS FOR A WEEK-END OF ENTERTAINING

By Jessie A. Boys

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

There's nothing so gay as a week-end party if the hostess is serene and can join in the fun. Planning your meals beforehand, according to the menus given here, and making some of the dishes in advance leaves you free to entertain your guests.

Do you want recipes for some of the unusual dishes? We have starred the exquisitely smooth Blue-Grass salad-dressing, the flaky Fancy Delights and a few others which will add to your reputation as a hostess. Write to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage, and ask for any of the starred recipes that you wish.

WEEK-END entertaining is as convenient as it is popular. As far as markets and gardens are concerned, July should offer no difficulties in providing luscious and savory food for the week-end guests. Though the weather may be warm, much of the work involved in the following menus may be done early in the morning, and some of it can be prepared one or two days before, thus relieving the pressure on the day the big meal is to be served.

Greet your guests with a cool luncheon dish like this. Slices of crisp tomato separated by appetizing slices of tongue encircle a colorful and tasty green salad

The first six menus may be either dinners or luncheons to suit the need. The dressing chosen for the salad should conform to the custom of using a light or French dressing for the salad with the heavy meal (dinner), and a heavy salad or mayonnaise for the salad with the lighter meal (luncheon or supper), though a French dressing is sometimes used with a luncheon salad.

Be on your guard for signs of Pyorrhea

4 out of 5 are victims

The fight against Pyorrhea is a fight against overwhelming odds. Statistics prove that four out of every five over 40 — and thousands younger, too—pay Pyorrhea's dreaded toll. Will you?

Just as the stability of a building is dependent upon its foundations, so healthy teeth depend upon healthy gums.

Bleeding gums are the first sign of Pyorrhea's approach. Then they begin to recede and the healthy pink color gives place to a pale, whitish tint. Soon the teeth are loosened, pus pockets form and drain their poisons through the system, often causing indigestion, rheumatism, neuritis and many of the other diseases of mid-life.

Let Forhan's help you

Forhan's For the Gums is a most effective agent in the fight against this insidious disease. It contains just the right proportion of Forhan's Astringent (as used by the dental profession) to neutralize oral poisons, and keep the gums in a firm, strong, healthy condition. Also, it cleans and whitens the teeth and keeps the mouth sweet, clean and wholesome. Even if you don't care to discontinue your favorite dentifrice, at least start using Forhan's once a day.

Forhan's is more than a tooth paste; it checks Pyorrhea. Thousands have found it beneficial for years. For your own sake ask for Forhan's For the Gums. All druggists, 35c and 60c in tubes.

Arrange slices of tongue and tomato, alternating and overlapping, around the edge of a platter. In the center arrange individual servings of a green salad. Use lettuce and cress or any other salad green available.

Sardine and parsley canapés whet the taste and are easily made

Here the blueberries are crushed slightly and put into individual glass dishes in the center of each of which is a cube of ice, then sprinkled with powdered sugar. Garnish with washed currant leaves.

The brown sugar for the cereal is sifted, so that it is very light with, of course, no lumps.

SARDINE CANAPÉ

Skin and bone sardines. Mash and season highly, adding a few drops of lemon-juice. Spread on crackers, place a bit of parsley on each one and serve as a first course or appetizer.

COTTAGE-CHEESE AND TOMATO SALAD

On lettuce arrange sections of tomato to form a star. At the center put a spoonful of cottage-cheese well seasoned and made moist with cream. Serve with French dressing.

SAVORY RICE

½ cup butter
2 tablespoons parsley
Hot boiled rice
½ teaspoon onion-juice
Salt

Cream the butter and add finely chopped parsley, onion-juice and salt. Dot over hot boiled rice and serve at once.

ORANGE SALAD

Oranges
Lettuce
Chopped nuts
French dressing

Peel the oranges and remove as much white skin as possible. Cut into halves lengthwise (with the core, not across it). Lay each half on a board flat side down and slice across the grain in quite thin slices. For each service arrange cup-shaped lettuce leaves to form a bowl. Around the inside arrange these half-slices of orange, overlapping them and having them come together in the center at the bottom. Sprinkle with nuts and serve with French dressing.

BAKED FILLET OF HALIBUT

Cut halibut steaks into fillets, allowing one fillet to each person. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Lay in a greased baking-pan and mound fish stuffing on each. Place small pieces of bacon on top of stuffing and bake in a moderately hot (350 degrees Fahrenheit) oven for thirty minutes. Serve with tomato tartare sauce.

FISH STUFFING

1 cup dry bread-crums
¼ cup fat
¼ cup hot water
¼ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
1 teaspoon chopped parsley

Mix dry ingredients; melt fat in hot water and stir into dry ingredients.

HOT TOMATO TARTARE SAUCE

2 cups strained tomato
3 tablespoons butter
2 tablespoons corn-starch
1 teaspoon chopped onion
2 tablespoons chopped pickle
1 teaspoon table sauce
1 tablespoon chopped caper
1 tablespoon chopped parsley
Salt; Lemon-juice

Melt butter, add corn-starch and when well blended add tomato. Cook till thickened, stirring carefully. Let simmer for five minutes. Add other ingredients with salt and lemon-juice to taste. Serve hot.

CORN-MEAL BREAD-STICKS

These are made of a corn-meal muffin mixture baked in a well-greased bread-stick pan.

Now you'll like Bran!

"Yes ma'am, I sell more Post's Bran Flakes than any other kind of bran. That's because it's good to eat. Folks who start the bran habit soon come 'round to Post's and then they're customers for keeps. Families who never bought any kind of cereals now order Post's Bran Flakes, two or three boxes at a time and eat it every day as health insurance. Why, I've had folks walk in with doctors' prescriptions in their hands and call for Post's Bran Flakes. That's how I started eating it. My doctor's orders. Now I have it every morning of my life. I like it! Maybe that's why I feel so prime."

Post's Bran Flakes is bran in its most delicious form. It can be eaten regularly as a breakfast cereal with genuine relish. It makes the finest bran bread and muffins. Served with fruits in season or mixed with children's hot cereals it provides needed bulk for the intestine and prevents faulty elimination, the cause of so much sickness. Serve Post's Bran Flakes at your house every day as an "Ounce of Prevention" to keep all the family well.

Was she really to be blamed?

DESPITE the very greatest care, it happens every day. It is a risk you need no longer take. Do you know how to avert it?

OF COURSE, even competent Marie should not have been trusted with it. But the stunning little frock was soiled, and simply had to be washed. Now it was faded—ruined—and Marie heartbroken.

Millions of women who have had experiences like this are turning joyfully to Everfast Wash Fabrics—the marvelous new wash fabrics that do not fade. Everfast fabrics are guaranteed fast color—fast to washing with any soap or washing powder; fast to boiling; fast to sunlight; fast to rain and salt air; fast to perspiration; fast to everything.

GUARANTEE: If any Everfast Wash Fabric fades, for any reason, we will refund through your dealer, not only the purchase price of the material, but the making cost of the garment as well.

Picture an afternoon frock of Everfast voile, the loveliest thing imaginable, that can be washed without danger of fading. Or a smart sports costume of broadcloth or linen in your favorite blue, yellow or brown—unharmed by grass and other stains. Perhaps you take particular pride in your house dresses—how you will delight in Everfast ginghams and suiting for them! And what pretty clothes you can make for all the children's needs from these and the dozens of other beautiful Everfast weaves.

The colors are almost irresistible. For those who prefer bright hues and designs there are gay pinks, greens, yellows, blues—striking checks, modish plaids and stripes. But the lovely pastel shades are just as alluring to many—exquisite grays and heliotrope, orchid, lavender, and others too numerous to name.

Don't you want to find out all about Everfast fabrics and their countless uses? For they offer you so many opportunities to give lasting beauty to all your clothes. See your regular dealer about them right away. Or, if he doesn't carry them, either by the yard or in made-up garments, we shall be glad to direct you to one who does. And remember, with all their unique advantages, Everfast fabrics cost but a trifle more than ordinary materials. N. Erlanger, Blumgart & Co., Inc., 354 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Reproduction of Everfast and ordinary wash fabrics before and after being boiled with washing soda. Note there is not the slightest change in the color of Everfast.

SAVE DOLLARS AND HOURS

Hints from successful housewives

If you have discovered some clever little way to save time or labor or fuel or food or anything else connected with housekeeping, tell us about it—and if we can use it in these columns we will pay you five dollars for it. Write on only one side of the paper and address your letter to The "Savers" Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. (If you wish to have your suggestion returned in case we can not use it, please enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope)

SAVE DISASTER FROM LOOSENED CORKS

During the Summer months many American people are packing their trunks for a vacation trip. It is a problem to know how to pack bottles so that the corks and stoppers will be kept tight. It is helpful to draw over the top of each bottle the finger of an old kid glove. If the stopper has been inserted firmly and the glove is pulled down and tied securely, the stopper will not work loose.—MRS. G. T., Owen Sound, Ontario.

SAVE GAS IN PREPARING BREAKFAST

I make the toast in a gas-oven, and I save gas by cooking the eggs, or baking them rather, in the oven while the toast is being made. I break the eggs into buttered muffin-tins and put them in the oven when I start the toast. Both are ready at about the same time.—MRS. F. G. C., Portland, Ore.

SAVE EYE-STRAIN

In many kitchens the stove must be placed in a dark corner or side of the room and the windows are so arranged that the light does not come in over one's shoulder. It is a great help to tack a piece of white oilcloth behind the cook stove so that every bit of light is reflected.—MRS. W. L. G., Burlingame, Calif.

SAVE OLD LINOLEUM

When the old kitchen linoleum was replaced by the new inlaid linoleum, I found an excellent use for the old discolored and worn material. I cut it into two round floor mats four feet in diameter and used them on my sun-porch under the tubs of two bay-trees. I painted the mats orange and when that coat was dry I painted two black bands eight inches wide, one at the edge and one six inches nearer the center. The effect was stunning. The mats are cleaned easily with a little soap and water.—MRS. O. L. MCN., Chicago, Ill.

SAVE DIRTY HANDS AFTER CHANGING THE AUTOMOBILE TIRES

I always carry in the automobile a bottle of soapy water and a few squares of clean rags; then when we have to tinker with the engine or change tires we can wash our hands with a few shakes of soapy water from the bottle and they are comparatively clean.—MRS. H. S., La Porte, Ind.

SAVE THE HOUSE FROM INTENSE HEAT

A considerable difference is noticeable in the temperature of the house in Summer if there is a circulation of air through the attic. Some of us have houses with low attics reached only by a step-ladder and then one must climb through a hole in the ceiling to get into the attic. In case of storm it is almost impossible to close the windows and the place is stifling hot during the Summer if the windows are kept closed.

We bought window-blinds and fitted them into the frames. They kept out the rain but permitted the air to circulate freely.—MRS. B. W. M., Washington, D. C.

YOU MAY BE ONE

of the thousands of women in America who are entitled to belong to a patriotic society. These important groups have been organized to spread the principles of Americanism, to preserve historic landmarks, to commemorate our dead heroes, and to aid those heroes still living.

THE DELINEATOR, in a desire to stimulate organized patriotic movements, has collected information on the important societies—how to know if you are eligible, the aims of each group, its insignia and history, and its headquarters.

"Patriotic Organizations for Women" is more complete than any similar directory yet published. It will show you how to get in touch with just the groups in which you are interested. It will tell you what you can do for them and what they can do for you.

The booklet will be mailed promptly upon receipt of twenty-five cents in stamps, to cover postage and the cost of printing. Address your letter to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

Naturally Curly Hair for You—At Last!

Miss Helen Schaub, 60 E. 196th St., New York City, LANOIL-Waving Miss McCann's hair, after being waved herself with the same Home Outfit. "It was a fascinating experience—and we certainly are happy!"

DO YOU remember how uncomfortable your hair made you last year, through your vacation? Wasn't it a shame that a little thing like straight hair could spoil so many occasions for you? Yet it is unnecessary, really inexcusable, for you to spend the Summer envying your more fortunate friends, and crimping and re-crimping your hair, when, so easily, quickly, and SAFELY, you too can have healthly, permanently curly hair. We mean hair which ALL Summer long, will grow even prettier when you dance, walk in the misty night air, or bathe at shore or mountainside.

Try the Safe LANOIL Process At Our Cost

One pleasant application of the wonderful Nestle LANOIL Process will give you such hair—Just send the coupon below, either for more information about the famous Home Outfit for Permanent Waving, or for the Outfit itself, on thirty days' free trial.

We send you this Outfit on trial, with extra materials free, for you to see for yourself the beautiful results of a LANOIL Permanent Wave. We do not ask you to make up your mind immediately after your waving. No. Wait thirty days. If your soft waves, curls and ringlets do not become prettier every day, and more satisfying and delightful in every way—if you are not convinced that the LANOIL Process, in addition to curling it permanently, improved your hair, then send back the Outfit, and without question or delay, we return every cent of its $15 purchase price.

You Will Love the Work—It's Easy

Perhaps, until now, you did not feel confident that you could do this waving. But, it is really FUN! Even little girls of twelve have been known to do it with lovely results. Perhaps you thought it a tiresome process, requiring several applications. NO! A single afternoon—sometimes less—suffices for permanent waving a head. And it is just as comfortable and as pleasant as the girls look in the photograph above. Risk is so entirely absent from this treatment, that not only do we LANOIL-Wave very young children at Mr. Nestle's two magnificent New York Establishments, but we have received many photographs of little girls, whose mothers have given them exquisite permanent LANOIL-curls with the Home Outfit!

Send Now—TODAY

Remember this: the LANOIL Process is a healthful treatment for your hair. A few thrilling hours will give you charming waves, curls and ringlets that last, and look as naturally curly as if you were born so. Sign your Declaration of Independence from the tyranny of straight hair, right now, by sending us a letter, a postal or the coupon below, for further information, or the Outfit itself on free trial. A perfect little cherub!

WHEN baby isn't being fed or bathed, he is supposed to be snuggled in his soft, warm crib, sleeping peacefully or crooning to himself—a perfect little cherub.

But even a cherub gets stiff and sore lying flat on its back all day and soon learns to cry and fret for want of a little diversion.

In place of harmful cuddling and carrying about, try a delightfully refreshing Mennen shower.

You know how perspiration, urine and bath-water collect in the chubby folds of baby's skin. Gentle towelling cannot remove it... but Mennen Borated Talcum, like millions of soft, white fairy sponges, absorbs every trace of this irritating moisture, leaving the skin-folds dry and safe.

And friction is another foe of baby's comfort. His skin-folds rub. His clothes often bind. Bedding sometimes chafes...but this pure, cooling talcum spreads a silky film over the sensitive little body, saving it from contact with harsh, damp clothes and woolly blankets.

Baby's delicate skin cannot resist infection as easily as yours. Tiny defects easily become serious—even fatal... and so Mennen's is made not only mild and pure, but wonderfully healing and antiseptic as well.

Just dust Mennen Borated Talcum on the chubby little body, after every bath and change of diapers, before each nap and whenever baby cries.

Only 25c and the coupon below brings you postpaid the famous Mennen Baby Book—a real help for mothers.

WHAT FOUR HANDS DID TO SECOND-HANDS

By Anne M. Henkels

THE house was finished. The pile of plaster and bricks in the center of the living-room had made three loads of Mr. MacGregor's miniature dump-cart, at four dollars a load, and been carted away to become a foundation for the new boulevard. We had painted the last wall and ceremoniously thrown the switch that gave us electricity. But the rooms were as bare as Mother Hubbard's cupboard.

So we—hubby and I—set out to purchase the necessary furniture, having previously determined that makeshifts and masquerades would be tabu; each piece of furniture would be frankly mahogany, oak, papier-maché, or whatever else it really was.

The prices of bedroom and dining-room sets in the shops proved to be out of the question; so we began a career of purchasing that might well be entitled "Adventures with a Second-Hand Man."

First we answered the advertisements of people who were selling their furniture at home. Usually we found their ideas of its value were greatly exaggerated. A decade or two of service was considered no disadvantage to weigh against the privilege of buying the stuff. In one house we visited we had been preceded by a junkman; and the thrifty housewife sought to retrieve both pride and profit by recounting his insults and boosting her prices. We did succeed, however, in buying from her a beautiful mahogany dining-room table (fifty-four-inch) and a buffet for seventy dollars, thus underbidding a mysterious offer of one hundred dollars. But the kind owner said she was thrilled to think that a bride should possess her cherished table. Besides, we paid cash!

We found some father-and-mother chairs for use in the dining-room. These were Windsor chairs, graceful and comfortable, brand new and splendidly built of oak and hickory, but with a shiny finish that was distressingly unattractive and did not harmonize with the rest of our furnishings. We scraped the chairs down to the wood. gave them two coats of flat white and two coats of white enamel, and finished the armrests in mahogany, a delightful contrast. Then for side chairs we bought some old-fashioned wooden ones with solid seats, which we also enameled white and ornamented, since neither of us is an artist, with decalcomania. Our brick fireplace in the dining-room is flanked by built-in book-shelves, so a rush-bottomed rocker and these old-fashioned chairs make a charming Colonial unit for the little house.

What new upholstery will do to two old walnut spring-seat chairs

In a second-hand store oddly situated in the shopping district of a near-by suburb we made a real find. It was a dilapidated chair with springs trailing on the floor and with its back bulgily stuffed in the manner of the General Grant period; but the frame was solid walnut and the wood was uninjured. After some search, the proprietor found a mate for it lying prone on a davenport behind a grandfather's clock, with footstools, book-shelves and other things piled indiscriminately on top. While he was looking for it, we had a momentary consultation and decided to go as high as fifteen dollars apiece for the chairs. When the subject of price was broached, we were ready. "Two dollars each," coaxed the dealer. And ungrateful wretches that we were, we cried: "Oh, not for those old things. We'll give you three dollars a pair!" He accepted, and a friend's car brought them home.

There are many bargains to be had in old pieces that may be picked up at country auctions and elsewhere. It's an adventure to search them out and an economy to refinish them yourself. Especially is this profitable for the beginner who has to furnish on small capital. Mrs. Sanders, Editor of the Department of House Decoration, will be glad to help you. Write her at THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage

Two small tables, a mirror and one or two big comfortable chairs complete the living-room furniture

Before we left his shop, we also purchased for four dollars a huge mahogany armchair with springs and upholstery hors de combat, and for fifty cents a small telephone-table with a broken leg.

Two remnants of handsome tapestry, a pot of glue, webbing and a few yards of gimp were added to our stores, and we commenced work. The hair stuffing was boiled, the chairs thoroughly disinfected and cleaned, and new coverings tacked on. Instead of the tufted back, it was both easier and better-looking to keep the upholstery level with the wood. The table was scrubbed with lye and when thoroughly dry was painted with mahogany wood-stain. It was a five-minute job to glue on the leg. By rubbing off the excess stain before it dried, the table was made to match the living-room furniture; two coats of varnish gave it the proper soft finish. In all our painting and varnishing each coat was rubbed with fine sandpaper before the next coat was applied.

A mahogany mirror, a reading-table and a handsome old chest of drawers were spoils of a sparsely attended country auction. And we picked up Wedgwood jasperware in antique-shops.

Two articles we never bought at auction were rugs and pewter. For at one of our first sales two cups that seemed twins to our uninitiated eyes brought six dollars and twenty-five cents respectively. Whereupon we resolved to forego pewter until we could appraise it more accurately. And a rug for which we were willing to pay fifty dollars justified our admiration by bringing one thousand dollars.

We inherited a huge walnut bed with box springs—Jack calls it "The Cathedral"—which gives an air of comfort and stability to the chintzy guest-room. Some of these fine old walnut beds, by the way, can be converted into four-posters at small expense by a good cabinetmaker. Or if you wish to sell, a lumber yard will give you more than a second-hand man.

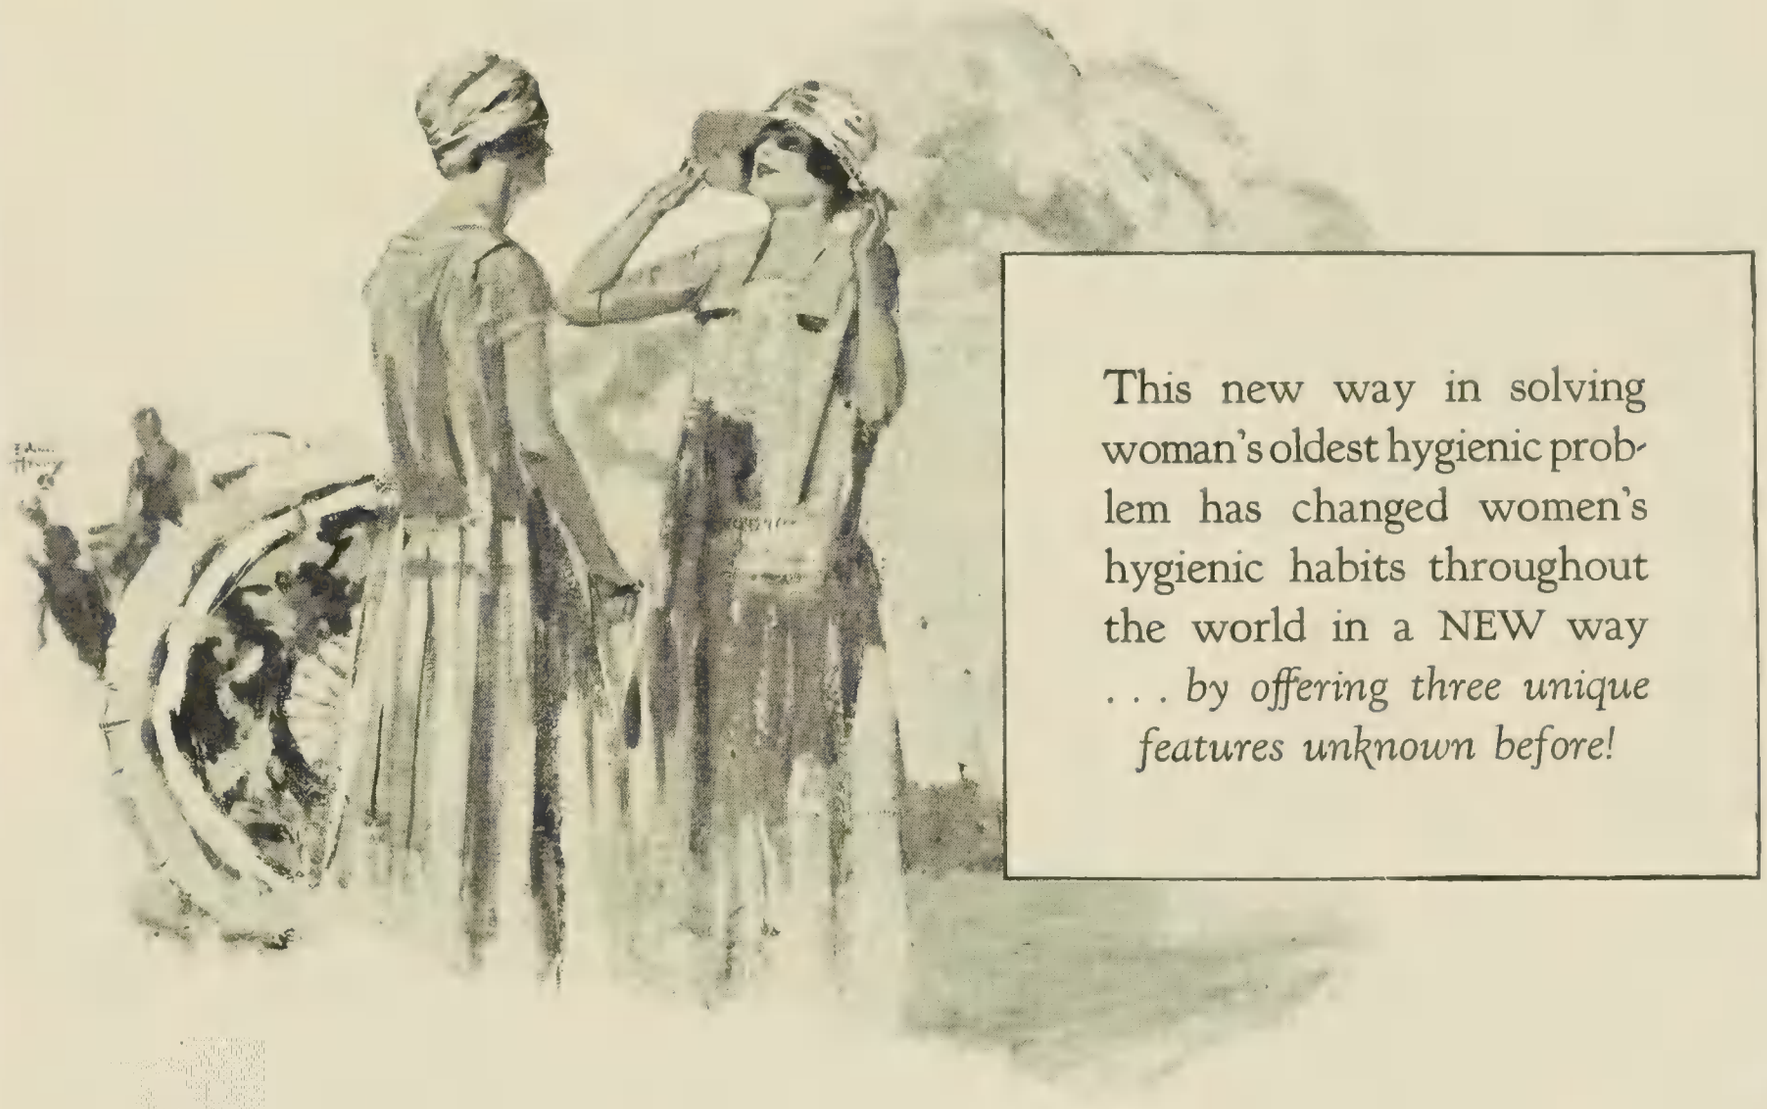
The uses of democracy are well illustrated in dealing with the second-hand man. He is easily impressed, and a fancy name applied to an article usually means a fancy price. A "mirror" is always more valuable than a "looking-glass." "An old ironing-table" at three dollars immediately jumps to ten dollars if you ask the price of "the charming settee." The greatest bargains will, of course, be found in furniture that is neither brand new nor yet old enough to be antique.

OUR kitchen walls are creamy yellow, with open shelves for groceries and china, with a red-brick recess for the laundry stove, which heats the room and the boiler, and with very shiny black pipes. By using a certain ingenuity in hooks, every bright bit of aluminum, from frying-pan to measuring-spoon, hangs on the walls. The cheap black-and-white checker-board linoleum will wear like a good one if we continue to varnish it every six months.

This kitchen is the abode of Patrick, a young Quaker-gray maltese, who, after searching vainly for mice that he feels must exist in an old house, is now content to sleep all night in his red box by the fire, luxuriously stretched on the soft red-and-white check mattress that matches the curtains on the shelves.

The sunniest room on the second floor is now the heart of the house, for there is little Miss Muffet in her white Swiss bassinet surrounded by the freshest of blue-and-white check hangings. Cold mornings have no terrors now, for an overflowing smile and a frantic thrashing of hands and feet are the daily rewards of an early visit; and in the evening as she sleeps peacefully it requires no look at walls or floor to realize that "the house that Jack built" is complete.

A time-worn drop-leaf kitchen table and a few low-seated ladder-backed chairs have received their quota of apple-green paint, and with the "old ironing-table," assuredly a "charming settee" now, make the little porch an invitingly reposeful spot. Cushions of gay striped canvas and two old gray pickle-jars filled with fresh blooms from the tiny garden reflect the joyous mood of our home.



Each and every one of our possessions boasts its own particular history, linking it forever to us and to our past and future.

One of the Windsors, made to look antique with paint and stain

Misty Gowns and Filmy Frocks

Wear them now in security without a second thought—under conditions once adjudged impossible

This new way in solving woman's oldest hygienic problem has changed women's hygienic habits throughout the world in a NEW way . . . by offering three unique features unknown before!

TO be charming, exquisite, beyond all doubt, every minute, every day! . . . do you seek the peace of mind, that knowing you are will bring?

Modern science has discovered a new hygiene for women . . . a way that supplants the uncertainty of the old-time sanitary pad with absolute security.

Eight in every ten women in the better walks of life have adopted it. Doctors widely urge it. Experts in hygiene employ it.

You wear your filmiest frocks, your most exquisite silks . . . dance, motor, dine, with never a moment's precious charm lost.

New advantages you'll appreciate

This new way embodies three factors of importance . . . plus many others.

It is different in material from any other product obtainable for this purpose.

It absorbs 16 times its own weight in moisture! It is 5 times as absorbent as the ordinary cotton pad!

It eliminates the bother and annoyance of laundry—you simply discard it.

It is as easily disposed of as a piece of tissue . . . thus banishing the often embarrassing difficulty of disposal.

It is deodorized . . . a factor that supplies a wonderful feeling of security which old ways denied.

AND . . . it is obtainable everywhere, at every drug store, every department store—virtually at every corner—to meet emergencies.

You ask for it, without hesitancy, by its trade name—Kotex.

Test Kotex, please

If you have not tried Kotex, please do. It will make a great difference in your life, in your viewpoint, in your peace of mind and your health.

60% of many ills, common to women, according to many medical authorities, are traced to the use of unsafe and unsanitary makeshift methods.

Hygienic authorities charge almost 80% of the lack of charm, poise and immaculacy, expected of women in this modern day, to the same mistake in hygiene.

Thus on every count, millions are turning to this new way. A fair test will prove its advantages beyond all question. No other method will ever satisfy.

At all good stores

Obtain Kotex today at any better department or drug store.* In sanitary packages of twelve, in two sizes: the Regular, and Kotex-Super (extra thick).

You'll appreciate these 3 factors

(1) Utter protection—Kotex absorbs 16 times its own weight in moisture. 5 times that of the ordinary cotton pad, and is deodorized, thus assuring double protection.

(2) No laundry. As easy to dispose of as a piece of tissue—thus ending the trying problem of disposal.

(3) Easy to buy anywhere.* Many stores keep them ready-wrapped—help yourself, pay the clerk, that is all.

But all he remembered was--unloveliness!

When a handsome man meets a beautiful girl, the magnet of mutual attraction just naturally begins to draw.

But what is the matter, when after one brief meeting, the magnet of her beauty no longer draws him? A beautiful face so soon forgotten—all he remembers is unloveliness!

It is a known scientific fact that odor, through the olfactory sense, has a power to waken memory as has no other of the senses. Lavender, violets, honeysuckle, pine—how their fragrance makes you remember!

This is something that enters into the calculations of the socially successful woman. She will be remembered by sweet, subtle scents. She will run no risk of ever having an unlovely odor associated with her person.

And she knows that on this score she must be alert against one disastrous thing—an odor that in an instant can "demagnetize" all the beauty and vivacity in the world!

In combating underarm odor, you have a peculiar physiological condition to deal with. The perspiration glands under the arm are stimulated to unusual activity by heat, excitement or nervousness. Clothing and the deep hollow of the underarm prevent normal evaporation of moisture.

This results in a disagreeable odor which you may be sure is always painfully apparent to others even though you yourself may be serenely unconscious of it.

And as for perspiration moisture—no woman needs to be told that those horrid rings of stain under the arms wreck her appearance. She knows too well what excessive moisture costs in ruined clothing and self-respect.

Soap and water are ineffectual against perspiration

The trouble is—people do not realize that soap and water are perfectly powerless here. Perspiration annoyance can be corrected only through regular special care.

This care 3 millions are now giving with Odorono, the underarm toilette! Because it was formulated by a physician they know they can depend on its safe, sure, scientific action.

Odorono is just like a dainty toilet water to use. And the best of it is, you need use it only twice a week. One application is effective for at least three days.

Nurses and physicians use Odorono in hospitals as an antiseptic corrective for both perspiration odor and moisture.

Don't run the risk of underarm odor; of staining your frocks and lingerie beyond the power of the most expert dry cleaning! You can so easily protect your person and your clothes with Odorono! Enjoy its safe assurance. 35c, 60c and $1 at all toilet counters or sent by mail prepaid.

Send for dainty sample set of the complete Underarm Toilette

ASK THE DELINEATOR

We are glad to offer our readers the following services; and we hope they will have no hesitation in consulting our department experts on any personal or household problem. Be sure (1) to address your inquiry to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.; (2) to give us your return address; (3) to enclose the cost of the pamphlet or other literature (in each case a minimum amount fixed to cover cost of printing and postage)

Babies and Children—THE DELINEATOR offers mothers a unique program in child health. Besides the articles published every month there are four "Happy Baby Clubs" which mothers may join. These are under the direction of Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw and are told about every month on the Happy Child page.

In addition, THE DELINEATOR presents a series of pamphlets which were written during the time that the late Dr. L. Emmett Holt was director of the Happy Child Department. These pamphlets were prepared under the direction of this most eminent of child specialists and were written some by him and others by his distinguished associates. They cost only ten cents each and treat the following subjects: "The Expectant Mother and the New Baby," "The General Care of the Baby," "Maternal Nursing," "Artificial Feeding," "Diet Problems of Childhood," "Early Childhood," "The Child's Teeth," "The School Child," "The Mental Health of the Child," "Three Dread Diseases of Childhood," "Play, Eyes and Movies" and "Correct Posture."

If you would like to have the first seven of these in durable and attractive book form, you should purchase "The Happy Baby," which costs one dollar.

Then there is the "Baby's Record Book," which has been proven most popular. It is nicely bound and is very complete with charts on which to record the little one's growth and health, and blank pages for remarks and photographs. This costs one dollar.

Home-making—This department has a score of leaflets that will help you to systematize, simplify and improve your housekeeping. Write for a list of them. And remember that you can ask any question that troubles you concerning household management. Always send a self-addressed, stamped envelope for reply.

Building and Decoration—If you want to build, write for pictures of all Donn Barber's model houses, costing you only two cents for return postage. Then for one dollar you may order a print of floor-plans and elevations of the house you decide upon.

Ask Mrs. Sanders, the editor of this department, about furnishing and decorating (not more than five questions at one time, please). Be sure to give dimensions, exposure and full description of rooms—and a two-cent stamp for reply.

Special bulletins, "Good Floors," "Curtains and Draperies," "Walls, Woodwork and Ceilings," "Furnishing the Home," "How to Choose, Frame and Hang Your Pictures," "How to Know Good Furniture" and a new one, just prepared, called "Methods of Painting Furniture," may be had for twenty-five cents each.

Beauty—The beauty editor will answer personal questions and send complimentary folders on the care of skin, hands and hair, or lotions and cosmetics. Tell us which you want—and enclose postage at rate of two cents for two folders.

Health—This department has just published a booklet called "Reducing in Spots," by Dr. Lillian E. Shaw, who is a doctor as well as an expert in physical training. In addition to scientific exercises for reducing different parts of the body this booklet includes a number of special exercises for correcting body faults. Price, twenty-five cents.

Etiquette—A new booklet called "Table Hospitality" gives explicit directions for setting the table for formal and informal meals and for entertaining with and without a maid. This is ten cents, and Mrs. John Cabot Kimberly will answer any personal quandary or send instructive leaflets on the various phases of etiquette, such as "Courtesies of To-day between Men and Women," "Introductions, Invitations and Replies," "Entertaining," "Travel," "House Weddings," "Etiquette at the Table," "Letter-Writing," "Calls and the Use of Cards." These cost nothing but the postage, which is estimated at two cents for two folders.

Entertainment—Do not hesitate to ask us about any entertainment that you may be planning. Among our latest suggestions are: "Rain or Shine"—a party for indoors or out; "A Red, White and Blue Letter Day" a Fourth of July celebration—a full program, with something for everybody; and "The Treasure Hunt's the Thing," which everybody who has a car and a spare afternoon can enjoy. Send only two-cent stamped, self-addressed envelope for reply.

DANGERS OF BEING OVERFAT

By Flora Rose

Director, The New York State College of Home Economics, at Cornell University

THE number of overfat adults in our country is on the increase. This fact is worth thinking about. If the only penalty we had to pay for being too fat were the devastating effect on our looks, we might let ourselves acquire double and treble chins in peace; but such is not the case. The truth is that the overfat grown-up is a poor risk from the point of view of health. Any insurance company will verify this. If we really treasure health and we have a considerable amount of surplus fat stored on our bodies, we must literally reform ourselves.

To carry around an excess body weight of from ten to a hundred pounds—and there are persons who are that much overweight—is more of a real tax upon the body than to carry all day long, day after day, a knapsack, a blanket-roll, a suitcase or a market-basket of the same weight. The unnecessary fat is forever with us.

Space must be made for it all through the body, often seriously interfering with the normal activity of such organs as the heart, the liver and the kidneys. Excessive fat is like a drone in the hive—it fails to make any contribution to the work these organs must do, and it actually either adds to their work or diminishes their power to work efficiently. The charges which might be brought out against overweight are many and serious.

It has been established that there is a close connection between exercise and the formation of good red blood. But the average fat person is going to think twice before carrying some fifteen, twenty or more excess pounds up hill and down dale on long hikes or even on short ones. Step-saving becomes an ingenious art with overweights, and the result is that with little exercise and sluggish circulation they tend to become anemic.

For an underexercised body to carry around a burden of fat always puts an added strain on the heart. There are many hearts which though slightly weakened in function are perfectly capable of doing a good lifetime job in a body of normal weight. But they go on a strike when they are crowded by fat and have the burden of pumping the extra blood necessary to move a heavyweight around. We do not wish to imply that there are not authentic cases where excess fat may be the result of a weak heart. But we do want to emphasize the point that this condition should not be confused with that of a heart weakened as a result of putting on flesh.

The story of the heart weakened by overwork or loss of power repeats itself with other organs, and perhaps the most serious note of warning to overweights is a tendency to diabetes. For this ailment is on the increase and this increase is greatest among adults who are too fat. In the case of caution is less requisite than formerly, for now many States have the springs and wells along the main highways inspected and the water analyzed. When found safe, they are marked as such and may be used without hesitation. In towns and cities the water provided by the public water supply is almost invariably safe. If you are where you can not get water from a certified source, it is a good plan to use only boiled water. This can be cooled in what is known as a "desert water-bag." Such a bag hung in a car as you drive along on a hot day will deliver water that is nicely cooled. This works best in dry climates.

Of course most campers use coffee, tea, cocoa or some other beverage made with boiled water; and sufficient water for health may be taken into the body in this way, if, as should be the case, your diet consists partly of fresh fruits. Fruits are also desirable in helping to make up a balanced diet and in providing the necessary amounts of raw food.

Practically everywhere along the main-traveled highways fruit, vegetables and other foods may be bought at wayside markets or in the towns and villages along the route. Many tourist camps are visited periodically by motor markets which sell meat, milk, eggs and fruit.

As to cooking, that is a subject by itself, and only a little can be said here. Formerly we used the open camp-fire, and surely there is nothing more pleasantly pungent to the nostrils of a man than the smell of wood smoke mingled with boiling coffee. And with an Indian fire, skillet, grid and dingle-stick an experienced camper can prepare fare fit for a king. But, now that women have come to constitute a majority of the vacationists on wheels, times are changing and the regular fireplace, wood or gas stove in the camp-site, the modern gasoline stove, the oil stove and the acetylene stove are the rule, and doubtless to most people much more convenient.

Stoves, too, have their advantages in rainy weather, as they can be used in a tent, while an open fire can not be built there unless the tent is of the Indian teepee variety with an open top. Nevertheless where there is a canopy in front of the tent an open fire can be built thereunder in cold wet weather.

MALE campers often are careless of their appearance, and not infrequently go unshaven. Yet even the male will enjoy himself better if he will take the trouble to shave every morning and wear a snug khaki outfit with knickers and woolen stockings. Woodsmen, foresters and hunters as a rule wear woolen underwear twelve months in the year—light woolen in Summer, medium in Spring and Fall, and heavy in Winter.

But no woman wishes to look like a frost-blasted corn-stalk. Even if she must practise economy, she is usually sufficiently skilful with her needle to make herself presentable. "Tweed or wool-khaki knickers, wool-khaki middy, tweed hat, sweater (a jacket or coat gets wrinkled when you do not wear it), wool stockings and high, heavy, oiled shoes" are advised by an experienced camper.

As for shelter, while some vacationists awheel use the shelter of their own cars, most others prefer and provide some sort of tent, and the variety of tents easily obtainable is fairly infinite.

WHERE to go is a big subject, for this is a big country with wonderful attractions. With such a country and with six times as many passenger cars as there are in all the rest of the world, it is no wonder that thirty-five hundred localities provide tourist parks for vacationists; that in the national forests there are fifteen hundred camps at our disposal and at least a hundred more in the national parks such as Yosemite, Grand Canyon and Yellowstone.

These national parks are among the world's greatest wonders, and, while most of them are somewhat remote from our Eastern States, if the wheeled vacationist can possibly get the time he ought to visit the Yellowstone, with its many-hued leaping geysers and the gold-fretted walls of the canyon through which flows the river that gives the park its name. He ought not to fail to see the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, or Zion National Park, or Yosemite, whose giant redwoods were flourishing saplings when Jesus walked the streets of Jerusalem.

Many of the States have their State parks and forest reserves. New York alone has nearly four million acres in the Adirondacks, the Catskills and the Palisades Interstate Park.

In New Hampshire and Maine is the White Mountain National Forest, including more than a million acres.

There are national forests in Virginia and West Virginia, the Carolinas and Tennessee, and even now, as a result of a vote in the expiring days of the last Congress, a national park is being created on the Blue Ridge in the Shenandoah Valley region.

The Pacific coast cities, San Diego, Los Angeles, Portland, Tacoma and Seattle, are almost in the midst of our greatest national forests.

The Southern cities, whose camping periods occur both Winter and Summer, are now getting more and more parks and forests for their people.

But these are only a few of the many playgrounds which the country offers the camper. A family from Indianapolis motors out to Denver and camps there in Overland Park on a street of camps "a mile long and a mile high." They breathe the rare sparkling air of the heights and get a new vision of life. A Denver family tours to Indianapolis and camps in the tourist park provided for them by the capital of Hoosierdom. They behold, stretching away to the limits of vision, fields lush with the dark green of tasseled corn. They get an appreciation of the vastness and richness of our great central plain.

So, weaving back and forth from the Pacific to the Atlantic and from the Great Lakes to the Gulf, the people of our many sections are woven together into the fabric of a united nation.

Get Your FREE Copy

Every woman, even though she may not aspire to be a Cleopatra or a Helen of Troy and bring men to worship at her shrine, has a sweetheart or husband in whose eyes she wishes to appear at her best.

This little volume is meant for her, and contains so much information of vital importance in her quest for personal loveliness that no modern woman should be without it. It has had the largest circulation of any beauty book ever printed, and is now in its fourth edition.

It will tell you the beauty methods of the historically beautiful women, it will tell you how to enhance and preserve your complexion, it will tell you how to avoid and correct such feminine dreads as colorless skin, coarse skin, blackheads, pimples, lines and wrinkles, drooping muscles, enlarged pores and oily skin. It also tells the complete story of for making women beautiful, and keeping them so, with letters from enthusiastic users telling what Boncilla did for them in specific skin needs. Only one thing more than you now use at your toilet table, but oh! what a difference in results!

ARE WE PRODUCING CHARACTER?

of themselves. They were thinking of the children. A home to them was an agency of social service. What might they not do for the nation and the world through their home? They built a Zion and prayed that it might be said of their household that this one and that one had been born there.

Such homes have been the breeding-places of character in our nation; and if such home life in America fails, if fewer Hannahs pray for their Samuels before they are born, and dedicate them to service when they come, if fewer mothers hear with humble awe the angelic annunciation that they shall bear a child, then all our wealth and all our power can not save us. What shall it profit a nation, if gaining the whole world of markets, it lose the home life that produces character?

Let us look to our schools! It is important but it is not primarily important whether we have so many more factories to produce so many more things, but what we do with our schools is supremely important. We who take schools for granted as though like manna they fall down from heaven, do we realize what a long-continued struggle they have cost, with what difficulty they are being maintained and advanced, what personal devotion day by day is going into them, what sacrifices the best teachers make who for the love of their vocation turn their backs on life's more obvious rewards? America's attitude toward its schools and school teachers leaves very much to be desired.

You who are yourselves teachers of our children and who at times are tempted to discouragement by the lax and careless attitude of the community, never lose the sense of your high vocation. There are plenty of people in this country to make things. The nation will never lack for such. But folk who will give their lives to building intelligent character in the youth are laying the foundations of society. It shall be said of our schoolrooms also that this one and that one was born there.

LET us look also to our industries! Often the idealist upon one side and the business man upon the other feel themselves at odds. The business man considers the idealist an impractical visionary and the idealist thinks the business man too careless of the human effects of modern industry. But it is foolish for these two thus to misunderstand each other. The production of character is no more the concern of home and school than it is of industry. Any economic system which, producing money, does not produce men is committing suicide.

Bolshevism has no chance in this country. The longer it hangs on in Russia and reveals its quality and consequences, the less chance it has. But there are some things in our industrial life to which we would better speedily attend. Beware of anything that produces money but hurts men. Beware of twelve-hour shifts, of the labor of children in factories, of conditions that keep four million of our people habitually below the poverty line, of bad housing for the workers, of all misuses of autocratic power that crush the laborer's self-respect. This counsel is not super-idealism. It is the only sound business sense. Any industrial system which creates wealth but does not create personality is doomed. It was J. Pierpont Morgan himself who said, "Character is the basis of credit."

Finally, let us look to our religion. In this country church and state are supposed to be separate. Yet they are not entirely separate. The state does subsidize the church. The church pays no taxes. Even on Fifth Avenue in New York all church property is tax free. The state, knowing that character is the foundation of society, has been unwilling to tax an institution on which it thought it could rely to produce character, and the state has a right to expect a good return on that investment.

This is the ultimate defense of church and synagogue. The one reason why mankind has allowed the Christian church to go on is that, with all her mistakes, the miracle of transformed character has been taking place in her for twenty centuries. For at the heart of all the Christian churches is one thing which, overlaid though it be by every manner of concealment and disguise, never can be altogether hidden, the influence of Jesus. And so powerful is it that wherever His spirit comes, His thought of God, His views of man, His quality of life, it makes for serviceable character.

To be sure, we know the folk who are irreligious and yet have fine character. They are like cut flowers plucked from the garden and taken to the drawing-room. They still are beautiful. They do not seem to need the sun. Yet from these drawing-room flowers which though unsunned still are beautiful, take seeds and plant them in a sunless place. You will see the consequence. Plucked flowers in a drawing-room for a while are beautiful, but their children will not grow without the light and warmth that come from the center of the universe. So generation after generation, you will not permanently get great character without great religion.

Let us look then to our religion! Let us waste no time on unessential concerns! Let our theology be simple and usable, our sectarian loyalties lightly worn! Only one thing centrally matters: Build character. Undergird life with the motives, faiths, sanctions and convictions that create character.

Such is the message which well might come to the new America from the simple and beautiful old rooms in which our forefathers once lived. God grant that the nation may not prove too proud to learn afresh the everlasting truth for which those ancient rooms still stand.

THE MEDICINE CABINET

BICARBONATE OF SODA, commonly known as baking or cooking-soda, deserves a place on this shelf. It should be put in a tin box and will keep indefinitely. A teaspoon dissolved in a cup of hot water and given in teaspoonful doses every few minutes will often relieve an acid stomach and acute indigestion. It will help to bring up the gas in flatulence. Burns are sometimes treated by applying gauze soaked in a saturated solution of soda.

A tin of MUSTARD should always be kept in the medicine closet so that it will not be necessary to hunt for it in the kitchen when it is needed in an emergency. Mustard has many uses in sickness. Mixed with flour in dilutions from one to five or one to three and made into a paste, it is called a mustard plaster. It affords a great relief in bronchitis, pneumonia, etc. and as a counter-irritant over inflamed joints and distended bowels it is our best remedy. A mustard bath to relieve convulsions is a time-honored treatment. A little mixed in a cup of water and taken internally is an excellent emetic in cases of poisoning.

There will be room on the second shelf for medicines prescribed by your physician for some certain ailment or illness.

THE bottom shelf contains the medical and surgical accessories which every mother should keep on hand for emergency use. These should be replaced and replenished after use so they will always be ready.

A clinical thermometer might be called a necessity, and it often is a guide as to when to send for a physician. Every mother should learn how to use and care for a thermometer before the occasion arises when it is needed. Ask your physician or a nurse how to read it and how to shake down the column of mercury after use. A special rectal thermometer should be used for babies and young children. It is not possible to obtain an accurate reading from placing the thermometer under the arm or in the groin. The rectal temperature is usually about one degree higher than by the mouth, and no amount of crying can raise the temperature a fraction of a degree. After using the thermometer it should be thoroughly shaken down, washed in cold water and rubbed well with a clean towel. If hot water is used it will break the glass. It is always well to bear in mind that very slight causes can send up the temperature in small children, but a continued temperature may be serious and always requires the attention of a physician.

A hot-water bottle and fountain syringe are also part of the equipment. It is well to have a pair of scissors on hand and a cup and spoon, a glass medicine-dropper and a small glass graduate for measuring fluids. A paper of safety-pins, a cake of castile soap, a flashlight or candle with a box of safety matches should all be in readiness. A five-yard roll of adhesive plaster one and half inches in width, which can be cut into narrower widths if desired, several one and three inch bandages, a package of sterile gauze and soft old muslin or linen are also necessary.

Several one-ounce packages of absorbent cotton should always be on hand. A package of wooden toothpicks will be helpful in making cotton swabs or applicators.

Stearate of zinc powder can be purchased in a tin can with a shaker top and is useful for skin irritations, chafing, sunburns, etc. It is a wise plan to have a half ounce of liquid collodion or liquid court plaster for slight cuts and abrasions. A tube of petroleum jelly and a tube of zinc-oxid ointment complete the articles recommended for the botton shelf.

CLARA NOYES outlines nine rules to be observed when you give medicine:

1. Never give medicine in the dark. Read the label three times—before taking it off the shelf, before pouring, and after pouring.
2. Shake any liquid medicine.
3. Turn the label up when pouring. This keeps it clean.
4. Think of what you are doing. Never speak or listen to any one when you are measuring medicine.
5. Give just the amount ordered, not one drop more or less. While pouring hold the medicine glass with the mark of the right amount on the level with your eye.
6. Cork the bottle at once. Some medicines get stronger, others weaker when uncorked.
7. Read the label the third time.
8. Give the dose.
9. After a dose of unpleasant medicine, give water, a cracker or a peppermint.

I believe, too, that even in talking to babies we should try to convey a definite meaning by the use of definite words. If we call our child "naughty baby" in dulcet, endearing tones after a show of temper on his part, we can hardly blame him for being unresponsive to the meaning of the words when used later on. Such words as disobedient, naughty, bad, should never be used carelessly. From the very beginning all corrections should be made in a firm, serious tone, and never in one that displays aggravation, temper or loss of self-control.

The "ta-ta" most babies are taught to say when given something is usually their first direct lesson in manners. The two syllables slide over very easily into "thank you" when the child begins to talk and certainly help to cultivate a grateful attitude of mind.

A squealing, loud-voiced child betrays his home environment. We should never forget what sensitive, imitative little beings children are; and from the first we should speak to them in quiet tones and answer them only when they ask a courteous, soft-voiced question.

Lessons in table manners should begin with the very first meal at which a spoon is held. A child can be taught to hold the utensil with the forefinger and thumb, much as you hold a lead-pencil. Do not let him grasp it in his fist. Often this fist-hold is allowed, as it seems a bit easier, but I have seen big children still clinging to the custom. A habit so ingrained is difficult to break. And speaking of table manners, your little savage, when first learning to eat a soft cereal, will often proudly suck it off the spoon and gurgle with delight over the accomplishment, enjoying especially the fascinating noise. This may be cunning in the beginning, but beware of the obstinacy of the habit.

Oftentimes a child has to be taught to chew; and remember this is as important for his health as it is for his manners. Many grown-ups gulp down their food as if they had no teeth. Can not this habit be traced back to early babyhood?

The most approved modern method for the breaking of a colt is by kindness. Therefore our little human animals will learn better through well-balanced kindness than through continual punishments. Gain your child's confidence, be very friendly, do not talk down to him. Keep your prestige by being consistent; do not threaten and not live up to it. Never punish for one thing one day and not the next.

Order and neatness are the twin sisters of good manners. One of the surest ways to teach tidiness is to make a constant appeal to the esthetic sense. Call the child's attention to his toys neatly standing in a row; show him his clothes neatly piled and stimulate his desire to reach the same results.

I do not believe it is a lesson in good manners to ridicule a child or to play up one child against another. Avoid in every way possible making a youngster self-conscious—it is better to let most things slide than correct him before people.

For children between the first and second year I think a mother will find many valuable suggestions in Froebel's "Mother Play."

A woman friend of mine serves as one of the best examples I have ever seen of the success of Froebel's principles, though she had never seen his book. She was a widow who lived in an isolated community far from relatives and friends, and she allowed her only child, a little boy, to share in all her household activities. At the age of two he had his own little implements; when his mother swept, he helped with his own little broom; when she scrubbed the floor, it was his special delight to help also; and the damage to his clean rompers seemed of minute importance. He helped in the task of feeding the chickens and pigs, and was gleeful when allowed to wheel home the provisions from the country store. His mother brought him on a visit to us when he was two and a half years old, and I never saw a more capable, thoughtful and well-disciplined child.

I am writing of this as a suggestion to you to allow your child to find some of his "recreation" in work, for the dignity and self-respect acquired in being helpful are a splendid basis on which to rear good manners.

diabetes an overweighted and presumably an underexercised body runs the risk of losing its power to use sugar and starch normally.

This means we must do what we can to keep from getting too fat—no simple program for those who come by it all too naturally.

A great many people are fat because they eat too much. That is the unpleasant and brutal truth. Help may be given these overweights by changes in diet and exercise, and in the person's point of view toward food, exercise and fat.

There are, however, some fat people whose problem of reducing is less simple. Even with exercise and a restricted diet the pounds roll up. These overweights must go to a medical expert for help, since their excess fat may result in part from the failure of some bodily function.

There is no royal road to getting thin for those whose dietary indiscretions have brought them to the pass of being classed as fat men or women. I know of few things harder than for the fat person with a good appetite and a frank fondness for tempting food to try to get thin. Reducing for such a person takes real character and is often real punishment, for it consists in a continued series of denials in the way of food and penalties in the way of exercise. Life loses, for a time at least, part of its charm. It has its reward finally, however, in the feeling of self-respect which comes with physical improvement.

It may be of help to mention one of the reasons why after we grow up some of us eat "not wisely, but too well." Eating is a pleasure as well as a necessity to most of us. When for any reason our lives are strained, when worries crowd upon us, when dissatisfaction overbalances satisfaction in our day's activities, we automatically try to make up to ourselves for the painfulness of these experiences. Some of us find real compensation in eating at such a time, and even after the worry has gone the pleasure in good food continues and, unfortunately, we continue to eat too much.

Would you like to weigh less? The Home-Making Department has suggestions for a weight-reducing diet which tells you which foods to avoid and plans reducing-meals for you. A SUBTLE DIFFERENCE

Modistes say that just half an inch more or less across the shoulders makes all the difference between the fashionable straight back and a lumpy "dowager" line.

But you can reduce just the part of your body that mars your style. "Reducing in Spots," the new DELINEATOR booklet, illustrates and describes exercises to correct each fault. The exercises have been prepared by Dr. Lillian E. Shaw, a specialist in physical education and in health education. She knows just the exercises that are healthful for women and the ones that will achieve the desired results.

Send twenty-five cents in stamps to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building New York, N. Y., and ask for "Reducing in Spots."

THE INCREASING PURPOSE

always been. And it was when the war was over, at this time of Sim's visit, that Andrew sometimes halted in his pursuit of Linda.

He halts. He looks at her, across their costly table, across a gleaming dance floor, broodingly, estimatingly.

Then she catches his eye—Sim would see it—and she flashes at him that radiant smile of hers and he is bewitched and he smiles back.

How long?

WHEN Sim had been at Charles's house, he had been among the streets and places where he had known Elizabeth Glade, to whom solely in all the world (if only he could find her) he felt that he could confide the strange reasons which had caused him to abandon his army career and now to be drifting vaguely in search of—what? He did not know.

If only he could find her!

Charles might know. He had not, somehow, liked to write and ask Charles—but it was easy to ask him indirectly when, during his visit, the talk turned on old friends in the neighborhood.

"And what's become of the Glades?" he had asked.

Charles had stared at him. "Why, you know what happened to old Glade, don't you?" he demanded.

Sim said: "I only read the smallest bit of it in a newspaper some man had out there. It did astonish me. I was sorry about it. Only I hadn't much leisure either for astonishment or regret when I saw that paper, we were in the thick of a push."

Charles responded: "You hadn't much reason, either, not for being sorry. Glade got what he deserved."

Sim did not take this up. "It was bad luck on the girl, on his daughter, on Elizabeth," he said.

Charles shrugged.

"What happened to her?"

Charles had not the faintest idea.

Come to Mayfair Street, and in Andrew to another possible source of information, Sim early in his stay put the same question—but he put it to Andrew more narrowly to his purpose. What had become of that girl they used to know, Elizabeth Glade?

He had the same answer. Andrew hadn't a notion.

Sim went yet further. "How do you suppose I could find out?"

"Haven't an earthly idea," said Andrew.

They were at breakfast and Linda, never out of a conversation at which she was present, and for once present at the early meal, must needs strike in: "Why do you want to find out, Sim?"

"Because I want to know," said Sim. "Yah!"

His exchanges with Linda were always on a note of high raillery, and this "Yah!" was the signal between them of a firm snub.

Linda cried: "Not so much of your yahing—yet, Mr. Cleverboots. Wait till I've done. What is she like, this Elizabeth?"

"Go on with your breakfast," said Sim.

"Is she pretty?"

"Prettier than you, anyway."

"Tush, she couldn't be. Are you in love with her, Sim?"

"Niggs, make your wife eat and not talk so much."

Linda stuck out her fork triumphantly toward Sim. "You are, you are, fiddlededar! Andrew, Sim's in love, that's what's the matter with him. I've discovered it. He's in love with this Elizabeth creature." She waved the fork in Sim's direction. "He is, he is, fiddlededizl! Look at him blushing!"

Sim, beneath her fire, was slightly red. To cover it, "Niggs, your wife's table manners would make any one blush," he said. "She oughtn't to be allowed a fork—she ought to be fed."

Andrew, who never bantered, deep in the Financial Times, only grunted.

"All the same," said Linda, "if the match is desirable—who's her father, this Glade creature?"

"He's dead," said Sim flatly.

"Oh! Well, we all do that in time, even the best of us. There's no great harm in that. If the match is desirable, as I shall make it my business to discover, I shall simply push you into it. Every man ought to marry. An unmarried man is a walking crime and ought to be hung. And what you're waiting for, goodness only knows."

"I'm waiting," Sim parried, "as I've told you, to find some one as lovely as you."

Linda threw him a kiss.

"There's only one I know," Sim went on, "and she's booked up pretty heavily, I should imagine. You're very like her, Linda, I always think—you've the same rattle about you wherever you are that she has on the stage." He named a famous dancer. "I mean Gaby Delorme."

"Well, Gaby has points," accepted Linda, well enough pleased.

"She has one over you, Linda. It made me laugh when I saw her do it on the stage the other night. She powders her legs."

"That's all right," Linda returned. "I powder mine, don't I, Andrew?"

Andrew, behind his paper, said gravely. "I have seen you do it."

"Lucky man!" Linda cried. "Isn't he, now, Sim?"

"Now I do blush for you," said Sim. "I am pained and I am going."

He rose and went toward the door. He was glad of the opportunity to close the Elizabeth subject. "I sha'n't be in to lunch. I've something on."

Linda fired a last shot. "You needn't be mysterious about it. It's looking for Elizabeth, I'll lay the odds."

SIM was looking for Elizabeth Glade, not on that morning in particular, but daily, as he went about, by keeping his eyes open. He wanted her very much. They had been very good friends, though meeting rarely, in the days before the war. When the war broke out, he had been spending a six-weeks' leave at Charles's house and had seen her frequently, and their friendship had developed. The war caused in it a further development. When he went to say goodby to her, "I shall write to you," Elizabeth told him. If there had been no war, if he had been going abroad merely to rejoin his regiment for the customary peace service, it is improbable that, of her own initiative, she ever would have written to him. Whatever might have been her secret feelings toward him, nothing in the degree of love had passed between them, and initiative in correspondence would have had to come from him. Convention was like that before the war.

But those were emotional moments, that first onset and those early months of the war (disruptive not of artificial convention alone but of old natural laws of intercourse between the sexes). It became among women the vogue, and was counted a right and patriotic vogue, to be writing letters to a man "out there"—and the vogue was followed (earnestly, flippantly or loosely according to the mentality and the morals of the writer) by women of all degrees and all ages. Elizabeth in her letters to Sim revealed herself, her thoughts on life, her feelings about life, in a degree that certainly she never would have disclosed but for the emotional stress under which life was then being lived.

Sim found himself keeping her letters.

Suddenly her letters stopped.

The war surged on. No man who is being swept along a raging flood can give much thought to things upon the bank. Carried on in the tremendous tide of the war, Sim, his letters unanswered, in time found abated in him the sense of disturbance that arose when first Elizabeth's letters ceased.

The change that came to him changed this also. The more deeply he plumbed the impossibility of confiding this matter of his change (as he longed to confide it) to some one—Charles, Andrew, Alice, Linda, his only relatives, impossible all—the more he felt that if he could find Elizabeth——

And suddenly he found her.

THE great Stupendity reception was the chance that Sim, almost foregoing it, took and had reason to be uncommonly glad. Linda was responsible. He had said he would not go. Linda badgered him into changing his mind, and he accompanied her. Andrew also was badgered, but Andrew on principle refused to attend what he called "those indiscriminate shows."

"I don't see how on earth you can call it indiscriminate," Linda argued. "Everybody's going to be there."

"That's what indiscriminate means," said Sim.

"You speak when you're spoken to, young man, and not interfere between husband and wife. Andrew, Stupendity has got a princeling coming (at least Lardy Quinnet swears he has) and chessboards of bishops and barons, and half the cabinet and all the authors and artists. It will be frightfully interesting."

Andrew said fondly: "I'm sure it will, Linda. But you know how I feel about getting into crowds like that—any one can pal up with you in a crowd—that's why I keep out of them. I have to."

Linda tossed up her hands in mock disgust. "Very well. Well, I shall get a divorce if this goes on much longer. I shall turn to you, Sim. Can a woman marry her divorced husband's brother? Find out, will you?"

Sim had something in connection with this affair which he wished to find out on his own account; and driving with Linda to the vast Stupendity department-store building after dinner it was of her he sought it.

"This is all new to me," he said, "this Stupendity boom. Stupendity's had just opened when I was last on leave from India, before the war, and there was fuss enough, Heaven knows. But it seems to have gone miles since then."

"It has," confided Linda, "leagues!" Their car wedged itself firmly into the immense line waiting to approach the entrance and she proceeded to give him an account of the leagues that Stupendity's had gone.

Stupendity's, to edit Linda's rattle, was the greatest department store, not only that the world had ever known, but that the world was ever likely to know. The genius of Mr. Horace Stupendity had established it; and just as there has never been a second Napoleon or a second Shakespeare so was there never likely to be a second Stupendity. This remarkable man, though by all precedent he should have been an American, was not an American but an Englishman. Similarly his name, Stupendity, suiting so well the mammoth emporium he had founded, could not, people said, be his real name. But as to three syllables of its four, it was his real name.

THE grandfather of this astonishing man was one Pendity. In his early age this Pendity was a small grocer in a large town in the north of England; in his middle age he was a considerable grocer in the same town; and in his old age, handing on to his son, father of Horace Stupendity, he was a large grocer with large shops in four large towns. The son, inheriting four shops, bequeathed forty shops. The grandson, Horace, inheriting the forty shops—the Pendity Multiple Shops, as they were called, immediately converted them into a company; sold it; added to the huge profit the interest of wealthy backers; erected in London the greatest shopping block the world had ever known; advertised it by methods of which the world had never thought; took the name of Stupendity; and on a morning never to be forgotten in London, the sky yellow with balloons by day and rainbowed with searchlights and with fireworks by night, hurled open Stupendity's to an astounded public.

This reception was being held to mark the stupendous success within that year of a Stupendity enterprise. The enterprise was to make the Stupendity Dome (that mammoth Dome compared with which the dome of St. Paul's in a bird's-eye view of London simply is not seen because it does not in any degree compare with it) at once the most popular and the most fashionable restaurant in London. No big London store had ever yet had an evening restaurant, so Horace Stupendity decided that Stupendity's should have an evening restaurant. The Dome, from the very first day, became "the thing." "Dine at the Dome" commanded every billboard and every motor-omnibus top in London; "Dine at the Dome" walked ceaselessly by night in letters of fire, round and round the Dome; and in enormous numbers London obeyed these commands and dined there. And all the notabilities who had dined there, and the very few notabilities who had not dined there, were now bidden by Mr. Stupendity to assemble together to celebrate its first anniversary. The heights of the Dome had been made to represent the sky, with stars of electric light twinkling unceasingly. The floor for dancing had been cleared in one place, and for refreshment flowed with wine, shivered with ice-cream and towered with sandwiches in another place. In the center a fountain, parti-colored lights playing upon it, burst into being. On each of the four sides a string band, by turns, burst into music.

Mr. Stupendity received his guests on a circle of blue-plush carpet which stood at the head of a highway of gold-plush carpet up which the guests advanced from the entrance to meet him; liveried attendants cried out their names as they approached. The blue-plush circle being considerably thicker than the gold-plush highway, the great majority of guests, tripping over it, advanced toward the extended hand of Mr. Stupendity with a short, eager rush, which, taking it as a tribute to his popularity, caused immense gratification to Mr. Stupendity.

Sim, looking at the great business genius whom Linda had been describing to him, saw a short small man with a round clean-shaven face and a large and completely bald head. He thus was in appearance as unlike the accepted type of a giant of business as it was possible to be. In manner he was, on the other hand, brusk, uncompromising, decisive, electric-swift, more like the accepted type than the most exaggerated character in fiction or in drama. And no one better knew this (since daily they encountered it) than the two persons who stood now in attendance upon him.

One of these, who stood slightly behind the right elbow of Mr. Stupendity, was a young woman, attractive in a noticeably demure, Quakerish sort of way. She was known, since Mr. Stupendity never was seen anywhere without her, as Mr. Stupendity's shadow. She was, in fact, his personal secretary. Her name was Miss Marr.

The other attendant upon Mr. Stupendity appeared to have no settled position upon the blue-plush plot, as had Miss Marr. This was a tall, slim and extremely good-looking young man. His name was Mr. Lardy Quinnet, a relation of Lord Staverton.

SIM had met Lardy Quinnet in France during the war. "Hul-lo, Sim," Mr. Quinnet, now encountering him, very heartily greeted him. "Come where the drink runs cold—and free," and he liberally helped Sim and then himself.

"Now try one of these smokes, old man," Lardy went on gaily. "They're good. I nominated them for this show myself."

Sim took a cigaret. "That's what I want to ask you, Lardy—your connection with Stupendity's. I'd no idea you were in this game when I met you out there. What department do you serve in, Lardy, gents' hose and headgear?"

"No, ladies' underwear, old man. As a matter of fact, Sim, what I am is—and you've only to look at me to see it—what I am is a Brain. I am, old man, from my heels to my head, one living, pulsing, twisting Brain."

"Does it hurt?" inquired Sim.

"Here and there, old man, here and there. It's a terrific thing, I tell you, to be simply a Brain—" He broke off. "Isn't it, Miss Marr?" he said.

The little brown shadow, shadowing Mr. Stupendity, had appeared beside them. Mr. Stupendity, engaged in conversation, was a few feet away; his shadow, standing near Sim, gave Lardy Quinnet her cold attention.

"I have no idea what you were talking about, Mr. Quinnet."

"Brain, my dear Miss Marr."

"I couldn't conceive a subject you know less of. Will you attend, please?" Her manner was utterly businesslike. "Mr. Stupendity wishes some ideas for a Tool Week in the ironmongery department. He desires a complete scheme from each of the Intelligence Staff by midday to-morrow. Miss Glade will come for your dictation at nine-thirty."

Mr. Stupendity had moved on. His shadow immediately followed him.

But Sim had caught eagerly at a name mentioned. "Glade, did she say, Lardy? Who is Miss Glade?"

Lardy returned to his glass and to his companion. "I'm engaged to that girl," he announced.

Sim had a chill.

"To Miss Glade?"

"Glade? No. To Miss Marr."

Sim was surprised. The markedly frigid manner of Miss Marr had not suggested betrothed relations. "By Jove, I congratulate you, Lardy. She's uncommonly pretty."

"She's not only pretty," declared Lardy, "she's a marvel, a Living Marvel. I tell you, Sim, that girl——"

"Half a minute, old man! Tell me first about the other girl. Who's this Miss Glade? I used to know——"

He was to be disappointed. "Haven't a notion," said Lardy. "Sort of idea she's an old-timer on Miss Marr's stenographic staff. Miss Marr will tell you if you're interested. She can tell anybody anything, that girl. A marvel. We'll go and talk to her—" He broke off. "Just half a minute——"

He dashed for his half-minute to a young man much of his own type thrown toward them by the ever-moving throng; and high merriment arising between the two, and the half-minute appearing likely to develop into a half-hour, Sim, thinking eagerly of this possible chance of news of Elizabeth Glade, wound his way alone toward Miss Marr from whom possibly it might be forthcoming.

HE CAME up to her at a moment when Mr. Stupendity stood within a close knot of friends, thus permitting his shadow to be more or less at ease. Very earnest in his quest, Sim did not hesitate to speak.

"You'll forgive me introducing myself, Miss Marr? I'm an old friend of Lardy Quinnet's. He's just told me that he is engaged to you. I want to con——"

"He's nothing of the sort," replied Miss Marr. The words had of themselves a sharp sound, and for the moment they took Sim aback. He was quick to detect in them, however, and in the expression of Miss Marr's face as she uttered them, a pretty petulance rather than a sharpness. "I've told him so over and over again," she added, and now permitted her petulance to melt into a very friendly smile.

It was reasonably clear to Sim that if the two were not officially engaged they in all probability ultimately would be, and he assumed a line suitable to the assumption. "Of course Lardy is a licensed idiot," he remarked cheerfully.

"They've no right to license him, whoever does it," returned Miss Marr, now smiling delightfully. "The license ought to be revoked and the man shut up. He's simply a goose let loose."

"He told me one thing I should say is true," said Sim, "that you were a living marvel. I perceive you are a poet also—a goose let loose goes well."

Miss Marr laughed. "Why, with that for an example, I'll grant you more poet than marvel, and we'll agree on that. You are Major Paris, aren't you?"

"And he told me you know everything," said Sim. "Though how——"

Miss Marr laughed again. "That was simple. My informant is behind you."

Sim turned and saw radiant Linda, within a ring-fence of men.

"Ah, my lovely sister-in-law," said Sim, looking again at Miss Marr.

"She is lovely," agreed Miss Marr.

"But it's not about her, nor, to be honest, really to congratulate you, that I came over to speak to you. Miss Marr, what I wanted to ask you is, have you a girl on your staff called Glade?"

"Not on my staff. I wish she were. She's good. Miss Glade is one of my emergency-calls. I get her when I want her, if she is available. What about her, Major Paris?"

"What is she like? What's her Christian name?"

"She's dark, slim, pretty—Elizabeth, I think her name is."

Sim had a thrill.

"I used to know her. I want to get in touch with her. Do you know where she lives?"

Miss Marr did not know. "It's funny that I don't, but she's got her own secretarial connection, you know, and whenever she has a spare hour or so—she works much too hard, that girl—she rings me up to see if anything is doing. Of course I easily can find out her address for you. She——"

Miss Marr's eyes had glanced across the room and her voice went up a scale. "Why, there's a man who will tell you everything about her. Miss Glade works for him regularly. That man by the woman in red."

Sim very eagerly followed her indication. "That chap. By Jove, that's a face I know."

Linda, unperceived, had slipped through her ring-fence and was beside them. "That face," she joined in. "Well, Sim, you ought to know it. Everybody knows that face. It glooms at you from all the bookstalls and half the illustrated papers. That face belongs to the author of 'If Harvest Fails.' That's B. C. D. Ash—B. C. D., as every one calls him—the superfamous novelist man."

Sim said: "Well, I'm dashed. I knew him out in France. He was attached to us with

1 youngster out of 3 has Goiter

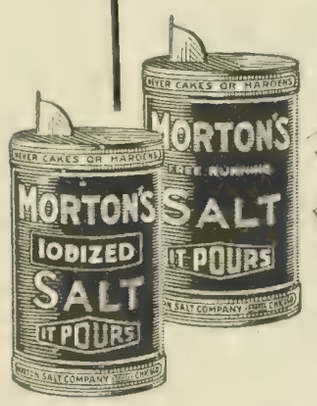
Yet none need suffer. This new table salt prevents it

Are your children sleepy, run down, backward in their studies?

It may be that they are developing simple goiter. Few under 18 escape. And 3 times as many girls as boys have it.

In any case, be on the safe side. Get Morton's Iodized Salt at your grocer's today. Use it in cooking; on the table. It is good for the entire family.

It is a perfect preventive of goiter—proved so by thousands of physicians who recommend it.



It tastes and looks the same as our famous salt that "pours."

The only difference is that it contains a trace of iodine. For famous doctors have proved that if the health governing thyroid gland in the neck receives proper iodine it will not enlarge and form a goiter.

Food and water usually fail to supply this iodine. So noted food experts asked us to prepare this iodized salt so that all might be saved from goiter.

Paris Knows

The utmost ways to beauty

By Edna Wallace Hopper

As a girl I went to Paris with my mother to find the utmost in beauty aids. The helps French experts gave me made me a famous beauty. I won on the stage a glorious career.

I went again and again. French scientists gave me their latest discoveries. As a result, I have kept my beauty. After 35 years in the limelight, I still look a girl of 19. Thousands of young girls envy me my hair and my complexion.

Now, in gratitude, I place these helps at every woman's call. All druggists and toilet counters supply them in my name. They form, beyond doubt, the greatest beauty helps in existence. Try a free sample of one of them. See what they can do.

Two Super-Creams

My Facial Youth is a liquid cleanser which I found in France. The greatest beauty experts now advise this formula. It contains no animal, no vegetable fat, so the skin cannot absorb it. It simply cleans to the depths, then departs. You will never realize what a clean skin means until you once employ it.

My Youth Cream is a cold cream, made to embody a dozen of the best helps I have found. It also comes in vanishing type. It contains products of both lemon and strawberry, also the utmost modern science knows to foster, feed and protect the skin. I am never an hour without it, day or night. Let it show you the ways to what it brought to me.

White Youth Clay

A new-type clay, white, refined and dainty. Based on 20 years of scientific study. Vastly different from the crude and muddy clays so many have employed.

It purges the skin of all that clogs and mars it. Removes the causes of blackheads and blemishes. Brings the blood to the skin to nourish and revive it. The result is a rosy afterglow which amazes and delights. Combats all lines and wrinkles, reduces enlarged pores.

This is the chief of all beauty essentials. In 30 minutes, girls multiply their beauty and women seem to drop ten years. When you once see its results you will never go without it.

My Hair Youth

To this I owe my luxuriant hair, thick and lustrous, finer far than 40 years ago. I have never had falling hair or dandruff, and never a touch of gray. It combines the best all hair experts have taught me.

Hair Youth is concentrated. I apply it with an eyedropper directly to the scalp—a little at a time. There it combats the hardened oil and dandruff which stifle the hair roots. It tones and stimulates. It does for the scalp what cultivation does for a garden. There is no other hair help in the world which combines what my Hair Youth does. An eyedropper comes with it.

All druggists and toilet counters now supply Edna Wallace Hopper's beauty aids exactly as I use them. The best my world-search has found. This coupon will bring you a sample of any with my latest Beauty Book. Clip coupon now and tell me the one which you prefer. Do this for beauty's sake.

some labor-battalion people. We were rather pals. But never dreamt of connecting him with all this 'If Harvest Fails' fuss—I knew he was a writer, too." He turned to Miss Marr. "And he knows this Miss Glade? This is luck. I'm right for him."

He nodded to Miss Marr, smiled at Linda, and set his way quickly toward the author.

THE superfamous novelist was occupied, as Sim made toward him, in moving about in a very curious manner indeed. He would proceed a few swift paces in one direction, then start violently, halt abruptly, look agonizingly about him in a scared way, and then fly off more swift paces at a sharp tangent to his former direction. When Sim, tracking him down with considerable difficulty, suddenly by a swift sidestep countered an equally swift sidestep on his part and thus stood immediately face to face with him, the author of "If Harvest Fails" without any form of salutation, though he had not seen Sim for three years, thus very strangely addressed him:

"Stand absolutely still, Sim, will you, like a good chap? Whatever you do, don't move your head."

His voice was agitated and low, and his own head he held with such stiffness in the exact line of Sim's that Sim could see the jerky movement of his throat muscles.

"Say when," said Sim, mystified but amused.

The head of the superfamous novelist inclined a trembling shade to the right, his eyes, charged with the poignant expression of a beast in a slaughter-house, directed themselves over Sim's shoulder. "All right, now," he said.

His voice gave to the words the sound of a great amen, the terrible rigidity of his person relaxed, he shuddered violently, and he blew his nose with considerable emotion. "Gosh!" he said. And he then said, relieved, "Hullo, Sim. I say, I am jolly glad to see you again."

"I'm jolly glad to see you," Sim returned. "But what's the alarm? Are you hiding from some one?"

The man blew his nose again. "I'm always hiding," he said.

He always was. The habitual look of this remarkable man—a youngish-looking man wearing rimless spectacles—was the look of a man in imminent peril of at any moment being arrested; which, in the considered judgment of the great majority of the literary critics and intellectuals, he not only deserved to be, but, as they said, if literature were properly appreciated and protected in this country, would have been long ago. It was partly the illustrious novelist's knowledge of this, partly a total incapacity to hold his own in the conversation of the circles into which by his fame he had quite unintentionally sprung, and partly many grave defects in the working of the organs of his digestion that caused him, as he had told Sim, to spend the greater part of his time in hiding, and it was partly because his surname was so insignificantly short while his initials were so impressively long, and partly because his Christian name was neither stated upon his books nor familiar in the mouths of the public, that he was always known, as Linda would say, by his Christian initials, "B. C. D."

This, then, was the man whom Sim now very cheerfully greeted and who with evident sincerity very gladly greeted Sim. "For I've often thought of you, Sim," said B. C. D., "and wished I could run into you again. We rather hit it off, do you remember?"

Sim warmly agreed; reference was made to "uncommon good talks together out there"; Sim declared that he now must fall into the general line and call this superfamous friend B. C. D.; B. C. D. assenting, staved off the congratulations of Sim; and, these exchanges pleasantly rattled through and concluded, said Sim: "But there's a thing I particularly want of you, B. C. D. You've a secretary, haven't you?"

The face of B. C. D. clouded. "I have."

"Called Glade, Elizabeth Glade?"

The famous novelist shook his famous head. "I wish she were. Note that I say 'were,' Sim, not 'was.' The critics declare that I can't write grammar, so I've bought an 'English Grammar' and really am doing rather well. But, my secretary—no, not Glade; my secretary's called Artifex—she treats me as an elderly aunt treats a small nephew and I'm frightened of her and I hate her. But I know a Miss Glade, an Elizabeth Glade."

Sim exclaimed: "You do? Tell me about her."

B. C. D. told. Pretty, dark, pale, worked too hard, he thought—did secretarial work for him when he wanted her.

"She comes to me to-morrow, at three," B. C. D. concluded. "If you want to meet her——"

"I very much do. B. C. D.—funny how natural it comes to call you B. C. D., but I've heard it everywhere——"

The famous novelist sighed. "I know. Yes?"

"Why, I very much do want to see this Elizabeth Glade. B. C. D., do you remember in our talks out there talking about things a girl used to write me in letters—rather deepish things?"

"Perfectly well. You read me some."

"Well, this was the girl."

B. C. D. was immensely interested. "It's extraordinary. You are sure it's the same?"

"Positive. It must be her."

"She," corrected B. C. D.; "must be she, not her. I'm a tiger for faulty grammar these days. But seriously, Sim, this is fine." He had been watching Sim's face through all this and, lamentable though were his excursions in literature, he was not without sympathetic insight. "I tell you what we'll do, old man. You come to my place to-morrow afternoon and meet the girl. I'll clear out and leave you to tea together."

"You're a brick, B. C. D."

"Not a bit. You will have a heap to talk about, and I'll clear out and leave you to it. Twenty-four Hunter Street, Bloomsbury, is my address—just off Bloomsbury Square."

Sim made a note of it. "Not that it's necessary." He smiled. "I'm not likely to forget it. I lost sight of her. I've been wanting to find her again, badly, for a long time."

B. C. D. said gravely: "Remembering those letters and by what I've seen of her, I can imagine it, Sim."

Sim touched his hand. "I like you, B. C. D."

"I like you, Sim."

They had moved toward the door and the world-famous novelist, looking all about him like a hunted stag, grabbed at Sim's hand in farewell. "I'm going like a greased flash, Sim. I've a chance now, and if I don't take it I'm done."

HE FLED five quick paces to one exit, stopped violently, abruptly turned, and with even quicker paces fled through another.

Sim, had he been able to follow him and to have known his thoughts, would have seen him plunge for one of the four great elevators; swerve from its occupants like a shying horse; stampede into another; crimson painfully at a whisper among its crowded occupants of "That's the author of 'If Harvest Fails' "; nervously take his hat and coat from a superb attendant, make a false shot for the revolving door, find himself wedged in a compartment of it on the heels of a stout lady who cried, "Oh, oh, oh!" stagger through it upon her heels and rush miserably away into the open.

"Good night, Mr. Ash," said a commissionnaire whom the famous but unhappy man never in his life had seen before.

"This is awful," muttered B. C. D. He had a car, but never used it. Taxicabs awaited him in long lines, but he never rode in taxicabs. A bus took him to Bloomsbury Square. Beneath a lamp-post, as he hurried along the pavement, stood two young women. They stared at him, but he avoided their stare. He heard them speak, he then heard called after him, "If Harvest Fails——"

"This is frightful," muttered the author, hurrying.

At the corner was a policeman who looked at him steadily.

"Good night," said the famous novelist, hurrying.

"Good night to you, Mr. Ash," said the policeman.

"This is simply unbearable," said the world-famous novelist and wanely let himself into No. 24.

SIM was early at the house of B. C. D. Ash on the afternoon of the morrow. No. 24 Hunter Street presented itself to him as a typical Bloomsbury house in a typical Bloomsbury thoroughfare. And there was further presented to him when he knocked the sound of an upper window being very cautiously raised and the sight of the world-known head of the world-known novelist very cautiously projecting itself therefrom.

At sight of Sim looking up from below, the world-known head thrust itself boldly into full view. "Hullo, Sim. My landlady's out. I'll chuck down the latch-key. Catch! Let yourself in, Sim, and come straight up."

Sim, proceeding as directed and wondering a little at the description "landlady" as applied to a member of the domestic staff of a world-famous novelist, found the great author himself at the head of the flight. was warmly greeted and conducted into a large front room. He looked curiously about him. Comfortably but very plainly furnished; decorated with a few admirable dry points and with a few books; markedly tidy; its principal content an immense table obviously used as a writing-table; revealing a bedroom through partially opened folding doors. The room was obviously a workroom and the workroom of an incredibly orderly-minded man, but it was not (to Sim) as obviously the room of a man credited with earning more royalties in a month than a streetful of novelists in a lifetime.

But he said politely: "This is a nice room, B. C. D."

"It's good," agreed the author proudly. "This is my bedroom." He pushed open the folding doors and Sim was shown a bedroom, overlooking a mews, as exquisitely neat as was the other apartment, shoes in trees perfectly alined, trousers in press, a green canvas bath in one corner, a spirit stove, shining like new silver, and tea-making materials neatly arranged on a low table in another.

"Convenient, opening into one another like that," said the novelist, proudly returning with Sim into the front apartment.

"Very," said Sim and then voiced the bepuzzlement that had him. "Do you live here, B. C. D.?"

The author of "If Harvest Fails" regarded him with a curious look. "I inhabit here," he said.

"That's evidently got some special meaning. What's rather puzzling me, B. C. D., is that this morning at the club I saw a whole page in an illustrated weekly giving photographs of the interiors of your London residence, as the paper called it. The rooms were what I call devilish swagger. But I didn't see this room, B. C. D.——"

"What you saw," said the great novelist gravely, "is, as the paper no doubt said, where I live. This place wasn't in the pictures because this is where I inhabit. Of course you won't give me away, Sim, so I'll let you into a secret. That infernal house you saw pictured is one of the things I got rushed into. Miss Artifex, my official secretary, is another. She runs the place—it's in Green Street, off Park Lane—and the butler and his wife and a chauffeur and his wife and one or two other creatures, I believe, all of whom I'm frightened of, particularly the butler. About two nights a week I creep in there after they've all gone to sleep and rumple the bed. The rest of the time, as I say, I inhabit this place, where I do everything for myself, just as I used to before all this fuss, and am entirely happy—or as happy as I can ever expect to be these days. I've no immediate relatives, you know, and I'm working and nice Miss Glade comes to me in the afternoons and——"

A KNOCKING on the door interrupted him. "There she is, Sim. That's her code knock. Look out, old man, and see if it is your Miss Glade." Sim drew a quick breath and went to the window and looked out.

He drew in. "It is, B. C. D.," he said.

B. C. D. saw emotion in his face. He went to his bedroom and brought hat and stick from it. "I'll let her in and send her up," he said. "I'll stagger off somewhere, and you'll be alone. I'll not tell her you are here, shall I?"

"No," Sim said.

"Right. She knows where to make the tea and all that. Stay as long as you like. I'm going to range about on Hempstead Heath. Good-by, old man."

He was gone before Sim could thank him.

In a minute were sounds of feet lightly up the stairs; the door then opened.

Sim said: "Elizabeth!"

The slim, pale girl, arrested on the threshold, framed in the doorway, put her hand to her heart. "Oh, Sim!"

He had often thought and thought how, when he found her, should he greet her? With some commonplace; with some light word? With some accustomed opening; with some gay banter? He had thought and thought— What, when she first saw him, would she say? That this was strange; that this was good? That it was years and years; that it seemed only yesterday?

They met. His sole word was the word, her name, "Elizabeth!" His voice, which in his thoughts had challenged her, contained no challenge, had no ring. Her name went from him quietly, on a strange note, almost hushed—"Elizabeth!"

And she, "Oh, Sim!" Not greeting, not joy; rather a stifling, as it were, of pain. "Oh, Sim!"—a piteous expostulation.

He had thought and thought— How, after greeting, would he go on? Moved, as he was not prepared to be moved, by sight of her; conscious now of emotions he unconsciously had nursed, he was held mute, he could not go on.

He said at last: "After so long."

She said: "So very long, Sim," and touched the hand that he extended.

She closed the door and went past him into the room.

He just stood there, silent.

She began to take off the wrap she wore. "Why are you here?" she asked.

He used only five words. "I knew Ash in France."

A very great and terrible restraint was on them. Her wrap removed, she began at her hat. "I am here to work, you know," she said.

He told her: "I know that."

She put off her hat and, at a loss then for what else immediately to do, she faced him. "Well, well," she said. It was a kind of dismissal; a kind of "Well, we've met again; that's all over; now I must get on with things."

THERE was a deep couch, upholstered in leather, against one window. He went to it and sat down. "Come and sit here, Elizabeth. We have to talk."

She came.

She was dressed very simply in black, white at her wrists, white at her throat, where a broad silk collar fell. He saw in her the girl that he remembered; saw the soft olive of her skin, warmed on her cheeks as faintly reddens in the sun a ripened peach; saw how her hair's soft brown caressed her brow; and how her eyes, home of a spirit, kind, maternal, were fringed with lashes that a breath, they were so long and dense and soft, would stir; and how the broad mouth, denying her face a classic beauty, spoke in its width (it is the sign) her intellectuality. These he had seen of old in careless days. Now saw he also, graven in those eyes and on that mouth, the image of the inner self she had revealed him in those revealing letters she had sent him in the war; now saw he the chasings that the new and hidden years had chiseled on the old, the bloom paled over, the soft curves sharpened down (as of resources deeply drawn upon), a droop of lids, of lips, as of resistance almost out.

He said: "I have wanted you, Elizabeth." He had thought and thought— How, when finding her, he should tell her how he had wanted her. Should he begin to tell her why? How tell the vague perplexity, the impulse without direction, the call without place of call, that in cold words must sound so vain, so futile, so self-esteemed? Now, after a space, she asked him why he had wanted her; and not the thoughts he had rehearsed, but revelation came to him by this contact with her and gave him his answer.

"Why have you wanted me, Sim?"

He said: "Because I love you, Elizabeth."

She began to cry.

He had put one arm about her. Her hands, which with the other hand he had sought to take, she had slipped from him and put against her face. He used that hand to hold her to him, her face against his shoulder.

When she was stilled, not questioning yet her grief, "I love you, Elizabeth," he said again.

She said, her voice catching: "Sim, there never has been a word of love between us."

"But I love you, Elizabeth."

She essayed to put herself upright and from him. "Sim, I am not to be loved."

He restrained her. "Turn your face to me, Elizabeth."

"Sim, I am not to be loved."

"Turn your face to me, Elizabeth."

She turned her face to his. He kissed her. She sighed profoundly and lay within his arms.

That profound sigh she gave, a deep and single pulse of all her forces, vital and spiritual; and that relax into his arms, a subjection to him, profound and unreserved, of all her being, mental and physical—these seemed to say: "Oh, let me sleep!" And a long time, as if she slept, he held her.

She had said, "Not to be loved"; but here in that sleep within his arms was her abandonment to love; and of the state of love—not of the processes of love, nor of love's deeds, nor even of the thoughts of love—but of the sheer state of loving, how writes the pen? For if to render life is the office of art, then art of loving is mute—for love is mute. It is not by their words that lovers love. Language with all its words has given only three to lovers. Jealous of even three it gives to the lover, seeking to express to himself his state, but two alone—"I love."

Mutely—his spirit joined with hers in passage to transcendental planes—mutely in that communion those words were told by them. In a while, the flight dissolved, its spell like afterglow upon them, words came and these he floated to her in that sleep of hers, lamps floated in the darkness down a gentle stream; and her murmured answers floated back, airs murmured through a grove at dawn—that it was wonderful, this mutual love, at reencounter, with no word gone before; that he had loved her since her letters and not till now had known it love; that she had always loved him; murmurs, tones scarcely heard, hushed litanies.

At last she sighed again and stirred—one who returned now from dream to life, from sleep to load—and she began to move herself from where, abandoned to a dream, she had reposed. The dream abandoning, "But, Sim, not to be loved," she said.

He let her from his arms. "Elizabeth, why do you say you are not to be loved?"

As though the words, her words by him repeated, returned to her a vow, momentarily set down, remorsefully reassumed, she with suddenness completed her motion from him and set herself upright.

"Sim, it is so. Not to be loved. Things have happened to me, Sim. My father——"

He sought to fill that unhappy breach: "I knew there had been some trouble."

"How much did you know, Sim?"

He put a hand on her hands. "Elizabeth, I never heard the story—I only heard the fact—that he had been charged with something——"

She said, "Embezzlement."

"Something, I don't know—I don't mind. All that I mind is that you look ill, overwrought, unhappy. All that I know is that I have found you. All that I care is that you say you are not to be loved. Elizabeth, you are not telling me that you are doing the silly stuff they only do in books—telling me you are not to be loved because your father was charged——"

"Sim, he was convicted. They made him a convict."

He pressed her hands. "Not to be loved because your father was a—" he balked the evil word—"went to prison? You couldn't tell me that, Elizabeth."

She shook her head. "It's not that, Sim. When this happened, this dreadful thing, to my poor father—when it happened I thought of you, and I knew it never would make any difference in you. But, Sim, it has made a difference to me. It made me not to be loved—not because my father had sinned—but for a binding and sacred reason, Sim."

"Tell me," he said.

She said: "I will tell you it all, Sim—all that happened—and you will see why I am not to be loved, Sim."

SHE told him.

Her father, a lawyer, had been sole trustee of a sum of money, five thousand pounds, held for two sisters and the interest on which he paid equally to the two, elderly maiden ladies by name Andiron, Gertrude and Anne. When one should die, the capital was to be handed over to the survivor.

"Sim," she said—and he could feel her hands in her intensity squeeze his own—"Sim, there wasn't a prospect—when it all happened and my poor father, all broken up, told me everything, he said to me, and I knew it for myself—there wasn't a prospect that either of them would die for many, many years. They were both very healthy, both very fussy about themselves. My poor father counted on that, Sim. He wasn't exactly in trouble, but he wanted some money temporarily, urgently, and he—it was deeply wrong—but my poor father, Sim—he borrowed this capital. He realized the investments. He paid the sisters their dividends himself for two quarters and by the third quarter would have recovered and reinvested the money. Sim, the younger one, Anne, slipped in her own drawing-room, all her care of herself gone for nothing, and broke her leg and got pneumonia and died. Sim, it all happened in five days. My poor father heard that she was dead and buried, Sim, before he ever knew she had been ill. Then the other sister, Gertrude, came to the office, to my poor father, for her five thousand pounds."

ELIZABETH stopped. Her face told why. Sim patted her hand. "Why tell me, dear?"

"You must know, Sim." She swallowed and went on. "She always had been very fussy and poking, Gertrude. She came every quarter-day for her allowance, would have it given into her own hand and always knew, and generally argued, to a farthing any fluctuations in the dividends." Elizabeth gave a pained half-laugh. "God knows, poor thing, she had need to be inquiring.

"Sim, I never as long as I live shall forget that day when she came. I worked with my father in his office, you remember. I was his secretary. He was dictating a letter to me when she was announced. And I got up to go, but he stopped me, Sim—he said, 'Stay here, Beth, there is something for you to hear.' Sim, that was extraordinary, wasn't it—keeping me to hear it? Sim, it all was extraordinary. My father could have absconded before she came. When she came, he could have bluffed, gained time; he could have explained, shown that he would keep up the interest until he could pay the capital. Sim, my poor father wasn't a criminal. He told me that he felt that sudden death of the other sister to be the hand of God on him and that he accepted the hand of God."

It was piteous to Sim, this lamentable recital. He said: "Dear, why need I know?"

She touched her eyes with her handkerchief. "You must know. Sim, she came in, dressed in gray, looking about her, short, thin, determined—the kind of woman you see and avoid at a bargain sale. And she said at once, 'I have come for my money.' And my poor father, making one feeble attempt, said, 'For your money? You will not leave the investments as they are?' and she said, 'I shall think about that—but not with you, Mr. Glade. I am quite well able to manage my own affairs now that they are my own. So I have come for my money.' Sim, my poor father just said, 'Miss Andiron, I have not got your money for you.' She cried, 'Not got my money?' her voice high up. My poor father said, 'I have used your money.' Sim, her head seemed to me to be stretched right, right up, and her voice came ever so high out of it, 'Used my money!' Sim, my poor father said, 'I have used your money—but, Miss Andiron, I am afraid there is another term for what I have done—I have embezzled your money.' "

Sim got up and went across the room and then came back to her. "Elizabeth!"—and sat and held her hands again.

"Sim, they tried him. Sim, three years—penal servitude—Sim, they let me go down to him, to see him before he was taken away. There was a long row of little cells and he was at the end, a man told me. So I went along, fumbling the wall, Sim. A man came out as I got near the end. He was the detective who had had charge of the case and he had been kind all through. He stopped me and he said, 'Miss, there's trouble here.' I said, 'What trouble?' So he told me and took me into the cell."

She paused a long time. She made some efforts to take up her story, and they failed her. Presently she held an effort. "Sim, what seemed to me years afterward I went out of the Old Bailey, the detective holding my arm. He was very kind. He said he would get me a cab. When we came into the street, Miss Andiron was waiting for me—she had waited all that time. She said to me, 'Well, now?' So I said to her, 'Please, my father is dead.' "

Sim caught his breath and turned away—then turned to her and tried to take her in his arms. But she prevented him. "Sim, this is only leading up to what I have to say."

She told him how her father had collapsed and died immediately they brought him into the cell beneath the dock, and how he was dead when she went in to him. She told him how, when all her father's affairs were settled, when she had sold her home, all the furniture—"Sim, all my private things, every last stitch of my clothes that I didn't actually want, all my bits of jewelry, every smallest thing that I could turn to money"—she had been able to hand Miss Andiron just under a thousand pounds. She said then, "And so, Sim, what I said just now, what I began by saying—I am not to be loved. Sim, I have a sacred vow to my poor father to pay Miss Andiron back the money that he—Sim—robbed her of. There is four thousand pounds that I have set myself to pay. Then I will feel him clear, happy, absolved, my poor father. So I am working, Sim, hard, hard—thinking of nothing else, doing nothing else—until it is paid. To love, Sim, to marry, means my vow not kept. I must pay; to pay, I must work, always, until it is paid. So, Sim—not to be loved, dear."

He did not realize at that first telling the strength nor the depth of her determination. "Elizabeth, this does not stand between us," he said. "There are ways out of this."

"Sim, there are no ways out."

"I could borrow you the money—four thousand pounds. Andrew would find it for me, Elizabeth."

"Sim, the money must be mine, made by me."

He said, "You are earning it—" he indicated with a gesture of his hand the writing-table with its papers—"like this, secretarial work?"

She nodded. She had a very good private connection, she told him—doctors, authors, two members of Parliament, men who wanted secretarial assistance only for a few hours at a time. By fitting in one with another, by letting no hour go unoccupied, she could earn in this way much more than in a permanent post. She told him that she was giving Miss Andiron fifty pounds a quarter, two hundred pounds a year, setting by at least four pounds a week for the purpose, living on thirty shillings.

"Elizabeth!" he reproached her. "Living on thirty shillings!"

"I can do it," she said.

"Married, you still can earn," he said.

"Not in the same degree, Sim. It takes all my time, this. Seven days a week, all hours a day."

He made a calculation.

"Two hundred pounds a year, a thousand in five years, four thousand twenty years. Elizabeth, twenty years!"

"Sim, therefore not to be loved," she said.

HE WAS telling her presently the thing to tell her which had been, before he found her, the only reason that he wished to find her. He told her. But the words with which she answered it were delivered, not in the room where they sat, but in the street where, much later, they took leave. She was engaged to be at B. C. D.'s service that afternoon (and every afternoon at this period) from three to five; and the world-famous author of "If Harvest Fails" making no reappearance ("Bless him!" said Sim), and Sim walking with her to her next place of appointment, a doctor in Harley Street, it was there that they parted.

As they walked, leaving the subject of which he had been telling her, it was of their meeting and of all their meeting meant that they spoke. And when outside the door decorated with many professional plates he had to leave her, "Oh, I turn to my life again with a new and wonderful strength, Sim," she said.

He held both her hands. "And I?" he questioned. "Elizabeth, do I turn with a new purpose to mine?"

Appeal was in his voice; appeal against her vow. He meant, she knew, the purpose now of finding employment wherewith would be enough for them to marry.

She shook her head. "Dear Sim, for you it is to find your real purpose, the purpose for which you were spared, Sim."

He dropped her hands and turned disconsolately away.

It was then that her words came to her.

His head as he turned away was drooped, one arm hung with a certain dejection by his side. The outline he presented stood shadowed, somber, on the gathering dusk; and violently she had the thought: Where had she seen that pose before?—that shoulder turned away, that drooped head, that pendant, melancholy hand, all that dejected mien done in those somber hues?

He had told her while they sat together the whole of the strange thing that had happened to him in the war and the strange influences that it had brought upon him. He always had known it would be hard to tell. He had found it at first harder even than he had imagined. Achingly he had desired to tell some one these strange influences that had come over him, disturbing his mode of life, sundering him from his settled career, altering his habit of thought, calling him from what he had been to something he felt, but was not shown, that he should be; and longingly, when with certainty he came to feel that of all the world that some one only could be she, he had wished to find and tell her.

He had found her and the immediate thing told was not that which beset his mind, but that which, unconsciously, had possessed his heart—that he loved her. And he had heard then the vow, denying herself to love, that she had pledged. It had been difficult, thus new perplexed, to open out those secret things of his when with, "Sim, tell me of yourself now," the moment he had longed for was presented to him.

BUT he told her all, from the beginning. "Why am I spared?" First the hysteria, half-laughing, half-crying, with which he had said it; then the resentment, "Why the devil should I be spared?" with which he had hoped his fate would be joined to the fate of all those others to whom fate came; then the apprehension, "Will it come to me now, or now, or now?" then the longing that it would come—now, now, now—and he have done with it; then, torn and exhausted by these, the cry in that damp and airless dug-out to his mother: "Mother, why am I spared?" Then the answer.

"Elizabeth, as clearly as I hear my own voice, and yet with no voice speaking, the knowledge, 'You are spared because you are reserved for a special purpose.' "

He told her all, from that knowledge. First the exquisite comfort of the knowledge itself; then the feeling that not in pursuit of his accustomed ways was this purpose to be found; then the abandonment of his army career; now, in these weeks, daily, ceaselessly drifting in quest of what that purpose was, where its direction, how it should be found.

He told her it all, from first to last; and, a thousand times though he had told it to himself, he told it now more clearly, more urgently than ever himself had heard it, because now—now at last—was outlet. He told it, too, as even when longing to tell her, he had not known he could tell it, because now was love to ease it out, love to receive it. When he had finished, he smiled and held her hands.

"There! That is all I want of you," he said, "just to hear me tell it—nothing more. There is nothing you need say, nothing you need try to advise. How could you? How could any one? Haven't I shown myself, Elizabeth, just a dreamer of dreams? And who to-day can be a soothsayer, an interpreter of visions? I just wanted to tell some one and I knew it was only you that I could tell."

"This is very extraordinary, Sim!" she said.

He took her hands.

"That is all I wanted, just as you have said it. You understand. I knew you would."

But now, as dejected he turned from her at the door of the house in Harley Street, she had suddenly, out of some suggestion given to her by the forlorn pose of his body, a very strange sense of being upon the threshold of a deeper understanding of what he had told her, of feeling within her a sense similar to that sense with which sometimes we feel we have seen or done before a thing that consciously we have never seen or done. The suggestion of his pose, as he turned away?

It came to her. It was the painting by Watts of the man who from the bidding to the service of Christ turned away, "for he had many possessions."

She caught her breath.

"Sim!"

He looked back.

"Sim, there is a purpose for you. I know it. I am convinced of it."

His smile, questioning her, was pale, wan, scarcely a smile.

"Sim, I believe that it is of God."

LITTLE TEXAS

shouting out ice-cream, monkeys gibbering at them, a kangaroo, the sleepy-eyed camels, twenty lumbering elephants with wet trunks swinging up for peanuts, and that odor of sawdust and jungle-tramped grass that nothing in this world but a circus can give!

The little old lady, like some one in a dream, stood looking at that bewildering web of trapeze ropes and bars, ring-banks, nets and poles, the soft yellow sawdust, the thousand people surging up on the seats—then she saw some one coming, a man with round face and twinkling blue eyes.

Bill had told her a thousand times about Papa Saunders's blue eyes, his round face and the striped red shirts he always wore.

"Oh," she said quaveringly, "it is!"

Somehow she had courage to step out to him, dared to touch his hand and stop him.

"Aren't you Mr. Saunders?" she trembled. "Aren't you the man who gives people work?"

Mr. Saunders looked down at her, his blue eyes smiling.

"I am Mr. Saunders," he said. "What's the trouble?"

So the old yellow letter was unfolded to tell a story that had been put on the faded sheet seven years before in the hand Mr. Saunders knew so well, of Sunny Bill Peck, the tumbling clown. His little old lady would bring this, Bill wrote, if she'd ever be needing the friends he had left behind him.

Mr. Saunders read the letter, folded it slowly, and tears came into his blue eyes.

"Mrs. Sunny Bill Peck," he said, "welcome home!"

And big Manager Saunders of The Great Melbourne Circus slipped his hand under the arm of Bill Peck's little widow, to guide her tenderly out of the crowd.

"We'll go and find Mary Johnson, who keeps the wardrobe in the ladies' dressing-tent, and tell her there'll be some one from now on to help her sew spangles."

IT WAS just turning night when the little Missouri train drew into the rushing St. Louis station. Lights were coming on, every one hurrying, red-capped porters with grips coming and going, people meeting each other for greeting or good-by.

Mr. Kingsley Fitzgerald frowned as he stepped from the train into the crowd. He didn't like people pushing against him, men shouting at him and the noise of it all. He called a porter to take his luggage, and followed through the hot crowd.

He had firmly made up his mind to think nothing more of the child and the shabby boy who had been on the train, but despite himself he found his thoughts going back to the wide eyes that had looked so squarely into his, and when, above all the hustle and noise, he heard the gay ripple of a child's laughter, he turned sharply as though somehow it were following him.

He saw them coming toward him, and wondered if the conductor could have told them anything about him, but no—they passed without even glancing his way, her bare head of sunny curls almost close enough for his hand to touch.

As they passed, he found his eyes searching that eager face for some resemblance to the son who had so bitterly disappointed him. And he found it. The delicate head—the odd little quirk at the corner of her lips—yes, it was there. There was no mistake. She was his son King's child. The tall old man found a grim satisfaction in thinking of how he was going to be able to deprive this child and her mother, to repay them for having taken his son away from him.

At the door in the great rotunda of the station Fitzgerald and the child were fairly pushed against each other. Fitzgerald followed his porter to the carriage entrance, looking back just long enough to see that the two were lost in the crowd. His limousine was waiting for him. The chauffeur touched his cap respectfully and held open the door.

"Jenson," Mr. Fitzgerald ordered, "you will be good enough to reach my lawyer, Mr. Zylder, on the telephone, and say we are calling for him immediately. Say that I am requesting him to dine with me."

Jenson closed his employer into the velvet seclusion of the car and handed the waiting porter a dollar bill. Mr. Kingsley Fitzgerald settled back with relief at his escape from the crowd and satisfaction at being able to dine again at his own table.

One hour later, very quietly, with steps trained to genteel service, Becker, the butler in Fitzgerald mansion, set out dinner silver for two.

In the library Kingsley Fitzgerald and the Honorable Mr. Richard Zylder discussed the matter at hand. Fitzgerald had few words to spend.

"I might have suspected some such person would eventually appear," he said curtly. "I never knew whom my son married, but the child is poor, and, of course, after money. I want you, Zylder, simply to tell them that you have heard nothing of me for—well, hasn't it been seven years since I've been to your office? Just tell them I left your office seven years ago, and that you absolutely can give them no trace of me. It seems your card is the only line they have to follow, so it is in your hands to close the matter entirely."

Mr. Zylder put his long fingers together tip for tip.

"But, my dear Fitzgerald," he said, "disowning your blood relation is a serious move. You——"

Mr. Fitzgerald rose.

"Dinner is served, Zylder," he said. "I have discussed the matter as much as I wish."

The two men descended the wide polished stairs in silence, except for the swish of the tail of an awkward peacock trailing after them. In the room below shaded lights cast amber shadows across the velvet and satin of rugs and draperies. At the door of the dining-room Mr. Zylder paused, just a moment, with his hand on the arm of his host.

"Fitzgerald," he said,"am I to understand, then, that your decision to be lost to this grandchild is final?"

Kingsley Fitzgerald bowed slightly and motioned his guest to precede him into the dining-room as the peacock swished past.

"Final—absolutely," he said.

THERE is a very dear hour on the circus lot, just before daytime slips into t i-light, when the afternoon show is done, the crowd gone away, and the folks who belong to that gray canvas city forget their tights and spangles for a while.

Around the back door by the dressing-tent, the red-and-gold wagons standing idly waiting for the night show, the big top empty, the flags down for sunset—then the clowns that you laugh at, the bareback riders who thrill you, forget all about it for an hour or two, and in gingham and calico bring their folding chairs out in the long lazy shadows of late afternoon to sit with their families, their newspapers, their sewing, their games, their friends and their stories together.

And that was the time of day when Mrs. Sunny Bill Peck found her place in circus life.

Perhaps it is strange, perhaps it is very sweet, that the biggest hearts are most always found in the places where you never would think of looking for them!

Not one perhaps of the laughing crowd who had filled the big top that June afternoon would have thought to look for love at the back door of a circus, but they wouldn't have found a place in the world where more of it was. And when the day came to a close, Mrs. Sunny Bill, buttoned into Aunt Mary Johnson's best apron, sat out under the open sky by a gold band-wagon, the evening air blowing soft little thin gray curls around her face and putting a peace in her heart she hadn't known since she'd said good-by to Sunny Bill.

Aunt Mary Johnson sat with her, ripping purple braid from a velvet coat, and over Mrs. Sunny's lap was spread a rosy trapeze dress that needed new ruffles. Around them, in little groups, the circus folks were talking, reading, napping in the sunshine.

Mary Johnson's hair was as gray as Mrs. Sunny's. She wore square silver spectacles down on her nose, took care of the circus wardrobe, packed and unpacked the parade trunks, gave advice, said good nights and good mornings, and was mother to them all.

"Laws sakes, but I'm glad to have help, Mrs. Sunny," she said, talking through the pins in her mouth. "Look at these two hundred ladies to trim and sew for! I don't know how I've been doing it these five years and more! We'll get along splendid, and in a month I'll bet a dollar you'd rather be living with us than anywhere in the world! I'll get you a place in Car 90 where I am. You can make up your window-curtains any color you want.

"Yes," she smiled, "you're goin' to like it, Mrs. Sunny, but the thing you're goin' to like the best is the folks in the show you'll be doin' it for. That dress you're fixin' now is for Meg. They call her 'The Butterfly,' and when you see her in the flying swing and when she drops through the air, she's so pretty Meg is, and so slender Meg is, that you'll just hold your breath till she's down on the ground again. Brown eyes she's got, brown braids of hair all around her head, and my notion is that Meg's just the prettiest thing anybody ever saw in a circus or out of it. But Meg isn't the only one. There's Josephine Snow and Gipsy Jean and Madam Helen and Bess Morell—and Tommy the Clown Kid—you'll love everybody—everybody but Albert that is, and say, Albert keeps me miserable! I always said if I ever found any way to worry Albert like Albert worries me I'd——"

She suddenly shrieked and threw the coat she was ripping over her head.

"Lor' save us! He heard me!" she cried. "Here he comes!"

Before Mrs. Sunny could sense what had happened, she saw Aunt Mary Johnson grasp the gold braid, scissors and pins and disappear around the corner of the wild west tent with more speed than Mrs. Sunny had supposed she could have.

"Aw, Albert ain't goin' ta hurt nothin'," somebody drawled behind Mrs. Sunny's shoulder. "Fer Heb'bn's sake, why don't ya set still!"

Mrs. Sunny turned around to find out whom the voice belonged to, but what she said or thought she never remembered, for what she saw—standing fairly against the back of her chair—was a fourteen-foot elephant. A shabby man with a ragged cap was standing by complacently chewing a long piece of grass, watching the elephant with lazy pride.

"Albert's gettin' more friendly with strangers every day," he grinned at Mrs. Sunny.

Mrs. Sunny shut her hand on her heart and her toes turned under in her shoes as she felt the swing of the elephant's trunk over her head—a thick hot breath against her neck and across her shoulder. Perhaps it wasn't as much a fancy to Mrs. Sunny that Albert had taken, as to the remaining ginger biscuits from the tea-tray Aunt Mary had brought.

"Albert, wait around a minute," drawled the tramp of a fellow with him. "Here, bust this bread to pieces and wait around."

Mrs. Sunny opened her eyes to see the fellow pull a loaf of bread from inside his coat and toss it over on the ground. His clothes seemed to fit like a scarecrow's clothes that had never fitted any one. His chin was half-whiskered, his cap just a rag—but when he turned smiling to Mrs. Sunny she knew his rags were the least matter in the whole world to him.

"They say you're Mrs. Sunny Bill Peck," he said. "Why, I knowed Sunny Bill when I wasn't five years old! Bill Peck's goin' to heaven's one of the best reasons I've got fer tryin' to git there myself! He taught me the first clown tumble I ever done, and I hope ol' Sunny Bill ain't found out that I never amounted to no mor'n lookin' after the bulls. Say, I'm awful glad to see yuh!"

He then sat down on the grass beside her. His name was Bum Casey, he said. He told her about the old days when Bill had been a star clown. He remembered the first day Bill had met Mrs. Sunny, and the velvet sofa the circus boys had sent for a wedding-gift!

"Everybody's goin' to be so good to yuh," he said. "Jest wait a day er two. They'll all be chummin' up like Albert was."

It was so quiet, so restful, long late sunshine deepening into twilight.

Bum Casey hunched his shoulders together and got up from the ground.

"The evenin' lasts an awful long time when somebody ain't around that you're used to," he said. "But there ain't no use jest settin' down to make ourselves feel bad. Guess me and Albert'll go along!"

Most of the canvas chairs had been taken inside. The groups of people had broken up and gone in the dressing-tents or for a stroll around the lot.

Mrs. Sunny gathered the ruffles together.

"It's gettin' too dark to sew," she said.

The first stars were coming out. Bum Casey in a hoarse voice began calling for Albert.

"Yuh can keep on sewin' if yuh want to," he said. "Here comes the light-man."

Mrs. Sunny glanced up as some one came around the big top with a flare in his hand and lit the gas lamp beside the back door.

He was a little man with a crook in his back. His shoulders were twisted and one arm was too short.

"Your heart's broke all right, ain't it Torchy?" Bum called to him. "I know how yuh feel."

The light-man stood and looked at Bum a minute.

"Nobody knows how I feel," he said in a raspy voice, "but I'll bet fifty dollars, when the lights come on to-night, somebody'll be thinkin' about me just the same!"

He shifted his flare and brought a square white envelope out of his pocket which he handed to Mrs. Sunny.

"If you're goin' in the dressin'-tent," he said, "would you please take this to Meg?"

Meg! The Butterfly!

Mrs. Sunny took her things and went inside. The dressing-tent with the lights not yet lit was dusky in the last gray of daytime. She asked some one near the door where Meg was, and found her in the chair before her trunk, in a blue gingham apron. Mrs. Sunny put her hand shyly on Meg's shoulder.

"Here's something the light-man wanted I should bring you," she said.

Meg looked up with pretty surprise, took the note and tore it open. Then her lips quivered, and Mrs. Sunny saw tears dropping on the single page. Meg, trying to see through the mist in her eyes, looked up at Mrs. Sunny.

"Will you read it, please," she said. "I can't see the words."

It was only a little note penciled in a round childish hand. It read:

> I'm writing to say good night, and to hope you aren't lonesome. I left a kiss on your pillow in the car for you, and every minute, wherever I am, I'm your own loving daughter,

> LITTLE TEXAS.

IT WAS a strange twist of life by which sunny Texas should be the only living relative of Kingsley Fitzgerald—he, a man whose every day was measured by wealth and arrogant pride, and she, whose home was a circus train, whose only ties of love were for the people and animals of a three-ring show. But two things about them were alike, the gray of their eyes and the something in their manner that people somehow couldn't forget. The time had never been when Kingsley Fitzgerald had come out of the great gate of his estate without passers-by stopping to look at him. There was a handsome dignity, a sternness, a something that made them wonder who he was, and notice.

Nor had time ever been when the little girl, Texas, had gone among people without eyes following her, noticing, wondering.

In Paris, when she had been a wee thing in the parks with Meg, people had asked many questions about her. Was she French—or American? What eyes! What a smile! It was King Fitzgerald's eyes she had—and her mother's smile—the smile that had made King follow Meg from one town of France to another till he had won her.

Young King, the pride and the hope of his blue-blooded father, had run over to Paris after his finish at Oxford University, and had happened by chance upon a queer little Frenchman with a traveling circus troupe. It had been fun for King to watch the one-ring show until he had seen the butterfly Meg—then suddenly it had become the most serious thing he had ever done—and for Meg's dark eyes, her dark shining hair, he had forgotten all the plans his father had been counting the years for, and had followed her till she had promised to marry him.

He had told his father nothing about who she was—only cabled the message that he would return with a bride—and when the reply had come briefly that he should return alone or not at all, young King Fitzgerald just had never gone home.

Meg had been a wonderful thing to her big American husband. Gentle hands, quaint French ways, and that smile he loved so well. She had left the circus, and they had found a tiny home near Paris, where she had fussed around a little garden and had learned to make strawberry omelette. They had walked and talked in the evenings together, understanding each other, loving each other, till it had seemed that the dearest happiness in the whole wide world had found its way to that little house.

Then one precious day had come a precious baby—to make three in the little house instead of just two. Meg had begged King to write his father about it—but King, as proud in his silence as old Fitzgerald in his, had not done it.

King had been saving their money to buy oil land in Texas, but when the baby came he said they'd spend the money for her instead, and she'd be their Texas. So the mite of a girl, who was named Kingsley Fitzgerald after a stern old grandfather who knew nothing about it, became just Little Texas to her mother and father.

Then suddenly the tiny house had found itself holding only two again—Meg, poor Meg, and the little girl baby. King had begged Meg to write a letter when he had known he was going (so she and baby Texas would have some one to go to), but then, of all times, Meg had felt far away from a stranger who would only have resented that she was left instead of King—so she had begged to keep the baby herself and had promised that when Little Texas would be twelve she should go to find her grandfather. Not until King had gone did Meg realize that her only address or knowledge of the grim old man was the pocket-worn lawyer's card King had carried in his own bill-case.

Of Paris, Texas could only remember that day when their little house had been crowded full of people, flowers and whispers—Meg's arms around her, rocking, rocking for hours.

After that her memories began with toys on a rug by her mother's trunk under a gray canvas sky, or naps in warm green grass, or bread and jam at a table full of people, or rocking rides down the street on an elephant's back in a big black man's arms, or races with the dogs around a long sawdust track.

But the thing she remembered most of all was how she had slipped under the side wall of the great circus tent, to sit very still watching her dark-eyed mother—The Butterfly—drop and turn and swing through the air, laughing, throwing down kisses, while the people applauded and the band played.

So three years had become four—four years had become five.

ON THE rollicking day of Texas's seventh birthday, her gift, besides a huge birthday cake from the circus pastry cook, had been a trunk all her own to put beside her mother's in the dressing-tent, and that day in the morning she had ridden her first parade.

Meg had made her a Cinderella going to the ball, in a dress of white satin, her feet on a golden pillow, to ride in a white-and-gold carriage with six white ponies. When the crowd all along the street had caught her smile as she went by and had smiled back at her it had seemed to Meg as though she was just a little breath of happiness going out to every one.

It was when she was ten years old, one night snuggled close in Meg's arms on the rumbling train, that she had first heard of the grandfather to whom some day she was going.

Meg, wondering in her own heart what it really would be, had made it like a fairy-tale to Texas. Holding those two little hands tight, she had told of what a happy thing it was for a little girl to have a grandfather.

"Darling, you'll be going to find your own daddy's father," Meg had said, "who'll love you like your daddy would if he were here. Mother will ask Joe to take you to the lawyer, who can tell you where to find grandpa. You'll go to his house and see a gray-haired gentleman and you'll say, 'Is this Mr. Kingsley Fitzgerald?' And then——"

But Texas with a rippling laugh had finished the story in her own little way:

"Then, when he says 'Yes,' do you know what I'll say? I'll say, 'Grandad, you old scamp, give Texas a kiss.'"

From that night the little girl's one day-dream had been about going to find the grandad who was waiting like a fairy prince to make them happier. And after that it had seemed too cruelly soon till she was twelve—till Joe was ready to take her—till Meg brushed the soft curls and packed the little clothes.

"He will see her," Meg had told Joe bravely, "and know she belongs to him. She can tell him about her mother, in her own little way. Then we'll plan the rest afterward, however seems best."

When the last minute had really come, and every one had gathered around the door of the dressing-tent to bid her good-by, Meg had caught that little girl close to hide the tears in her eyes.

"Darling, it's going to be wonderful to have a grandpa," she had whispered. "Almost like daddy come back to us again."

"Yes, mother," Texas had answered, clinging to Meg's fingers. "It's going to be the nicest thing we ever had—a relation."

Folks maybe would have called it an odd little crowd who watched Texas and Joe go across the lot—a little crowd in spangles, tights, pantaloons, an eight-foot giant, a living doll, a shabby hunch-back, a ragged elephant-keeper, a gray-haired lady with square spectacles on her nose—but it was a crowd who had had that little girl for their own till it seemed they were saying good-by to the sunshine.

Now evening had come, and to Meg sitting alone in the dusk of the dressing-tent it was like a long dream as she lived it all over again in her heart, but least real of it all seemed this last of it all—this little note Mrs. Sunny had put in her hand—the first actual proof that Little Texas was—gone.

THE boarding-house table in Mrs. Crandle's dark dining-room was set up for ten middle-aged business ladies and gentlemen, so it was rather like the appearance of a bright rosebud in a somber garden when the door pushed open one morning at breakfast-time and Texas, with her eager smile and shining curls, came rather hesitantly toward the table.

"Good morning, everybody," she ventured.

Most of Mrs. Crandle's boarders had forgotten all about such things as smiles and good mornings. Four of them had rheumatism. One was deaf, and the others had been discouraged of good mornings long ago. But Mrs. Parsons, who clerked in the corner candy-store, had a fountain of friendliness inside her waiting for a chance to bubble over.

"Why, bless your heart, good morning," she beamed, as Texas stopped half-way across the room. "I thought I heard a little voice singing up-stairs in the hall this morning."

Mr. Fobes looked up over his coffee.

"Woke me fifteen minutes too early," he snapped.

Texas, her head on one side in her odd little way, looked at Mr. Fobes a minute, and then, out of the several vacant places at the table, slipped into the one beside his.

"If I waked you up," she said sweetly, "I s'pose you're sorry, but it's so nice to wake up in a Summer morning, I should think you'd be glad. Would you mind buttoning the top of my dress? I just couldn't reach it."

She turned her back conveniently to Mr. Fobes.

"I can fix it, dearie," chirped Mrs. Parsons. "Come right over to me."

But Mr. Fobes was already fumbling with the buttonhole.

"I guess I ain't so old, yet, I can't see a button," he remarked testily.

Little Texas laughed at him cozily over her shoulder—then, when she was buttoned, turned and studied him seriously.

"How old are you?" she asked after a minute. "Are you about as old as a grandpa would be?"

Mrs. Parsons giggled.

"Yes, he is, little girl. You make him own it," she said. "He thinks he's the giddiest thing in the town."

The other boarders were listening now, watching Texas and Mr. Fobes, one or two of them almost beginning to smile.

"Well, of course maybe he isn't old enough for a grandpa," Texas hastened to say. "I only asked because I'm looking for a grandpa, and I was wondering what one was going to be like. You see, I never had one."

Mrs. Crandle brought in the oatmeal.

"Well, cranky as Mr. Fobes is," she remarked, "I pity any one he'd be a grandpa to."

Texas glanced quickly at the sour little man beside her.

"Why, I'd like my grandpa to be just like Mr. Fobes," she said earnestly. "The minute I saw him I felt such friends with him. I don't think he's cranky. It's only the color of his necktie. He'd be handsome with a nice red one instead of black—don't you think so?"

Mr. Fobes cleared his throat and took refuge in his coffee-cup, and it probably was a relief to all concerned that Joe, entering the dining-room just at that moment, took Texas's entire attention.

"Oh, Joe," she sang out, "the day's really come. We're really truly here. And to-day we're really truly going to find my grandpa." She smiled up at Mr. Fobes.

Mrs. Parsons turned to the insurance agent next her.

"Why on earth did she pick out that old grouch to talk to?" she remarked in a much-aggrieved tone. "What's she telling him now."

Texas looked up at Mrs. Parsons.

"I had a very special reason for picking out Mr. Fobes," she said, "and I'm telling him about the circus where I live."

Her arm was around him, her face close to his—and he sitting up like a lord mayor of London.

A circus where she lived! A beautiful mother called The Butterfly. A world as apart from a Mrs. Crandle boarding-house as though the people in it breathed different atmosphere.

"Mother has never let me perform in the ring," she was explaining, looking up at Mr. Fobes with wide, serious eyes, "because she promised my daddy I'd go to grandpa when I was twelve—so she thought I probably wouldn't grow up to be a performer. But really and truly I'd rather be a butterfly like my mother than anything in the world." She moved a little closer to the old man's ear. "I can do a cloud swing all alone now, but nobody knows it," she whispered proudly, "and I go in parade every day in a coach and six. But of course until I have a grandpa we can't tell what will happen. To-day when we see him I suppose we'll find out. My grandpa and I don't know one single thing about each other, you see."

But Mrs. Parsons couldn't stand it merely to keep still and listen.

"Why, my dear," she bubbled, "your grandfather may be terribly wealthy, for all you know. Maybe he's dead and left you a million dollars or something. Maybe by to-night you'll be an heiress, for all you know."

"That would be funny," Texas dimpled, lifting her shoulders in a pretty foreign little way. "Mother and I never thought of that—but I guess he's only going to have a little house and garden, and an apple-tree—and white whiskers and not very much money. The most I hope is—I hope some pet chickens. And there's one thing I hope besides—that he'll wear a red necktie. I guess he will if he knows how I like them, won't he Joe?"

THE big boy drained his coffee-cup.

"What I guess," he grinned, "is that we'd better get down-town and look for him. Sittin' here ain't goin' to find nobody."

And just at that moment Mrs. Crandle seconded Joe's suggestion with a pointed request that the boarders leave the table so that the dishes could be washed. Everybody complied, but at the dining-room door all those boarders, who had forgotten about smiles and good mornings, lingered around this child who'd brought a little of both in to them. Texas was still clinging to Mr. Fobes's hand as Mrs. Parsons kissed her soundly and the insurance agent slipped two peppermints into her fingers.

Joe stayed behind to pay Mrs. Crandle two dollars for the night's lodging and breakfast and to say they didn't expect to be back.

As for Mrs. Crandle, she hadn't paid any attention to either of them. Certainly not to Texas's talk at the breakfast-table. Children were all rattleboxes, she remarked to the cook, saying nothing and taking up a lot of precious time.

In the bare front room where the boarders had gone, Texas found a table and paper and ink, and after much conferring with Joe, who waited behind her in a straight haircloth chair, the following letter was ready to fold, seal and mail to a certain little mother in a certain big circus:

Dear every one in the world— Here we are in St. Louis. The train lasted a long time, and we met a nice conductor, but Joe and I decided we do not like a train unless we live on it. We are at a boarding-house with the oldest people I ever saw, but for a very special reason I liked one better than all the rest, and sat by him at breakfast. We are going to Mr. Zylder's office now to begin finding my grandpa. Please tell everybody how much I missed them, 'speshly Torchy. I hope he is getting along all right without me. Every single street light I saw last night seemed to have Torchy standing beside it. My love to Jim's monkey, and dearest mother to you, from your own Little Texas, whose curls don't look very good to-day because Joe's fingers do not seem to fit them.

The address of "Little Rock, Arkansas," was being put on with much blotting when Mr. Fobes, very late for his bookkeeper's high stool, hurried in to say good-by. Shaking hands several times too often, he apologized for his coat collar being turned up and explained rather bashfully that it was to hide his collar-button till he could step in at the corner store and get a red necktie.

Whatever inconvenience the effort may have put him to was entirely recompensed by the smile of utter rapture Texas bestowed on him.

"Oh, Mr. Fobes, how lovely," she exclaimed. "If anybody didn't have a grandpa of their own, I think the very nicest grandpa they could pick out would be you!"

THE Honorable Mr. Richard Zylder, in his mahogany-fitted office, tapped his glasses against the edge of his desk and studied thoughtfully two time-worn cablegrams—the only reference he had ever had regarding the passing from old Kingsley Fitzgerald's life of the handsome son Kingsley Fitzgerald Junior.

He thought back to the time King had finished at Oxford, fourteen, almost fifteen, years before. He brought back to his mind the tall, straight, gray-eyed boy who had come in to bid him good-by on leaving for London. He remembered how proudly Fitzgerald Senior had watched him, hoped for him, planned his whole future—even to selecting the girl he should marry—and that, it seemed, was what had made the trouble.

Mr. Zylder put on his glasses and read the first cablegram. From Paris it was:

"Married to-day. Bringing home wonderful girl. King."

It was pinned to a copy of the answer they had sent:

"Return alone or not at all. K. F."

Richard Zylder had never forgotten his wealthiest client that day. With white lips and trembling hands the old aristocrat had dictated the brief reply, and then, for days, for weeks, he had waited some answer—which only had come three years later, addressed from Paris to the office of the Honorable Mr. Richard Zylder.

"Kingsley Fitzgerald Junior died to-day. Wishes burial here. Margaret Fitzgerald."

Richard Zylder had been sorry for his wealthiest client after that. Life with nothing but money is such an empty shell. He had tried to suggest that King's young wife be sent for, but the reception of this suggestion caused him to regret that he ever had made it, and ten years had gone—and now there suddenly appeared a sequel—a child—King Fitzgerald's daughter.

The Honorable Mr. Zylder regretted very much that his client's erratic wishes had to be carried out in spite of what he himself knew was right, but after all it was no affair of the servant attorney. It was only Mr. Fitzgerald who was responsible. But somehow Mr. Zylder dreaded to see the child. Somehow the thought of her kept bringing back King Fitzgerald saying good-by.

Now his daughter would come in where young King had gone out.

Mr. Zylder hoped that in some way the conductor or Mr. Fitzgerald had made some mistake, that there would be no little fledgling to send away, and yet, he reasoned, what would be lost to her by Fitzgerald's decision? Only money—and perhaps she would better do without that, since to have it would mean also the enduring of Fitzgerald's stern relationship. It did seem that the child might be happier knowing nothing of it—and turning the matter over in his mind, Mr. Richard Zylder's decision, by the time his secretary announced that a young man and a small girl were calling to see him, coincided with Kingsley Fitzgerald's, after all.

He was expecting the child to be awkward and nervous—though he couldn't have told why he did expect her so. He was entirely unprepared for the easy grace and unconscious loveliness of the little girl who came unhesitatingly to his desk.

Her wide hat shaded her face and curls. Her gingham dress was a bit faded. Her shoes were worn and stubbed at the toes, but Mr. Zylder was conscious only that he found himself looking into the same gray eyes he had looked into when young Fitzgerald had gone laughing away to London.

"How do you do?" Texas smiled, and slipped into the big chair beside him, her toes trying sedately to reach the floor. "We came to ask about my grandpa. His name is on the card with your name."

Joe, standing beside her, his cap in hand, proffered the card in question.

"We want to find Mr. Kingsley Fitzgerald," he said. "This little kid's his granddaughter, and your card is the only way her daddy left for her to find him."

Texas put her head on one side.

"I'm his granddaughter," she dimpled, leaning across Mr. Zylder's desk, "and he doesn't know he's got me."

"Indeed!" Mr. Zylder remarked. "And what is your name?"

He had made up his mind it would be Margaret after the mother, or Cecily possibly. King's mother had been Cecily.

"My name is Kingsley Fitzgerald," she said, "just like my grandfather's—and like my father's," she added softly.

"Kingsley Fitzgerald!" Mr. Zylder exclaimed in frank surprise. "You are named Kingsley Fitzgerald?"

He studied the serious face.

"Where did you come from?" he asked.

"From Three Trees, Arkansas," she told him. "Yesterday morning. And where is my grandfather?" Her teasing smile bubbled over. "I can't wait to see him," she dimpled, "it's as much fun as a Christmas present."

Luckily Joe saved Mr. Zylder having to reply to this by taking up the conversation.

"We call her Texas, for short," he explained. "Kingsley seems so high-sounding for a little kid like her."

MR. ZYLDER suddenly remembered they were getting beside the point. He began to think that the sooner this thing was done and over the better. He cleared his throat.

"If your grandfather were here, Miss Fitzgerald," he said slowly, "I am sure his surprise would be all you could wish, but I regret to say I can tell you nothing whatever about where you can find him."

Little Texas pushed her hat over her head to the floor, and looked from the lawyer's expressionless face to Joe.

"But he's somewhere!" she said in a bewildered way. "How can I find him?"

Joe put down his cap and drew his chair closer to Texas and to Mr. Zylder's desk.

"Do you mean he isn't in St. Louis," he asked, "or is he dead—or what do you mean?"

"I mean," Mr. Zylder said slowly, deliberately, "that Kingsley Fitzgerald walked out of my office seven years ago—which is absolutely the last thing I can tell you about him. If any one could tell you where he is, I could—but you might wait here the rest of your life and I wouldn't be able to give you any information."

Texas slid forward in the big chair.

"But he's my grandfather!" she said. "My mother wants me to find him. He's the only relation we have!" Her voice was plaintive—very childlike now.

Joe drew the slim little girl against him.

"She's been waiting for her grandfather an awful long while, mister," he said earnestly. "Little Texas and her mother are all alone, and they need to find him very bad. Ain't there some way we could try! I'll go anywhere after him. I don't care how far it is?"

Mr. Zylder looked squarely at the boy and the little girl—the boy with anxious eyes, the little girl with a gathering of childish tears.

"Young man," he said, "I can not help you, but my best advice to you is to dismiss the matter and simply consider him dead. Whatever idea the child and her mother have cherished, I can only say she hasn't any grandfather now."

Texas brushed her hand across her curls.

"Then mother and I haven't anybody," she said. "I guess I better hurry back to her."

She took her hat from the floor and looked up at Joe.

"Joe, I thought of every single thing," she said, "didn't I, Joe? I thought of him fat and thin, and cross and nice, and a big house or little house—but Joe I never thought of not having any grandpa at all."

"Has your mother money enough?" Mr. Zylder ventured.

"Yes, we have some money," Texas told him, "but no relation."

What did Texas know of money? How did she know whether her mother had it or not?

Joe took up his cap and reached for her hand.

"Well, then," he said, "we'll be going, I guess."

Mr. Zylder asked him to write on a paper the address of the place where they were stopping in the city. He said good-by, and watched them leave; then he sat for an hour looking at the chair beside his desk—hearing over and over the plaintive voice of that little girl with King Fitzgerald's gray eyes.

THE NEW FOURTH

many homes and public places everywhere.

The Centennial celebration in Philadelphia again brought the Declaration to the minds of the people. The managers borrowed the precious paper and exhibited it in Independence Hall, and many copies of it were made and sold at that time. From then on the Government at Washington has had charge of it and to-day it may be viewed in its specially prepared shrine in the Library of Congress.

And now what?

We are living under its beneficent spirit, but few of us are conscious of it as a force in our daily living. We are about to celebrate another Fourth of July, and the thought of that celebration makes thoughtful Americans sad. There will be a great showing of flags. There will be parades of soldiers and the bands will play. The country will make holiday and the roads will be blocked with automobiles loaded with weary men and women and fretful children. The parks and meadows and the pleasant places in the woods will be strewn with the litter of the picnic-baskets. All day long there will be the crackling and banging and hissing of the fireworks. Buildings will be burned, and children will be hurt and maimed. Here and there will be speeches and cheers, and in a few places there will be a real heart-throb of love of country and reconsecration to its service. So do we honor our great tradition. So do we hallow the spirit of the forefathers.

There must be a better way. There is a better way to keep alive the spirit of our Declaration, which is truly the soul of the American people, truly we. Theodore Roosevelt used to take his children apart to some lovely spot in the woods and read the precious paper to them, explaining its meaning, pointing out the beauty and the power, the unmistakable meaning of each word so fitly chosen. To him it was an inspiration and a mandate. It was the faith of his fathers, the source of America's greatness. He intended that his children should not only be American, but consciously American.

He told them the stories of Jefferson and Franklin and Adams and Washington and the host of patriots who built the foundations of the land until they associated them with the life about them. They and their principles became household words. He made his children conscious of the underlying spirit of the document which served to establish freedom in this land and kindle its beginnings throughout the world. It is to this spirit, this conscious quality of Americanism, that I would dedicate the Fourth of July.

AND just what does "truly American" mean?

To me it is the preservation to all men of what we have declared to be self-evident rights: the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. If that means anything at all, it means tolerance, for each of us must be happy in his own way. It means that we respect the rights and the feelings of other people to the extent that we never intrude upon them, erring always upon the side of generosity. It means a decent respect for the people of the world, a helpful, understanding appreciation of their difficulties, a ready sympathy with their distresses. And most of all it means a dedication of each American to the principles of his faith as proclaimed by that Declaration.

This idea, this quality, this philosophy of living which we call American is not gained by picnicking once a year. It must be taught our youth and be practised by them, as Roosevelt demonstrated in his own family.

When the flags rise on the morning of the Fourth, I would have them signal a day set apart for the realization of the spirit of America. I would take the children to the nearest shrine of patriotism and there tell the story of the struggle and sacrifice that was the price of this nation's life. I would impress upon them the duty of carrying on the crusade their forefathers began.

But the crowning glory of the day should be the reception of its new citizens gathered from the youth of the land. I would have in each town a gathering of those young folk who reached their twenty-first birthday during the calendar year and confer the dignity of citizenship upon them with fitting ceremony.

There would be a speech, a short one, full of the spirit of the great occasion. Of course there would be music. Not battle songs for this day. We are not a warlike people, and our new citizens are not to be baptized in war but in peace. The music must be great music that speaks of the theme of the day and thrills the hearts of the young listeners with its haunting message of love and service.

The time has come when citizenship in this country should no longer be proffered carelessly to any and all who have lived within its borders. It is a high honor to be proudly earned and as fittingly bestowed. We can no longer afford to be unconscious of our heritage, our plainly-appointed duty. We and those who come after us should be American according to the Declaration of Independence, and consciously so. Surely the Fourth of July is a most appropriate time to think on these things and to act on them.

DIANA AND THE HOUSE OF HATE

Yankee?" he inquired sarcastically, uncovering the roots of a running warfare that had started nearly twenty years ago when they were together at Miss Watkins' Select School for Young Children.

He trudged off around the house and she followed him. As he wrestled with the keys of the front door, she fought an immense desire to stamp her foot and howl and pull his hair, and each wondered why the other had got so queer and irritable lately.

THE entrance was prettily colonnaded and occupied the center of a large rounded bay. The reason for the bay became apparent as soon as they stepped through the front door into an immense hall perfectly oval in shape. Diana's professional eye took puzzled note of its salient features—each long curved wall divided into halves by a large fireplace on one hand, a glazed closet on the other. At the far end of the oval a wide staircase rose to a generously windowed landing, above which it continued in two gracefully twining arms to the rounded gallery on which the second floor rooms opened.

Diana stared, and frowned, and suddenly her hands came smartly together.

"Why—!" she exclaimed.

"Why what?"

"Of course! This is the house old Squire Hartridge built for his daughter in seventeen-ninety-something. How idiotic of me not to recognize it at once, with that famous ledge——!"

"You've been here before?"

"Never. But of course I know about it. Wasn't my own grandmother a Hartridge?—another branch of the family. Besides, every negro—" (she said "nigra" as all good Southerners do) "—north of Richmond knows this place."

"Why?" Trench asked, wondering a little at her queer excitement.

She tried to shrug humorously, but failed somewhat. "Because it's a bad-luck house," she said.

"Oh, ha'nts?" he grinned.

"Not exactly. But—things happen. Lots of people have died here. Suddenly. Accidents. And there's never been a live child born in the house. You must admit that's queer, in a house that's been lived in, on and off, by half a dozen generations. Our old nurse Calline used to say——"

"I thought the house had been empty for the last fifteen years."

"THAT'S just it. Ever since cousin Dick Hartridge fell out of one of the up-stairs windows and broke his neck, and his wife saw him fall and went into convulsions and lost the baby she was expecting and very nearly died herself. That was strange, too, because it almost duplicated the first tragedy of the house—I mean when Charles Egbert killed himself in a fall on the stairs and his wife, Squire Hartridge's daughter, bore a dead child and died the next night. But after the Dick Hartridge horror the family gave the house up as a bad job and put it on the market. Nobody around here'd touch it."

"Sweet of the family, I must say—trying to slip the hoodoo over on the next fellow. Any other casualties?" Trench asked absently, preoccupied with the odd realization that Diana, with the lock of hair hanging untidily over her nose and a half-defiant, half-startled look in her eyes, was a thousand times prettier than in her most self-possessed hours of trim perfection.

"Lots of 'em. Wouldn't waste 'em on a hard-boiled Yank like you, though. But I'll tell you one thing, Smarty—if you mean to get any work done on this place you'll have to get white labor from town. Not a nigra'd put his foot inside the garden gate."

"Spit-cat!" he murmured absently. "Here, let me fix that hair for you."

She obediently handed him a tiny pocket comb.

"You haven't called me that for years and years," she said, half to herself, and moved restlessly under the gentle clumsiness of his fingers.

"There!" he said at last, a trifle flushed. "Now, bring on your spooks. This is a wonderful opportunity for them. Deserted house, peach of a thunderstorm coming up——"

THE merest tremor of sound came from the blocked horizon, like those guns sometimes heard miles from the front in France.

Diana shivered.

"Let's hurry. I hate thunderstorms," she muttered. "If we're really going to dine at the Lock Club, we don't want to get drowned on the way."

"By Jove, that's so." Trench briskly opened one of the four doors leading from the oval hall and found himself, not in the adjoining room as he had supposed, but batting around blindly in what appeared to be a tiny dark closet. It was Diana who rescued him, pushing him bodily to the left where a second doorway faced the first at a slight angle and some twelve inches to one side of it. Owing to the darkness of the closely shuttered room, Trench had taken for a closet what was really a kind of vestibule, necessitated by the unequal thickness of the wall which separated a curved hall from a rectangular living-room.

"I should have warned you," she said penitently. "Why, George Hartridge gave his head such a fearful bang on one of these very doors that the family always thought it was the reason for his going crazy crooked, all of a sudden. Forged and had two wives at the same time and I don't know what all!"

"Somebody crazy crooked certainly built this house in the first place!" Trench spluttered. "What's the idea of these doors, anyway?"

BUT she was not hearing him, though listening she certainly was. She seemed to be straining her ears toward some sound too tenuous for her companion's notice. At last she turned to him, her brows contracted.

"Listen to the river," she said, putting up an arresting finger. "Do you hear how it kind of giggles?"

"Not getting scared of the ha'nted house, are you?" he grinned at her meanly.

Her shoulders snapped back in a gesture he knew too well.

"Scared—me? What's the matter with you! Come on, let's see the rest of it."

They turned and stopped suddenly arrested by their first glimpse of a painted panel, dark with age, above the fireplace.

"Squire Hartridge himself," Diana murmured. "I'd seen photographs of—of it—but they didn't give you an idea——"

They stood motionless for a moment before the stern old portrait.

"Nice thing to live with, I must say!" Trench laughed, shaking off an impression of sudden discomfort. "What did he stick his old mug up there for, anyway?"

"He planned and built the house for his daughter Malvina, you know. He had a fad for architecture—studied it in England in his youth," Diana answered, lowering her voice unconciously and standing close to Trench.

"He looks—angry," the latter remarked thoughtfully, unconciously imitating the girl's lowered tone.

"Poor thing—he had a right to!" she told him, in a conciliatory voice that seemed to be addressed to the portrait. "She was his only child and ran away with Charles Egbert, son of one of the Squire's most shiftless farmers. He was furious. They say he just shut himself up in his great house for over a year, brooding over it and hardly speaking to a soul. Then he decided, apparently, to forgive and forget. Built this place and gave it to Malvina Egbert——"

"Egbert. Is that the fellow who killed himself on those stairs?"

"Yes. They'd only lived here a few months."

"I'll bet the Squire was delighted!"

"Oh no—no!" Diana caught him up sharply and her side glance at the portrait was almost apologetic. "Malvina Egbert, as I told you, died the next night, and the Squire was all broken up. Used to wander around this empty house day and night, and one morning—one morning the servants saw his body out there caught on one of the boulders in the river at the bottom of the gorge. They don't know whether he stumbled off that narrow ledge or——"

"All the same," Trench told her slowly, "I wouldn't live under the eyes of that thing for a farm. If you do the interior of this house, Di, make the Benders get rid of it."

He walked up to the panel and tapped it sharply with his nails. "Oh, painted square on the woodwork, I see. He meant it to stay. Well, a curtain over it, then, or a good thick coat of enamel——"

A last flung spear of sunlight seemed to strike a spark of anger from the immobile, searching eyes of the portrait. Then the clouds abruptly swallowed up the sun, and the two young people were left in a greenish twilight to stare at the slowly graying face above their heads.

Diana was the first to turn, with a quickly suppressed shiver.

"What nonsense!" she cried gaily. "Why, George Trench, I believe you're the one that's really scared—of an old portrait. Come on. We've got all the rest of the house to see and the storm's coming up fast. Race you to the top!"

THEY reached the upper floor panting, and were met by an accumulation of stored heat as dense and stifling as a feather quilt.

"Whew!" Trench mopped his brow. "This is fierce. Let's open some windows and cool it off a bit before the storm hits. Here, you take one of these rooms and I'll go across the hall and see if I can't set up a draught."

He was half-way across one of the rooms when a sudden exclamation from across the hall, something between a gasp and a scream, fairly stopped the beating of his heart.

"Di—my God—Di!" he shouted, dashing madly around the curved gallery to a bedroom where, to his unspeakable relief, the first sight that met his eyes was Diana herself, chalk white, leaning weakly against the frame of an open window.

"What's happened?" he said, going up to her and grasping her shoulders with the roughness of relief.

She gesticulated weakly toward the raised sash, too shaken to speak, then with a gallant attempt at a laugh.

"So silly—" she gasped. "Didn't see the sill was—was so low—almost pitched out—gave me a—a beastly jolt——"

"Low!" Trench exclaimed angrily, "I'll say it is low! Why—the old fool! The sill comes barely to my knee!"

She seemed to wilt under his heavy hands, and had to turn her head so that he might not see the foolish tears that had sprung into her eyes. Yet not to save her life could she have told him that it was not the sudden swoop forward, not the momentary hanging in mid-air with only the bricked terrace below her, that had given her the worst shock. No, it was the kind of beastly chuckle the river had uttered, just before her desperate twist of hips and shoulders had flung her back to safety.

His narrowed eyes looked searchingly at her pale and downcast face, then he gave her a slight shake.

"Come," he told her sharply, "pull yourself together. No post-mortem hysterics. Buck up, old girl!"

It worked. She smiled weakly, but her teeth unclenched and she wiped her eyes with a fairly steady hand.

On the stairs he said, practically, "I think we've seen all we want of this darned place for one day, don't you? It's too dark for me to look it over properly anyway, and to-morrow I can bring out my foreman and building contractor and do it up brown. If you want to tag along I'll add a pot of paint for that spooky——"

CRASH! Only his instinctive clutch at the bannister and Diana's quick hand on his collar saved Trench from copying Charles Egbert's fatal slide down those very stairs. As it was, he came down full weight on a twisted ankle and for the next few minutes sat in a writhing heap, while Diana murmured panic-stricken consolation and with her fragrant handkerchief wiped the beads of sharp pain from his forehead.

"All right now," he said shakily. "Whew—that thing did hurt, though! Queer. I'm usually as sure-footed as a goat."

"It's this house," she exclaimed, between anger and fright. "I declare, the devil's in it!"

"Yes—downstairs. In black stock and white ruffles. I'm beginning to think he put a curse on the whole place—a nice gift, chucking people downstairs and out of windows!"

He stood up gingerly and sat down suddenly with a wry face. To cover his weakness and give himself time to recover, he said as casually as he could.

"While I'm here, I might as well see if these stairs have warped any. It's agin nature,

What impression does your skin create?

HOW will those whom you meet today remember you tomorrow?—first impressions make lasting memories. Will they think of you as keen, alert, dainty, altogether charming, or will a bad skin make you seem sluggish, indifferent, careless?

Don't let people get a wrong impression of you. Guard your skin against those enemies—blackheads, oiliness, clogged pores, sallowness, etc.—which destroy its beauty and place you in a wrong light. Cleanliness is the chief source of a good complexion and among medical skin specialists cleansing with a pure soap and warm water is the method most highly recommended.

RESINOL SOAP is ideal for every skin and will stand any test of purity. Its particular fragrance as well as its rich color is your guarantee for the healthful Resinol properties it contains. No heavy perfume is required to conceal inferior quality. Buy a cake from your druggist or toilet goods dealer, and bathe your face with it tonight. Note how readily it lathers, how gently but thoroughly it cleanses the pores, how easily it rinses, how soft, velvety and refreshed it leaves your skin.

If your complexion is now marred by blackheads, blotches, roughnesses, etc., apply Resinol and see how quickly it clears them away. This soothing, healing ointment has been successfully prescribed for years for skin disorders. A Sure Way to End Dandruff

There is one sure way that never fails to remove dandruff completely, and that is to dissolve it. Then you destroy it entirely. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and two or three more applications will completely dissolve and entirely destroy every single sign and trace of it, no matter how much dandruff you may have.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop instantly, and your hair will be lustrous, glossy, silky and soft, and look and feel a hundred times better.

You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store and a four ounce bottle is all you will need. This simple remedy has never been known to fail.

LIQUID ARVON

my dear girl, for two men to break their necks on the same flight of stairs."

He had taken a spirit-level and a small pocket-rule out of his pocket and was performing strange rites with them. Suddenly his lower jaw came foward a little and a short exclamation broke from him.

"Diana," he growled, "look at this."

To please him she looked at the little spirit-level as, from his cramped position, he placed it first on one step and then on another, as far as he could reach. She saw that on two out of three steps the bead stood fairly in the middle of the glass opening. On every third step it slipped sharply to the left.

"Warped?" she asked, not understanding.

"Warped nothing!" he told her with unusual gravity. "I've been measuring the risers, and they're shaped. See—you can even feel it with your finger tips. It's too small a thing for the eye to notice, of course—only an inch on every third step—and you might live years in the house without finding it out. But anybody coming down quickly or carelessly—comes down, that's all!"

They stared at each other for a full minute, then:

"What do you make of it?" he asked quietly.

She pressed her fingers together in a distracted little gesture.

"I don't make anything. I don't want to think about it—here. George—I hate it! Let's go away!"

He looked at her quickly. Her near spill and his actual one had jarred her badly, he decided.

"All right. Let's go," he echoed, and she helped him to his feet.

He was very lame, and only by clinging to her with might and main could he negotiate the descent down those perilous uneven stairs. In spite of this, he suddenly discovered that he was becoming increasingly conscious of the nearness of her slim shoulder. Diana was a cold minx. It was years since he had—well, had his arm around her like this.

"Lean hard, Georgie!" she said once, when his ankle drew an involuntary grunt of pain from between his locked teeth, and somehow he did not quite know what to reply.

THEY were half across the hall when a quick spatter of rain on the roof, followed by silence, gave them pause.

"She's here," Trench announced cheerfully. "Now, the question is, scoot for it, or wait sensibly under cover?"

Diana hesitated.

"No scooting for you just yet, I'm afraid," she said quietly. "And you're so shaken up and hot I'm afraid a drenching would give you cold. Perhaps we'd better wait."

He found, to his surprise, that he did not want to remain in that house of sinister suggestions a bit more than she did, but was ashamed of his misgivings.

"Right!" he assented cheerfully. "But, see here. The cushions of the car are going to get soaked. Suppose you run out and put up the top—I oiled the hinges yesterday and it almost works by itself. And, by the way—if the rain starts hard before you can get back, don't try running for it. Get my slicker out of the catch-all and tuck yourself up in it till the storm's over."

She eyed him keenly.

"You want to get me out of the house," she accused him.

"Silly!" he laughed. "Why would I?"

"Don't you?"

"Well, I thought it had got on your nerves rather, and perhaps you'd feel happier——"

"I'll feel happier right here—with you," she added without thinking, then turned quickly away, hoping he had not heard her.

He had, but with such a shock of agreeable surprise that it momentarily struck him dumb. By the time he had recovered himself they were in the living-room, where her steps had mechanically led him.

"There!" said Diana, almost too volubly. "Sit right here in the window-seat. Goodness, how stuffy a shut-up house can get!"

They sat there together side by side, rather silently. To Trench had come a sudden disagreeable feeling of being shut into a room with something that—well, that he didn't quite like or understand. Shut in, moreover, in a disabled condition. It was ridiculous, of course, but it tormented him having Diana, gamely surmounting her nervousness, in his keeping as the physically weaker vessel is always in the keeping of the stronger, and knowing that his injury rendered him powerless to protect her.

"How clearly we can hear the river in this room!" she broke in on his meditations.

He listened. Yes, the river did obtrude in the quiet of the shut house. And it did giggle, in a series of maddening little "ha-ha-has" that started low in the scale and rose to a gasp like a hysterical woman, breaking off abruptly only to start further off.

"It's louder than it was," he said reasonably. "I shouldn't wonder if it was swollen by a good big storm further up the country."

"I guess that's it," she murmured.

Because she was white and unnerved, he wanted to put his arm around her. But extensive knowledge of a chilly and scornful Diana restrained him. To escape the desire, he raised his eyes to the picture, the merest shadow now in the stormy gloom.

"YOU say," he questioned the girl slowly, "that the Squire drew up his own plans for this house?"

She nodded, while he clasped his knee and studied the portrait intently.

"It's odd. He doesn't look the forgiving kind," he said suddenly, "and yet, he gave his daughter and her husband the house—planned it himself. Di, those stairs can't have been an accident!"

"Don't!" she begged with a little shudder.

He turned on her accusingly. "You've got some sort of a hunch about this. Out with it!"

"Later," she said miserably.

But, being a man, he could not be satisfied with this.

"Those stairs—those shaped steps—" Trench was muttering. "By Jove, Diana, I have it!"

It was almost a shout, and Diana started convulsively.

"No!" she said sharply, with almost the effect of warning him back from a danger.

"Yes!" he retorted exultantly. "Why, it's plain as day! You say the Squire was so furious with Charles and Malvina Egbert that he shut himself up on his estate, brooding, for a year. Well, brooding if you like, but above all planning—planning how to get even with them. I wonder how long it was before the idea of this devilish gift house came into his brain. Do you know, before I get through with it, I'm going to see how many more little man-traps I can find here? He wanted them to die!"

A LONG growl of thunder crept through the house and the windows rattled under a sudden gust of wind.

"Georgie!" Diana pleaded, her hand on his arm, "Leave it alone. It frightens me. We're in this house and—and he's dead. Please!"

He did not even hear her.

"Wait—I'm getting it. I know I am. He was religious, see?—or what he called religious. He couldn't quite square it with his conscience to merely wipe out the two people who'd bitterly injured him, but he could put it up to the Almighty. Make a weapon and put it into the hands of his fiendish God and say, 'There now, do what you like with it!'"

Outside, the trees had begun to sway and bend before the first blasts of the storm. The gorge of the Potomac was a black gash across tossing grays and purples of the countryside. Lightning played incessantly over the face of the solidly-piled clouds.

Diana stood up suddenly. "I can't stand it!" she exclaimed with a flutter of hysteria in her voice. "This house—it—I—oh, can't you feel it? Let's get soaked—let's get struck by lightning—anything—but let's get out!"

"Why, you poor kid!" Trench rose painfully to his feet. "I'm so sorry, old girl. I didn't realize—of course you're all shaken up after that nasty spill you just missed upstairs. What a chump I am! There, there——"

Whereupon she put the final touch to his amazement by burying her head on his shoulder and bursting into tears.

He pressed her to him closely. A very new and tender feeling seemed to be eclipsing and yet strengthening all his old affection for her. Words, a babbling rush of them, rose to his lips and—stopped.

It was as if a cold hand had been laid on his mouth.

He looked up, dazed by the sudden check. His eyes, he could not have told why, went to the invisible portrait. Then he understood.

There were some things—like happiness, for instance—that the Squire would not tolerate in his house.

All Trench's vigorous young manhood rose to the silent challenge.

"Di!" he cried out with such unnecessary violence that she started back from his arms. "Di—I love you!"

A long flash of purplish lightning, the storm's real batteries going into action, lit every corner of the well-windowed room. In its fierce glare the face of the portrait leaped into life as suddenly as though it had sprung from a trapdoor. Both young people standing below it caught their breath. The eyes of the thing seemed to shine with an insane ferocity, and what had been mere grimness before now appeared twisted into fiendish malignity.

THE lightning died as abruptly as it had flared, leaving Trench and Diana motionless in the intensified gloom. To both of them, simultaneously, it seemed as though the room filled slowly, inexorably, with some hideous presence of evil bent on crushing them.

There was death in the room.

For a moment Trench thought the house had been struck. He felt something of the dazed sensation that he had experienced in France when a shell burst in the far end of his trench.

A confused message of danger and urgency was bidding him act, and he had been in too many tight places to disregard it.

"Listen, Di," he said quietly, "I want you to get out of here. Quick. Make for the front door—I'm coming."

She stood her ground. "Think I'm going to leave you?" she asked, and put her arm around him.

"Di—for God's sake!—I beg you!"

"Hush!" she said.

He resigned himself to the inevitable and lunged along at his best pace while she struggled gallantly beside him.

"The doors—look out!" she cried suddenly.

Forgetting the double opening and confused by the winking lightning, Trench had charged blindly into the passage. He snapped his head back, but not soon enough to avoid a glancing blow from the further door frame. Diana's outflung arm against the wall saved them both from a fall.

"You—go—alone, now!" he muttered, half-stunned, but she only clutched him more firmly.

The storm was squarely over the house, which shook and swayed under the buffets of an almost cyclonic wind. As the pair made their way across the hall, a tremor seemed to undulate from the very foundations. Diana could have sworn that the floor had taken on an actual uphill tilt.

WHEN they reached the door a torrent of water dashed itself in their faces.

"Don't stop! Get clear of this!" Trench shouted.

Shoulder to shoulder, stumbling, falling, creeping on hands and knees, beaten to the very earth by the rain that drove into their faces like bullets, they dragged themselves to the cedar windbreak, bent almost double now with the force of the wind. There they crouched.

Through the blinding avalanche of water, Trench turned to look at his companion.

She was soaked to the skin, of which she showed a good deal, since of her sheer white blouse nothing remained but a few dripping shreds. Her hands and skirt were a mass of mud, and the almost sculptural blond hair of which she was so proud flapped around her face in dank, snaky strands.

For her part, she saw a bruised and collarless ruffian. One foot, with the ankle greatly swollen, stuck stiffly out in front of him. And a naked wet shoulder gleamed through a considerable gap between the coat and the sleeve.

And yet I have no doubt that each would have been willing to declare that the other had never looked better.

Trench held out his arms and Diana flung herself into them with passionate thankfulness. If in their first kiss was mingled the faint flavor of blood and tears, be sure that both looked upon it as the consecration of their new-found love.

They did not even hear the extraordinary sounds, rather like the snapping of giant firecrackers, that had suddenly begun to rise above the scream of the tempest.

"You dead game little sport! You brick!" he said brokenly.

"Oh George — George — George!" she laughed and cried together. Then, following an earlier thought.

"Our old nurse Calline used to tell us, " 'If dat mean ol' house evah give sumbuddy somethin' 'sides mis'ry, it gwine be so mad it'll jes natchally chuck itse'f into de rivah!'—And now it's given us each other!"

"Look!" cried Trench.

Huddled together, past speech and almost past thought, they watched the square pile of brick and wood move, with majestic deliberation at first but gathering speed at the last, across the narrow ledge that separated it from the hungry waters.

OPEN WIDER, PLEASE!

had known it for a year. Miss Madden and other gossips would be like flies outside a tight screen. They couldn't get at her to sting her, because, whatever they said, that tight screen was her own innocence. The thought was like a guarding hand over the delicate white flower in her heart.

Suddenly Mathilde began to cry. Not noisily as before, but just as incurably—slow streaming tears. She thought she was crying because she hated Miss Lois Blair so.

IN THE morning Mathilde was still a little shaky and hollow-eyed. But, "Silly thing!" she kept saying, as she fluffed her hair to mask the hurt eyes. "Everything is just the same."

Her mother brought a box wrapped in brown paper to the breakfast-table.

"I baked some ginger cookies yesterday," she said. "You didn't get to eat any last night. I wrapped up a few for Doctor Fred. He always makes such a fuss over them."

Mathilde thought she mustn't take the cookies. But if everything was just the same, why shouldn't she take her mother's cookies, as she had been doing after most of the bakings all the past Winter?

But nothing was the same that day—nothing at all. In the first place, when Mathilde passed through the outer waiting-room to her office she had meant not to look at Miss Blair's picture on the high desk. If it had been standing where it always had stood, she wouldn't have looked at it. But out of the tail of her eye she missed it. It was gone completely from the top of the desk. Mathilde looked for it then, and found it face down in the deep waste-basket at the corner of the desk. Oh! The careless janitor had jarred the furniture while dusting, and the picture had fallen. With no especial deference, only her customary precision, Mathilde picked up the hateful thing and replaced it. So she had to look at the haughty, lovely face, and the haughtiness or the loveliness or both made her sigh. She was provoked at that. She had done all the sighing and sobbing that she meant to allow the night before.

So she hurried into the little lavatory to change to her business aspect—that is, her becoming uniform—before Doctor Fred arrived. But he had arrived. His hat and coat were hanging on the regular hook and his white jacket was gone. Mathilde shut herself in the closet and changed quickly, feeling a little nervous and queer and improper, because she had always managed this dressing outside of the doctor's hours. Everything seemed to be happening to upset her determined program of casualness. When she stepped out of the closet, she heard Doctor Fred's steps in the hall.

She heard him come into the waiting-room and stop. He stopped for quite a few minutes—looking at the picture.

"Good morning, Miss Matilda," he called from out there.

How had he known she was present?

"Good morning," said Mathilde, and then, as he stood in the door, "Oh, aren't you well, Doctor Fred?"

He looked glum and mad and disgusted—and queerly flushed.

"I'm all right," he said, smiling at his assistant, however.

"Mother sent you some fresh cookies," faltered Mathilde. This was no time to mention ginger cakes, she knew. But there they were.

The glumness broke into bits before her eyes. The doctor threw back his head and laughed—long and joyously and altogether unreasonably.

"Bless her sweet heart!" he said.

And Mathilde blushed furiously. Then she knew that, no matter how she tried, things couldn't be the same any more. Even the routine of work hardly helped.

THE farmer came at eleven. He was a nice farmer, young and brown and strong and hearty. He had nice eyes. They watched Mathilde closely as she stood at the little swinging stand mixing cement. The light from the window came through the fluff of her hair and made her seem very bright and lovely all in her white costume. And her dainty hands were deft at the mixing.

When the patient was released, he picked up a bundle and presented it to her.

"I feel I owe you something as well as the doctor," he said, flushing shyly. "And I knew you wouldn't be mentioned in the bill. I made bold to bring you a little something. It's a queer sort of present, maybe. But I had such nice Spring chickens that I thought you and your mother might enjoy a couple."

It was very nice of the farmer, and Mathilde said so in a warm rush of appreciation, but all the time she could feel Doctor Fred laughing at her.

"Oh, Miss Matilda," he burst out when the man had left, "what do I know about you?"

Mathilde really yearned to kick him. He was so wicked when he chose to torment a body.

"Did you see how he kept looking at you all the time?" he went on. "Never blinked. I could have taken out all the teeth he had, and he wouldn't have known what I was doing. Well, he's a nice fellow. Surprised he's stayed a bachelor all this time. Got a nice big house and a housekeeper——"

"Doctor Fred, please!"

Mathilde had turned on her tormentor with tears stinging in her eyes.

"Why, Miss Matilda!" He spoke gently. "I beg your pardon."

And when she turned back to her work, trying hard to blink away her spurt of emotion, he still apologized.

"I am a stupid lump," he said, "not to have realized before this that you have grown up—too!"

"Oh, please don't pay any attention to me this morning," begged Mathilde. "I'm just too silly!"

"Are you ever silly, Miss Matilda?" asked Doctor Fred.

"Hopelessly," she said. And then, to prove it, she recited for him the poem about the banker's molars. Doctor Fred laughed and laughed in loud gusts that subsided into delighted chuckles.

"Now, that's a morning for you, young lady!" he said at the end. "Don't you think you'd better go home for lunch—and take those chickens?"

"I'll just send them by the drug-store boy with a note," said Mathilde. "Then we can have them for supper."

"Can you?" said the doctor wistfully as she left the office.

THE way he said it was ringing in her ears as she looked up at the desk and found the picture gone again. When she returned from the drug store, the doctor too had left. He always went home for lunch, leaving her there on guard. Mathilde is to be pardoned for hunting the photograph. It was not in the waste-basket. It was truly gone. So were the smaller pictures from inside the desk. She saw that when she sat down to check up some bills.

She was glad that the early afternoon was busy. For some reason when the rush ended early, at four o'clock, she was frightened.

"You can go, Miss Matilda," said the doctor. "I'll stick around a little while in case anything turns up. You need to get ready for those chickens."

But when Mathilde came out into the office in her street attire he sat in his magnificent adjustable chair, staring so flating out a window that she couldn't leave without speaking to him, though she didn't know what to say. He sensed her presence, turned and saw her standing helplessly in the door, and rose—exactly as he would to Miss Blair.

"I hope the chickens are nice," he said, putting on the air of a polite little boy on his best behavior who wants something and hopes he may get it by indirect methods.

Mathilde still couldn't find her voice. She wanted to say, "Come eat chicken with us. There's just mother and me."

But that wouldn't do.

"Miss Matilda, don't you really think I own a share of those chickens? You wouldn't have had them except for me, would you?"

"No, of course not. I—I should have given you one."

"I'd much rather you'd ask me to supper, I like fried chicken better than raw ones."

Mathilde made a face in her distress of spirit. How could she invite him to her house?

"I know what you're thinking," said this terrible man. "But that's all right. I am not engaged to Miss Blair any more, Miss Matilda. No. We disagreed on several things. Don't ever get married on a disagreement. It will give you a bum start."

Mathilde had known that they had disagreements. But to her, love—mutual love—was something so exalted that disagreements couldn't matter. She knew that Doctor Fred wanted to stay in Meldon and his fiancée wanted him to be a stylish doctor in the great city. To Mathilde Doctor Fred's love of his own people, his joy in working among them, was one of his finest attributes. Surely Miss Blair, who was so smart, would come to see that. Even if she did not and still loved him and—more marvelous than that—he loved her, they would go on and get married anyhow—surely.

"So," said Doctor Fred, "you could invite me to supper, you know. If you don't, it will look mean, because I'm coming to see your mother afterward anyhow, to thank her for the cookies—personally."

What could Mathilde say?

"Mother and I would be very glad to have you come to supper, Doctor Fred."

She did not know that the primmer she was the sweeter she was. Doctor Fred, I think, realized it better.

"Thank you," he said, his blue eyes dancing. "I'll be there at six."

OF COURSE Mathilde couldn't believe that this thing had happened. All the way home she didn't believe it. She stopped in the garden to pick a few of the first irises to put in a bowl on the table in case the thing was true, but still she didn't believe it.

With troubled eyes Mathilde went into the house and told her mother, thinking how strange it sounded, that Doctor Fred was coming to supper. Her mother didn't seem too much surprised.

"I thought he'd come one of these days," said she.

"What?" said Mathilde.

"You see, Mattie," said the mother, "you didn't let me finish what I started to say to you last night. Miss Henrietta told me that Doctor Fred and Miss Blair had broken off. She said they'd been having words back and forth for a long time—she was so set on his coming back to the city and setting up in style. Miss Henrietta thinks maybe he wouldn't have been so set against it if she'd been a little nicer about Meldon. Fred's a great home boy, you know. The two of them almost split at Christmas, and afterward, Fred offered to compromise. He did agree to go to the city, if he could take you along as his assistant. Seems he thinks a lot of your help, Mattie. And all of a sudden she got jealous. She came out here to take a look at you—remember?"

Mathilde, dizzy as she was, did remember a brief February visit.

"And she made a regular fool of herself," said Mrs. Farish, "the way women will. And Doctor Fred was disgusted, I expect. Anyhow, they had a terrible quarrel, and she sent him back his ring, and he's going to have it made into a breastpin for Miss Henrietta. What do you think of that?"

"Poor Doctor Fred!" said Mathilde.

"Oh, I don't know," demurred Mrs. Farish. "Miss Henrietta seems to think he'd made a lucky escape. Well, I've got potatoes to peel. You go and pretty up, Mattie."

Before her dresser Mathilde hardly dared look at the person in the mirror.

"Big silly!" she scolded. "Wicked little fool! It's all a mistake. Everything is just the same—just the same."

But her hands gripped the dresser top amazingly hard, and her eyes would shine and shine.

6138—Making-over possibilities are suggested by this ensemble frock consisting of a sleeveless overdress and one-piece slip-over underdress. Use linen with underdress of printed cotton voile; plain crêpe satin with silk crêpe, etc. The underdress has a straight lower edge (44 inches).

19 years or 36 bust requires 2⅝ yards 39-inch silk crêpe, with 3¼ yards 35-inch printed silk for underdress.

The ensemble dress is for ladies 38, 40 bust, misses 15 to 20 years.

6146—An evening frock with inserted godets may put sleeves in its separate one-piece slip and call itself an afternoon dress. Make this slip-over one-piece frock of crêpe Roma or crêpe de Chine, of one material or with lace godets with a flesh color or matching satin, silk crêpe or heavy crêpe de Chine slip; or use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or crêpe satin, etc. The flower is hand-made. Lower edge of slip 44 inches.

36 bust requires 4 yards 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6007—5631—A jabot frill beautifies a slip-over tunic blouse which may be made longer. Use prints in crosswise designs, radium, crêpe de Chine, Canton crêpe or plaids, with plain to match; wide borders, novelty faille and satin, ribbed silks, etc. The lower edge is straight. For the costume slip with its inverted plait at each side below the waist-line use crêpe meteor, crêpe de Chine, etc. Lower edge with plaits out 54½ inches.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 39-inch printed silk for tunic (in shorter length) and 2⅝ yards 39-inch satin for slip.

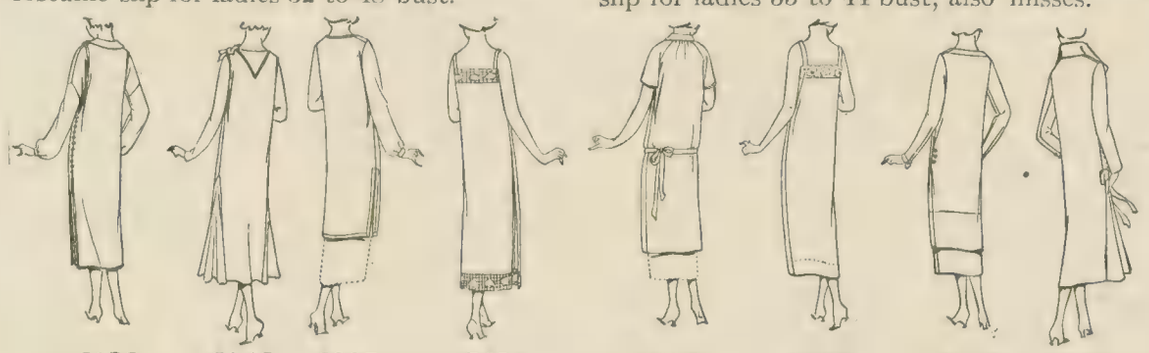
The tunic blouse is for 32 to 44 bust; the costume slip for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

6162—The very slim shoulder-line and the circular flare attached across the front of this new coat are smart features. Ruching or fur follows the line of the flare when the coat is made of ribbed silks, satin or heavy silk crêpe, or use soft twills, ribbed wools, cashmere coatings, etc., with or without fur. Lower edge 2 yards.

19 years or 36 bust requires 4 yards 39-inch satin.

The coat is for ladies 38, 40 bust, misses 15 to 20 years.

6148—Crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or crêpe satin makes this one-piece dress which slips on over the head. Or without the trimming band make it of wide borders in crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe or crêpe satin, with plain to match; printed crêpe de Chine, etc. The lower edge is straight.



36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 35 or 39 inch silk crêpe. Lower edge 46 inches.

The dress is good style for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine and 2⅜ yards 35 to 39 inch crêpe de Chine. Lower edge of slip 44½ inches.

The tunic blouse is for 32 to 44 bust; the slip for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6144—The new circular flare stretches across the front of a slip-over one-piece dress that keeps its back straight, and fits closely at the hipline. Use Canton crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin or crêpe faille with contrasting ribbon tie; or use prints in heavy crêpe de Chine, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, satin or radium, or novelty crêpe satin with plain to match. Lower edge 44 inches.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6094—The tie collar need not always tie on a one-piece dress that has a straight plaited flounce. This dress slips on over the head and is made of prints in crêpe de Chine, radium, silk crêpe, satin or Georgette, or foulards with Georgette to match or with plain to match. Or use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin, crêpe Roma or Georgette.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 35-inch printed silk (with dress cutaway beneath flounce) and 1½ yard 36-inch plain silk.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6114—10329—The raglan sleeve has grace in its shoulder-line. Make this slip-over one-piece frock in peasant style of Georgette, pongee, cotton Georgette, cotton pongee, cotton voile or light-weight cotton crêpe, of one material, with contrasting, or printed with plain to match. The embroidery is smart. Work in color. Without embroidery use light-weight flannel or wool jersey. The lower edge is straight.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine. Lower edge 48 inches.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6124—Rippling from throat to hem, a jabot of self-material or contrasting trims a one-piece frock of crêpe Roma, Georgette, etc. Or use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or crêpe satin with lace edging. This slip-over frock has inverted tucks at the side and the straight lower edge makes it suitable also for wide borders in crêpe satin, etc.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine. Lower edge 46 inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6120—Hand-made flowers are lovely on this slip-over one-piece frock which fits closely at the hipline. The gathered straight apron front is soft looking. Use printed crêpe de Chine, foulards, etc., with plain to match. With long sleeves use crêpe Roma, crêpe satin, plain crêpe de Chine or Georgette, and with no sleeves, lace with lace flouncing apron, etc. The lower edge is straight and the dress may have a body lining.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 40-inch printed Georgette. Lower edge 44½ inches.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6058—A double jabot centers itself on a one-piece frock suitable for wide borders in heavy silk crêpe, crêpe satin or crêpe de Chine with matching Georgette. Or make this slip-over, close-fitting-at-the-hipline frock of printed heavy crêpe de Chine, printed heavy silk crêpe, printed satin, printed crêpe faille, novelty faille and satin or printed crosswise designs, with Georgette to match, etc. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 1½ yard 54-inch bordered silk and ¾ yard 39-inch Georgette.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

5 years requires 2⅛ yards 35-inch cotton print and ¾ yard 32 or 36-inch plain.

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years.

6129—Separate bloomers may accompany this simple, slip-over one-piece frock. Use plaid or striped linen or cotton crêpe, prints or stripes in cotton broadcloth, pongee, etc.

7 years requires 2¼ yards 35-inch cotton print for dress and bloomers.

The dress is for girls 6 to 10 years.

6127—4491—A shirred-brim hat is smart with a one-piece slip-over peasant frock with raglan sleeves and a straight lower edge. The dress may have separate bloomers.

8 years and 20¾-inch head measure require 2⅛ yards 39-inch cotton voile (with hat).

The dress is for girls 6 to 10 years; hat for girls 2 to 12.

6131—10179—Quite new is the circular suspender skirt of linen, linen-finished cottons, twills, etc. Make the separate blouse in peasant style of plain cotton voile, lawn, etc. The embroidery is smart. Work in color.

12 years requires 1½ yard 39-inch crêpe de Chine and 1⅛ yard 54-inch flannel.

They are for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6115—3727—An adorable little slip-over frock is made of crêpe de Chine, pongee, etc., printed in small designs, etc. Use chintz, etc., for the hat. The lower edge is straight and the bloomers are separate.

4 years and 20-inch head measure require 2⅜ yards 35-inch cotton print (including hat).

The dress is for little girls 2 to 6 years; hat for children, girls, misses and ladies.

6133—A short-sleeved, buttoning-down-the-front waist and straight trousers make this little suit. Use linen-finished cottons, chambray, madras, rep, poplin, pongee, etc. The collar and cuffs are detachable.

3 years requires 1⅛ yard 35-inch linen.

The suit is for little boys 2 to 6 years.

6117—A plaited jabot is smart on a slip-over one-piece frock with a straight lower edge. The collar may be detachable. Use pongee, crêpe de Chine or silk crêpe, printed in small designs; striped pongee, striped crêpe de Chine, etc., with plain to match.

12 years requires 2¼ yards 32-inch striped silk broadcloth.

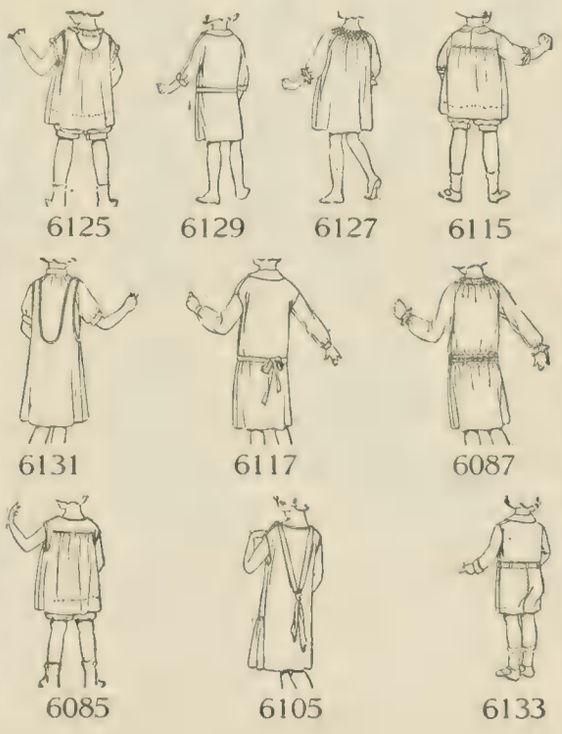
It is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6087—Smocking or shirring is very effective but may be omitted for a simple one-piece frock in peasant style with raglan sleeves. Use Georgette, pongee, cotton voile, cotton Georgette or cotton pongee, etc., for this slip-over frock. The lower edge is straight.

13 years requires 2⅜ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

It is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6085—A soft frock puts its sleeve and yoke in one. Make this slip-over dress with straight lower edge of plain crêpe de Chine, fine cotton crêpe, cotton voile or pongee, etc. The bloomers are separate.



5 years needs 2 yards 39-inch dotted voile.

The dress is for girls 2 to 6 years.

6105—10335—The "grown-up" air of this one-piece slip-over frock comes from the hand-made flower and the straight gathered flounce across the front. The embroidery is smart. Use crêpe de Chine, cotton Georgette, etc., with contrasting ribbon, etc.

13 years requires 1⅞ yard 39-inch Georgette.

It is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 39-inch cotton voile. Lower edge with plaits drawn out, 1⅝ yard.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

6150—The gathered apron is a smart adjunct of this slip-on-over-the-head one-piece frock. The lower edge is straight and the collar and cuffs may be detachable. Use cotton voile or fine cotton crêpe—plain, printed or striped with organdy collar, etc., or crêpe de Chine or Georgette printed with plain to match or striped with contrasting, plain cotton Georgette, etc.

36 bust requires 4 yards 39-inch novelty cotton voile. Lower edge 48 inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 52 bust.

36 bust and 38 hip require 4½ yards 27-inch flannel (with skirt attached to camisole body.) Lower edge, with plait out, 52½ ins.

The blouse is for 32 to 44 bust; the skirt for ladies 35 to 49½ hip measure.

6132—The kimono sleeve further simplifies making a one-piece slip-over frock. Use stripes or prints in cotton broadcloth, cotton crêpe of good weight, cotton shantung, linen-finished cottons, heavy crêpe de Chine, radium, shantung, plaid or striped flannel, plaid linen, striped silk broadcloth, with plain to match, gingham with organdy, etc. The lower edge is straight.

36 bust requires 3 yards 35-inch novelty cotton. Lower edge 46 inches.

The dress is charming for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 35-inch striped cotton broadcloth. Lower edge 46 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6128—A trimming band masquerades as a Russian closing on this one-piece slip-over dress with a straight lower edge. Use plain linen, linen-finished cottons, cotton broadcloth, cotton crêpe of good weight, cotton shantung or shantung with batiste, net or lace edging jabot; or without the jabot these materials printed or striped, plaid linen, gingham, etc. Or use bordered wide flannel, etc. Lower edge 46½ inches.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 36-inch material (with shorter sleeve).

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6170—A frock that is easy to wear has a long rippling jabot and a cluster of plaits at each side front and back. Make this slip-over one-piece dress with its straight lower edge of printed Georgette, radium, silk crêpe, foulards, etc., with matching Georgette jabot, etc., or use Georgette, crêpe Roma, crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin, flat crêpe, etc. Lower edge with plaits drawn out, 1¾ yard.

36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 39-inch printed crêpe de Chine and 1½ yard 39-inch plain.

The dress is charming for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6173—This lovely afternoon or dinner dress has a becoming yoke and apron, both with straight lower edges. Make this one-piece slip-over frock of crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma or crêpe satin with lace. The hand-made flowers are of harmonizing ribbon with green ribbon leaves. Or use prints in Georgette, crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin or foulards with matching Georgette, printed cotton voile, etc. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 40-inch Georgette, 1⅝ yard 9-inch lace insertion for yoke and 1⅛ yard 6-inch lace edging.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6158—Gathered all around, the straight skirt attached at the hipline presents a new soft style. The frill is also different. Make this slip-over frock of Georgette, chiffon, chiffon voile, crêpe de Chine or crêpe satin—printed with plain to match, plain and of one material, or plain with lace edging; or use printed cotton voile with plain to match.

36 bust requires 3⅝ yards 40-inch printed silk. Lower edge 2¼ yards.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6171—A circular apron and a yoke in a fancy outline register a new style. This one-piece slip-over frock fits closely at the hipline. It may have a body lining with a camisole top. Use crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, crêpe faille, etc., printed with matching Georgette; flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin or crêpe faille with Georgette or lace; crêpe Roma, etc., with lace. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 3¼ yards 40-inch printed Georgette and ⅜ yard 40-inch plain.

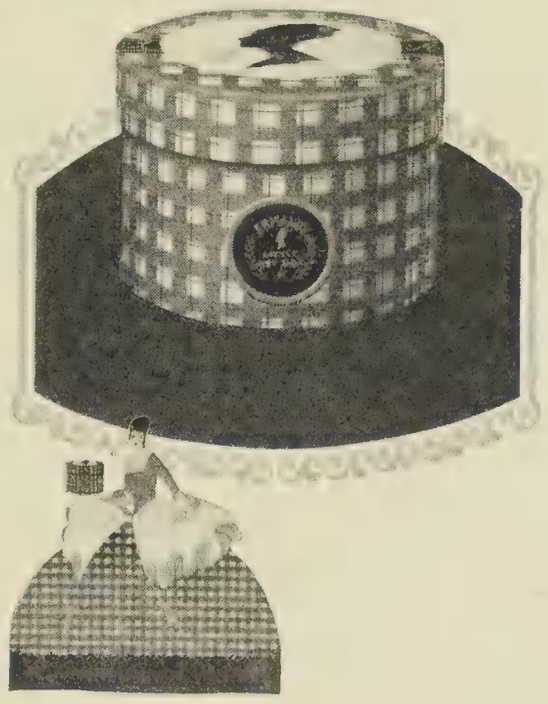
It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6163—10787—A suspender effect is created by this one-piece slip-over dress. The monogram is attractive. Work in color. Use linen or linen-finished cottons with printed cotton voile or eyelet embroidery and self or bias-fold tape bindings; satin with a lighter colored or a contrasting silk crêpe or with printed crêpe de Chine and self bindings; etc. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge 47½ inches.

19 years or 36 bust requires 1 yard 35-inch silk and 1½ yard 54-inch flannel.

The dress is for ladies 38 to 40 bust, misses 15 to 20 years.

6172—Something quite new in aprons is this sectional one attached in a fancy outline. The tie collar of this one-piece slip-over frock is also smart. Use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma or crêpe satin, etc., or prints in cotton voile, fine cotton crêpe, crêpe de Chine, Georgette, radium or foulards with plain to match, etc.



36 bust requires 3¾ yards 39-inch Georgette. Lower edge 44 inches.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

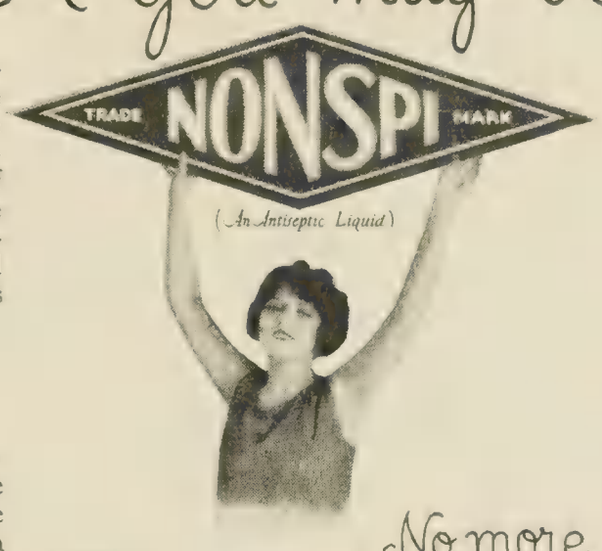
I am Free, You may be!

IF YOU are troubled with Excessive Armpit Perspiration, we are prepared to prove that you can be free from this unhealthful and embarrassing condition. By the use of NONSPI (a free sample of which we will furnish, if you wish) you can protect your personal daintiness, avoid armpit odors and save costly dresses from ruinous perspiration stains.



Keeps the Underarms Sweet and Dry

NONSPI (a pure antiseptic liquid) is a time-tried remedy, and because of its high remedial value it need be used—but twice a week—that is, in the average case, two applications during the week are sufficient to divert the excessive perspiration to other portions of the body where there is better evaporation and keep the armpits always normally dry and odorless.

Chemists and Physicians endorse NONSPI, nurses find it indispensable and all first class toilet goods dealers and druggists sell it. In fact, NONSPI has been approved by the very highest medical authority possible, and so, of course, women everywhere—more than a million of them—are using it regularly about twice a week.

Let NONSPI protect you too! We know that once you have used it, you would not think of being without it. The price is 50c a bottle (several months' supply) or, if you wish first to make a convincing personal test, we will send you, absolutely free, sufficient NONSPI for this purpose and booklet telling what medical authorities say about Armpit Perspiration.

Applause for Hutchinson

The stir is already starting over A. S. M. Hutchinson's sensational DELINEATOR novel, "The Increasing Purpose," the second instalment of which appears in this issue. The leader of America's General Federation of Women's Clubs, Mrs. John D. Sherman, writes to us in highest praise of Hutchinson's courage behind this intense love-story of very real people and their hot human emotions. She says: "I am deeply interested in Mr. Hutchinson's recital of events culminating in Simon Paris's recognition of the fact that God had brought him safely through the perils of the world war for a definite purpose. His recognition of his special relationship to God and his willingness to serve in any way that should be revealed to him are logical and fitting. His willingness to serve is perhaps the most vital factor. I wish there were more of this attitude of mind in all of us for the sake of a saner and safer American life. Indeed, it is the only possible salvation for the world—this appreciation of our relationship to God and our responsibilities under the relationship."

A novel Fresh from The Big Top

Last month we told you something of the circumstances that contributed to the writing of Dixie Willson's "Little Texas," which begins in this issue. You will recall the perfect setting for the composition of this circus story—quiet corners of trains during the long trips between stops, moments snatched out of the interval between the noonday parade and the afternoon performance, remnants of daylight hours spent with pad and pencil in the shadow of the calliope. And now for just a word about the author, whose biography is brief in terms of years because she is still in her twenties, but not without a few high spots for all that. Miss Willson is an Iowan whose first professional literary effort appeared in the children's page of the Chicago Tribune when the author was twelve. At sixteen Miss Willson was the composer, librettist, ballerina, director and producer of a three-act musical comedy with a cast of sixty-eight. The success of that ambitious enterprise resulted in her going to Chicago to join a musical show. As a compromise to parental opposition to a stage career, New York was the next objective, on the understanding that she was to devote herself to writing. Miss Willson managed to sell her first story while she still had twenty cents with which to keep the wolf from the door. Thereafter things came easier. A job in the scenario department of a motion-picture concern provided a regular livelihood and stories written in spare time gradually found their way to the best magazines, including THE DELINEATOR. There have also been a few songs, one or two screen scenarios, and several very successful children's books. Rather a remarkable showing for a young writer who has spent three full Summer seasons as an active member of the circus, which, we mention again, is the source of "Little Texas."

Making Preaching Popular

Just before Christmas of last year a poll was made of the ordained clergymen of all the Protestant denominations of America. Each minister was asked to name ten preachers whom he ranked as the most influential in the American church. Out of the ninety thousand ministers of all churches who were addressed the undenominational religious journal that conducted the poll selected twenty-five preachers whose names led the list and who, in the opinion of their brethren, stood out as "men of prophetic vision, of pulpit power, whose message seems most vitally to interpret the mind of Christ." Harry Emerson Fosdick, of New York City, was one of the ministers to share that unique distinction. Since that time he has published his confession of faith, which was widely quoted in the newspapers, severed his official relations with the Baptist communion, and left the Fifth Avenue pulpit that had become a magnet for listeners of all faiths and of none. Doctor Fosdick's powerful appeal to the average person largely consists in his ability to interpret the important Scriptural truths in terms of our daily living. His ability to fill a real need in the souls of a huge lay public is amply demonstrated by the sale of his books, some of which rival fiction titles in their popularity. Doctor Fosdick is at his best in handling the significant theme that is the topic of his message to DELINEATOR readers in this issue under the title: "Are We Producing Character?"

MIX and SERVE

Edited with Willing Hands and a Mean Pencil by a Mere Man

THE corps of research workers for whom we set the task of digging up data about the relative mental development of boy and girl students, so the facts might be made known without fear or favor through this column, have brought to light some curious examples from school-examination papers ◈◈◈ Experts who pretend to know what goes on in the minds of little girls are asked to account for the sources of misinformation that resulted in the following answers to teachers' questions: The Epistles were the wives of the Apostles. Louis XVI was gelatined during the French Revolution. In India a man out of a cask may not marry a woman out of another cask. Parallel lines are the same distance all the way and do not meet unless you bend them. Pompeii and Herculaneum were caused by an overflow of saliva from the Vatican. Abyssinia is a four-petaled flower. Curie is a kind of sauce. Maude Ballington Booth shot Abraham Lincoln. Frances Willard was a pugilist ◈◈◈ So much for pedagogy ◈◈◈ Our thanks are due to the anonymous Croydon, Pennsylvania, correspondent who sent us the advertisement of Squire Walmsley, reading: "Get your marriage license here. Ceremony quietly performed. Sensible people come here. Lots of time and money saved" ◈◈◈ There is a great to-do in Pondoland, South Africa, because, due to hard times, some of the native bucks are unable to complete their payments on wives purchased on credit during the past three years. The parents of the ladies involved refuse to consider the return of the slightly shop-worn purchases in lieu of further instalments of the amounts due ◈◈◈ The name of Mrs. Arnavilunguak recently appeared on a hotel register in New York. She is a member of the Eskimo tribe that helped Admiral Peary in his trip to the Pole in 1909 ◈◈◈ We have cabbaged a new anecdote about the late Empress Dowager of China from a book by the Princess Der Ling, who writes: "One day her Majesty was taken slightly ill and complained of suffering from severe headache. Several doctors were summoned, each of whom took her pulse. This was quite a ceremony in itself. The doctors knelt at the bedside and her Majesty stretched forth her arm, resting her hand upon a small pillow. After this each doctor wrote out a prescription, all of which were different from each other. We handed them to her Majesty, who chose the one which she thought the nicest to take, and two attendants and the doctor himself had to take a dose in her presence before she would touch it. Then she would take it all right" ◈◈◈ A Houston, Texas, girl has sued the International Great Northern Railroad for $11,500 dollars to compensate her for an unsightly scar that prevents her from wearing sheer silk hosiery ◈◈◈ A new menace to the parents of ingenious urchins is reported from St. Paul, Minnesota, where a boy whose mother refused to pay him for chores done about the house picketed his home with a sign reading: "This House is Unfair to Labor" ◈◈◈ Knock-kneed ladies will gather crums of comfort from a newspaper interview in which the surgeon who straightened the nose of Jack Dempsey said: "Of course the American girl is knock-kneed. If she isn't, she's malformed. Bow legs are different. They show malnutrition or too early attempts to walk" ◈◈◈ A well-known investigator with a statistical turn of mind asked several women ministers who had officiated at weddings if they had kissed the bridegroom. They all refused to reply ◈◈◈ A Quinton, New Jersey, couple celebrated their sixty-second wedding anniversary with a dinner cooked on the stove the husband gave his wife on their wedding-day. She estimates that she has cooked over 65,000 meals on the same stove ◈◈◈ A husband who was obliged to write a letter to his wife every day during her enforced absence from home thus described a show he attended: "The heroine came stealthily on the stage and knelt, dagger in hand, behind a clump of ribbons. The hero emerged from a large bunch of flowers, and as soon as she perceived him she fell upon him, stabbed him and sank half-conscious into a very handsome aigret. This may sound queer, but the woman in front of me wouldn't remove her hat, and that's how it looked to me" ◈◈◈ Summer is one of the best seasons to mention THE DELINEATOR when writing to advertisers.

"Standard" PLUMBING FIXTURES

Standard Sanitary Mfg. Co.
Pittsburgh

Above, fried cucumber and fried squash. At the right, fried potatoes, fried eggplant and fried chicken. All cooked in the half-hour before serving. Below you will find directions for frying these and other foods.

My wholesome frying-pan dinner

I SUGGEST chicken, always at its best in summer. Cut a frying chicken into desired pieces, wash, sprinkle with salt, and let stand in colander in ice box. When ready to fry, roll in flour. Into a cold frying pan of medium size put half a cup of Crisco. When the Crisco is hot put in the chicken. Let fry slowly on one side until nearly done then turn and finish on the other side.

You will find that Crisco fries a chicken to a crisp golden brown without smoke or odor. Crisco does not soak into the food nor does it take the taste from food. Therefore none is wasted, for what is left (and most of it is) can be strained back into the can and used again.

Delicious and unusual to serve with your chicken is fried pineapple. Peel a fresh one, cut in slices one-third inch thick, core, dust with flour, fry in hot Crisco until soft (test with a toothpick), browning on both sides. Dust with powdered sugar, arrange on a platter with chicken, as you see in the picture.

8 different ways to fry cold boiled potatoes

Of course you want potatoes with the chicken and here are 8 ways to pan fry cold boiled potatoes.

For hashed brown, chop, sprinkle with salt. Put in cold frying pan, four or five tablespoons of Crisco and when the Crisco is hot put in the potatoes. Fry, stirring with a fork occasionally until they are partly brown, then shape into omelet form in one side of the pan and fry until a rich brown on the bottom. To keep the omelet shape, when serving place the platter upside down over the skillet then turn both the platter and skillet over quickly.

To make Pittsburgh potatoes add one chopped, raw green pepper to two medium sized potatoes and cook like hashed brown. For Lyonnaise potatoes, slice thin, add sliced onion and chopped parsley and fry just as you would hashed brown.

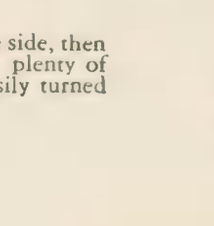
To make sauté potatoes dice them. If you like O'Brien potatoes add to the diced potatoes chopped raw bacon, pimentos and onion. Prepare the frying pan as you do for hashed brown potatoes and fry, stirring with a fork occasionally until brown enough to suit you.

To make Jackson potatoes use equal parts of sweet and white potatoes diced and fry as you would sauté or O'Brien. For German, American, cottage or home fried (all different names for the same thing) cut thick round slices and fry in hot Crisco on both sides. For caramel sweets, cut cold boiled sweets in half lengthwise, and sprinkle generously with sugar while frying.

So many other vegetables are delicious when pan fried. If you like fried eggplant you will like fried cucumbers. To prepare them for the frying pan, peel, cut lengthwise about one-half inch thick, salt and put in ice box. When ready to fry, drain and roll in flour.

To prepare crookneck squash and eggplant for frying we cut in round slices. If squash is large, remove seeds which leave the slices in rings. Salt and put in ice box. When you are ready to fry put enough Crisco in cold frying pan to partly cover the vegetables when it is melted. Then fry on one side until soft, testing with a toothpick. Turn and brown on the other side. Drain on soft paper and serve.

There are so many pleasant things about frying with Crisco. It will not smoke up the house because it fries to perfection before it is hot enough to smoke. Food fried in Crisco is never greasy It is crisp and brown on the outside and thoroughly cooked inside.



Cakes, pies and desserts, too

Crisco makes delicious desserts, too, always light and dainty, and the most flaky, tender pastry you would care to eat—and cakes, too. You will be delighted to see what wonderful cakes may be made entirely with Crisco, and how much more economical it is.

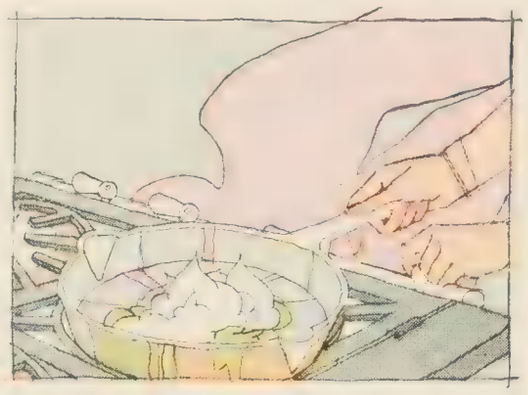
Free! "Miss Olive S. Allen's 200 Tested Recipes"

Miss Olive S. Allen, a real home cook of many years' experience, gathered and tested hundreds of recipes from all over the world, from famous foreign chefs, from old fashioned home cooks; from luxurious hotels and little inns; even from trappers and hunters. From these many hundreds she selected the best two hundred and put them in this little cook book. To secure it free, simply send your name and address to Section F-7, Dept. of Home Economics, The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, O.



Crisco is the trade-mark for a superior shortening manufactured and guaranteed purely vegetable by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, Ohio, U.S.A.

HOW TO FRY WITHOUT SMOKE OR UNPLEASANT ODOR:

1. Put Crisco into a cold frying pan. To thoroughly cook the food (for example, pineapple) without smoke or scorching, fry slowly, using enough Crisco to partly cover it. It will not require the constant attention frying does when only a little fat is used.

2. Put frying pan over low heat. As soon as Crisco is melted put in a small piece of bread. As soon as bread starts to brown put in the pineapple.

3. Cook slowly until brown on one side, then turn to brown the other side. With plenty of Crisco in the pan the pineapple is easily turned without breaking.

4. Strain the Crisco back into an empty can and use it for the next thing you want to fry. No one will know you have fried pineapple in it for Crisco never carries the flavor of one food to another—not even fish.

WHAT TWO MILLION WOMEN READ

AMERICA has become a nation of readers. Books published in the United States have doubled ten times over in this generation. Books imported from other lands have also increased rapidly. The numbers and the qualities of magazines have advanced. The printed word has become the passion of the people.

Considering these facts it is important for men and women to choose carefully not only their own reading but the books and periodicals which are going to influence the lives of their families.

THE DELINEATOR has long believed that this subject deserves consideration from the best minds in the land. Three years ago we sent a questionnaire to libraries, universities, high schools, parent and teacher associations, women's clubs and important individuals to ask what in their judgment were the first twenty books that should be put in the home, and the next twenty, and so on until two hundred had been purchased. The result of that vote produced a list which deserved serious consideration. It was so important that President Coolidge, then Vice-President of the United States, wrote an article about it.

Now the General Federation of Women's Clubs has announced the results of a similar contest. The problem which they put up to the club women of the country was this: If a family of five, including three children from sixth grade to high school, has an annual budget of one hundred dollars to spend for reading matter, how should they apportion it? If the same family has fifty dollars a year? Twenty-five dollars a year? For the successful lists several prizes were offered.

THE response to this contest was very large. Forty States sent contributions, book-lists were discussed in the clubs, and often the list sent represented a composite opinion rather than individual choice.

They went first to Mrs. Charles H. Jacobson, of Denver, one of the judges. Mrs. Samuel Inman, of Atlanta, Georgia, next marked her choice in each class from the selected groups submitted by Mrs. Jacobson. Finally they were sent on to May Lamberton Becker, whose knowledge of books is so well known through her contributions to the Reader's Guide of the Saturday Review, and the results were announced by Mrs. L. A. Miller, chairman of the Division of Literature of the General Federation.

We can not resist a thrill of satisfaction at reading in Mrs. Miller's report that of the women's magazines THE DELINEATOR ran highest in the lists submitted and that the first prize-winner, as well as the two competitors who tied for the second place, mentioned THE DELINEATOR on their lists as a necessity for the American home.

First place was given by the judges in the one-hundred-dollar class to Winifred King Rugg, of Arlington, Massachusetts, whose list, with its introduction, follows:

With one hundred dollars to spend on a year's reading matter for a family of five, it is possible to be fairly reckless. The individual tastes of each member can have some recognition. Nevertheless we have to ask ourselves, "Which books of the old are indispensable, and which of the new promise to be worth reading more than once?"

Like the other libraries, this one, though more expensive, has to be built upon the practical foundation of a good daily newspaper, the best paper in that section of the country in which each particular family resides. Fortunately there are several dailies which have built up a national reputation for cleanness, fearlessness and honesty of workmanship. The daily should be supplemented by a weekly digest, like the Literary Digest.

From the fairly large number of magazines listed we believe that the family will derive a wider outlook and a broader culture than from books that could be bought with the same amount of money. But having this varied assortment of magazines, the family can then begin thoughtfully and with deliberation to collect a permanent library.

With seventy-three dollars to spend for books alone they can afford a modest encyclopedia. We suggest the "Everyman's Encyclopedia," which is accurate and complete, though of course not intensive or profound as are the famous compilations of that sort. This work is followed by some histories, national and general, and Bryce's "The American Commonwealth," which is a general education in itself. It does not detract from their value as books for general reading that some of them are sometimes used as text-books in schools and colleges.

Biography has high cultural value both for the information which it conveys about some famous man or woman and also for the avenues which it opens into other departments—into history, literature, sociology and philosophy. That is the reason why our list of biographies is long. Choicest of the lot is the story of her own life which Miss Lagerlöf, the best-beloved woman in Sweden, has told in "Marbacka."

A library without poetry is like a man without vision. The two "Golden Treasuries" listed give the best of English lyric poetry from Elizabeth to George V.

Doctor Stearns's "Challenge of Youth" is a lesson to parents. James Harvey Robinson's "Mind in the Making" is something to put one's teeth into and chew over for a long time.

Here, for a hundred dollars, is ample reading for a year; and for more than a year.

We will also mail a copy of THE DELINEATOR'S own book-list, "Two Hundred Ideal Books for the Home." By simply sending us four cents in stamps to cover postage you may have all these and also a reprint of "Books for Better Homes," the important article on good reading which was written for THE DELINEATOR and the Better Homes Movement by President Coolidge when he was Vice-President of the United States.

THE UNKNOWN GIVER

THIS is for those who believe that men serve only for honor or gain.

Nearly fifty years ago the newspapers carried accounts of a child prodigy. His name was Josef Hofmann and he played the piano like a genius, though he was untrained. Theatrical managers and exploiters pushed him hard. As a result he was almost wrecked physically and artistically.

Then the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children obtained an injunction forbidding the employment of the boy in theaters. So for a few years his name dropped out of the public prints and there was no more talk of Josef Hofmann. Apparently he was just one more child prodigy who for lack of opportunity would amount to nothing.

But suddenly there came a mysterious gift from one who wished to serve and remain unknown—$50,000 to insure the musical education of this gifted child. Josef Hofmann was sent to study under Anton Rubinstein, and Rubinstein gave back to the world a great musician.

That was forty-seven years ago. Now, long after the unknown giver has finished his good work in the land of the living, Hofmann feels that he must reveal the name of his anonymous benefactor, Alfred Corning Clark, who saved him from exploitation and gave this generation another artist. Hofmann never saw Clark but twice, once in Berlin and once in England.

Back of every achievement in life there usually stands some unsung server!

Play

By ANGELO PATRI

THE thought of playing children brings a smile to our faces and a wistful memory stirs within us. Play means a free spirit, blithe and daring, and never a thought of what may happen next. The romping children are like the frisking, frolicking lambs and colts, playing themselves into strength and maturity. Soon there will be no more frolicking—just a yielding of the neck to the yoke, a bending of the back to the burden. Playdays will be over.

Many earnest parents take just that view of the children's play, so placing them rather close to the beasts of the field in their valuation of the youngsters' power to extract happiness as well as usefulness from the daily routine. To me that idea is not true of children. From the beginning their play has a force and a direction aside from that of physical and mental growth. There is behind it the urge of the race focused in one point in each particular child. A child's play manifests the driving force of powerful instincts; its development leads to the release of powers deep hidden in the unconscious mind of the child.

I do not speak of the games and occupations of early childhood, although they are essential to the growth of the children. Growing out of them, springing from the intelligence that grows by its own growth, come certain tastes and talents that the child shows in his leisured moments—employments toward which he turns when he wearies of everything else. Such occupations are play to him. No matter how difficult the process or how tough the medium, he drives through to his set end and arrives weary in body, it may be, but exultant in spirit surely. That spirit of play is basic to the education of a child and must be regarded with the sacredness of a covenant.

"I wish Tommy would take an interest in something else besides drawing all the time. Every spare minute he gets he is down on the floor flat on his front, drawing for dear life. Every scrap of paper that comes into the house is his, and he covers it with ships and murderous-looking pirates before he goes to bed. Isn't it awful?"

I happened to know Tommy, and I didn't think it was awful at all. I thought it was fine. He played baseball with his nine and came home with scarce one shred of trousers hanging to another, but his team had won. He stood toward the middle of his classes, and his record was good. He was exhibiting a taste that might lead to something worth while, though just what that might be nobody could tell.

A DRAWING child may become a musician, and a musical child may be a mathematician. The thing is to clear the road for whatever is coming and allow each stage of growth to come to full flower, when it will either hold its form or merge into the next. Often the form and manner of a child's play points toward his life work, and it is important to make sure that no obstruction is placed in its way.

There's a boy of nine in the fifth year in school who spends all his spare time in building huts. If there is nothing else handy, pasteboard and newspapers will do, but he prefers bricks and lumber, to the dismay of the neighboring contractors. His mother is greatly distressed. She wants him to be a doctor, and he insists upon playing that he is a builder. There is nothing in his love for building at the age of nine to assure us that he will still be a builder when he is choosing his life work. Nor anything to assure us that he won't either. The one thing that we can count upon is the danger of checking his building in his growing time. It may be leading straight to the school of medicine, or, of course, it may be leading straight to something else. Better let him play it out. If such a desire is checked, somehow there is a warping of the spirit, and the early promise is never quite fulfilled.

"I have not been as successful as I might have been," said an artist in discussing this phase of child growth, "because my mother was afraid that I should starve at my art. What if I did? The hunger of the gnawing self is far sharper than that of the stomach. But she wouldn't hear of my becoming an artist, and whenever I turned to my brushes she would say, 'What? All the work in the world waiting, and you playing with brushes and colors like a child?' To this day when I pick up a brush I hear her disapproving voice, and I have always to overcome that thought."

THWARTING a child in his play is thwarting him in his deep-rooted instincts, and that is never done without harm. The self-chosen task of the child represents his instincts at work with the materials of his environment, his endeavor to understand and fit together the bits of experience that he has gathered. This play that engages a child when he feels at liberty to expand, or that enthralls him in spite of himself and those about him, is the satisfaction of some deep hunger, and it must not be stifled.

"There's Peter. All he likes to do in his spare time is to count and sort picture-cards. Is he to be allowed to do that? Surely such nonsense can not be a part of any life scheme?"

Yes, I think he is to be allowed to do that. Collecting and classifying cards is a stage of growth in a child's development. It will not stay long before changing into some other form, but it is wiser not to interfere with it while it lasts. The collecting and classifying notion changes form many times before its series is completed, if ever. It has been known to persist in one form or another through a lifetime. As long as an activity is not really harmful it should be allowed to work itself out.

To be sure, not all self-chosen activities merge into life careers. Sometimes the bent reaches its climax early and remains a hobby, to carry its happy possessor to pleasant places in the time to come. People with hobbies are happy people, and if the chosen business leads to nothing else it is enough riches for the time. It gives life values that no duty-imposed task ever brings.

PLAY and the manner of it are often a key to the sort of man or woman the child is going to be. The child who loses himself in his play finds his real self, and we who look on can gather much that will help us to help him. We can drop a hint now and then as to the rules of the game and the joy of playing it fairly. We can tell him of the traditions of good sportsmanship, and so set up in his susceptible mind the standards of noble men and women who have played the game before him.

"Betty has troubled me lately. You know she takes great pleasure in raising chickens and selling the eggs and the broilers. This season she has driven sharp bargains with her customers, not beyond the limits of honesty but close to the edge of selfishness. A bit grasping, she found that mother plucked her chickens carefully, washed and used the feathers, so she made up her mind that she would pluck those chickens herself and sell the feathers and get the extra money for herself. I talked to her about it and she said she would do what I said. In a sense she was within her rights, as she thought, but I would rather she didn't stay close to them."

Keeping well inside one's rights in the game is far better sportsmanship than standing on them and demanding their recognition. Knowing the rules of the game and playing well within them, giving those on the other side a fair field and advantage, lends a flavor to the game that lifts it from the plane of contest to that higher one where the pure joy of living and sharing without thought of winning or losing fills the soul of man with content, and the game is the thing.

Those who create lovely things in stone and color and sound and word are called artists. Are not they who make a lovely thing of life the greatest of all artists? They are so close to the fine things of living that they have the humility of greatness and would never claim the title which is theirs. Some of them call it their trade, their profession, their religion, their hobby. It began with the play of a child.

Many of them you know or your neighbor knows. John Finley walks for fun, and along the trail he gathers refreshment for his soul and yours and mine. He sends it to us packed in little poems that sing of the serenity of sky and water and moonlit meadow. The richness of joy that he has gathered from his play has lifted his life work beyond the sense of burden.

My school-teacher and potter, Jarvis, spends his spare time collecting wild flowers and studying bird songs. After the clay and kiln he takes down his tin case and his glasses and sets out. When he comes back, the form and color of the flowers go into his pots, and the songs of the birds lend them rhythm.

Roosevelt loved to play in the woods, on the wild prairie, in the mountains. He was a statesman, a noble leader whose play merged into his work, and the thought of one was the reflection of the other. He spoke in terms of play and worked in the sporting spirit of fair play.

HELP the children to play without interfering. Place within reach the toys and the tools that they seem to need, and stand out of the way. Open the doors of your home to the neighboring children, for from them comes the inspiration of companionship that fertilizes the growth of the others. Sharing is gaining, and sharing with the right sort of companion is double gaining. If a form of play persists from early childhood without alteration, scan it closely. It may be the manifestation of genius. And cease troubling your heart because your child loves to play with what you may call trifles. As he plays, so will he work in matter and manner and spirit. Soon the play spirit that was in the beginning sufficient to itself changes into the concentration of purpose, and if then the old love passes into the new, the child has taken his degree from the school of life and is now a master of living—an artist—for whom life is no burden but a flight of song triumphant.

Nine million germs on one cleaning cloth!

A BRAND new cloth, 20 inches square, was used for one week in the usual cleaning work around a house—washing woodwork, cleaning closets and wash basins, wiping rugs, etc.

At the end of the week, the cloth was washed thoroughly with soap and water, wrung as dry as possible, and afterwards rinsed twice in clear water. Then it was given to a leading New York bacteriological laboratory for examination. The laboratory report showed "a bacterial count of 9×10^6 —that is, 9,000,000 germs or bacteria were present on the cloth."

His health is guarded
because he lives in a health-clean home

Things you should know about germs

Do you know

—What germs really are, how they breed, and when they are dangerous?

—How our bodies protect us from germs?

—How to shield healthy members of your family against contagion from an ill member?

—Why the average life-span of your children will be longer than that of your generation?

—The proper, scientific way to perform your daily house-cleaning?

—What are the danger-spots in cellars, and how they can be prevented?

—How the utmost feminine daintiness may be obtained?

—The symptoms of illness in a baby?

—The five simple golden rules that keep baby well?

—At what age your baby should sit up?

—How many times stronger than carbolic acid "Lysol" is?

—How to sterilize with "Lysol" in case of illness—in case of childbirth?

ALL these questions, and many more, you will find answered in the three helpful little volumes of the "Lysol" Health Library.

LITTLE hands that cling to chair arms, that throw down beloved playthings only to pick them from the floor again. How can we protect them from the constant menace of germs that hide in dust and dirt, that lurk on all surfaces?

Germs, those tiny organisms so small the naked eye can never see them, are a continual danger to children. They take their toll in colds, influenza, measles and more serious illnesses. Mothers know it is impossible to keep the children always spotless, always inactive. One thing only can we do—make safe the places in which they must play.

To kill germs requires no extra trouble

OUTDOORS the friendly sun kills germs quickly. But inside there are a hundred danger places where they can live and breed. Scientists tell us they do not linger long in the air; they settle on all surfaces. You can find them on tables, chair-arms, door-knobs, bannisters, every spot that hands, big and little, must touch.

Soap-and-water alone is powerless to destroy germs. But one simple action, without extra work or trouble, does kill them. Put a few drops of "Lysol" Disinfectant into your cleaning water every time you clean. Into this dip your mop, your broom, your dust-cloth. The protective solution goes beneath mere surface cleanliness, it kills the menacing germs that hide in cracks and crevices.

A wonderful aid to modern cleaning

"LYSOL" is now used everywhere for safer cleaning, because it has three special properties that make work easier.

1. It deodorizes—banishing stuffy, stale odors
2. It purifies, destroying germs
3. Its soapy nature helps to clean as it disinfects

YOU will be surprised to find how the "Lysol" solution helps you in cleaning white woodwork. Finger-spots are disinfected and removed like lightning. Floors are purified, nickel and white tiling shine. Your home is cleansed more quickly and more effectively by the help of these magic drops.

"Lysol" is so carefully blended that in proper proportion it will not hurt or roughen the most sensitive hands. It comes in three sizes, 3, 7, and the economical 16 ounces. Your druggist has it in the familiar yellow carton. If you haven't a bottle, get one today.

"I use it too!" calls NORTH DAKOTA to TEXAS

Yes, and millions of other women smile agreement every Monday

THE women of North Dakota may differ from the women of Texas in matters of politics, breadmaking or books, but they agree thoroughly in the matter of laundry soap.

Ask them why, and they will say something like this:

"P and G The White Naphtha Soap does our work easier, makes our clothes whiter, protects our colored clothes better, than any other soap we know of, and we've experimented with dozens."

So P and G has become the largest selling laundry soap in these two states, just as it is the largest-selling laundry soap in the country as a whole.

Oh, yes, there are also many other reasons for P and G's unprecedented success besides ease, whiteness and safety—

"Being the mother of four children, the care of whose clothes entails endless washing—and I am my own laundress—I use P and G The White Naphtha Soap for all of the reasons you give, and for one other reason—it is easy on the hands. My hands are always soft, a result I cannot get with any other laundry soap, and I have used many brands." MRS. G. C. T., WACO, TEXAS

P and G makes rich, lasting suds in any water, hot or cold, hard or soft;

It dissolves dirt with amazing speed, and thus reduces rubbing and boiling to the very minimum (many women never boil at all with it);

It rinses out like smoke before a summer breeze;

It leaves behind no hint of grayness or soapy odor;

By sudsing readily in lukewarm water, it helps you to keep your hands in good condition.

Let P and G lift the burden of your next washing from your arms. Watch its fine white suds build up in the tub. Compare your results with those you have been used to—for whiteness, for freshness.

Just keep this in mind: there is no mystery about the supremacy of P and G—it is simply a better soap.

PROCTER & GAMBLE

"For several years I used different kinds of soap. Finally I started using P and G White Naphtha. In the past three years I have lived in Iowa, Minnesota and North Dakota, and used all kinds of water, including some strong with alkali. But no soap can replace P and G in my home." MRS. H. R. F., GRAND FORKS, N. D.

LOVE'S DAILY DOZEN

By MAUD HART LOVELACE

Setting-up exercises which led to setting up housekeeping

Drawings by Joseph M. Clement

"YOU'RE MAKING A VAMP OF YOUR HEROINE, AREN'T YOU?" HE QUERIED

THE primary cause was, of course, one William Makepeace Thackeray. But of secondary causes there were several:

There was the broad arm of the chair in the bright, deserted dairy lunch-room. This arm, in addition to providing space for her late dinner, furnished room for the open book from which the challenging line leaped up at her.

There was also, more culpable still, the tall assistant in the public library who often stamped out her nightly load of books. He had informed her that "Sentimental Tommie" was out—and then, with his eyes twinkling behind his horn-rimmed glasses and an eager unbending of his pleasantly angular frame, had suggested confidentially, as one book-lover to another:

"How long since you've read Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair?' I've just been doing it again."

And finally there was Miss Edythe Parsons and her sulky mutter to her typewriter, following a reproof from A. C. Jenkins of the Jenkins Paper Company.

Miss Parsons and Miss Clara Goodwin, with whom this story deals, were both stenographers in the employ of A. C. Jenkins, but the smoothly waved coiffure and shining pointed finger-nails of Miss Parsons were as different from the tossed-up locks and neglected fingers of Miss Goodwin as Miss Goodwin's beautifully accurate letters were from Miss Parsons's slovenly ones.

Miss Parsons had muttered, "Too bad we're not both of us dried-up old maids. Then perhaps he'd be satisfied."

And now Miss Goodwin, having been persuaded to reread "Vanity Fair" and rereading it over her evening meal, halted at Thackeray's simple statement of fact:

"A woman with fair opportunities and without an absolute hump may marry whom she likes."

Clara Goodwin had never been concerned with marriage—that is, with her own marriage, which had always seemed highly problematical. Book-marriages enthralled her. As a tousle-headed child, she had hidden beneath the dining-room table to finish the account of Snow White's wedding. As a tousle-headed young woman, she dined every evening in this same well-lighted corner and dissected marital problems with the modern authors.

But Edythe Parsons's words had been the clang of an alarm clock, jerking her into resentful consciousness. To hear oneself styled a "dried-up old maid" was intolerable.

"I'm not dried-up," Clara murmured defensively. "I have a perfectly decent skin. And twenty-eight isn't—why, twenty-eight is—lots of heroines are over thirty."

But they weren't her type, she acknowledged, shamefaced. They were radiant as flappers and far more subtly charming. She felt deeply chagrined.

She closed her book and reflectively finished her coffee. Thackeray seemed very sure of his ground. He implied that even a hump would not preclude a husband of some sort.

But Clara knew very few men, almost none outside of the vague young chaps at her rooming-house,—but stay! there was A. C. Jenkins. He was chiefly a squat black signature to her. But she visualized him with an effort and saw him squat and black also, with a fringe of gray hair and a creased, intent face. He was a widower. He was rich. He was not impossibly crabbed. If she were to join the husband hunt—but of course she was just dallying with the prospect.

THE petted young wife of a rich old man is unquestionably a more interesting object than an old-maid stenographer in his employ. Clara admitted this to herself. Books are full of discontented young women of the former class, and one would need feel no chagrin at being of their fascinating number. She would live in a grim old house on Frothingham Drive. Sometimes in the late afternoon, on her way from a bridge or a tea, she would drop by for him in the motor. She felt herself in the limousine, wrapped in furs, with violets at her breast, looking out listlessly at the stream of workers emerging from the Jenkins Paper Company. She saw herself nodding with weary graciousness to one Miss Edythe Parsons.

And at that Clara Goodwin jumped up, hurried into her rusty coat and caught up her books. As she paid the largest amount punched in her check the friendly cashier remarked:

"You look kinda excited."

And Clara Goodwin smiled dazzlingly.

"I am. I'm going to be married," she answered, quicker than thought.

Out in the whirling eddies of snow, the exhilaration caused by this unexpected announcement persisted. Disdaining the procession of lighted street-cars, she swung along through the cold. Her mind was snatching at the glories of her plan as children ravage a Christmas tree.

On the steps of the ramshackle mansion which was now Clara's rooming-house, she encountered one of the vague young chaps, emerging with flamboyant muffler and inevitable cigaret for the evening's revels. He mumbled one of the abstracted "G'd evenings" habitual between them, but Clara did not mumble her abstracted "G'd evening" in return. She called out, "Lots of snow!"

Now "Lots of snow!" is an ordinary enough remark, but coming from Clara and coming in a fresh young voice with a bubble of mirth in it, it was enough to make the vague young chap check a sprint toward an approaching car and gaze upon her.

"See how easy it is, how easy, how easy," she sang under her breath as she ran in the house without a backward glance.

BUT her enterprise looked neither easy nor agreeable when, half an hour later, she sat in a faded but beloved bathrobe, her arms hugged about her knees, in the exact center of her bed. She looked, with her fluff of soft brown hair falling about her face, like a small frightened child and indeed she was feeling far from daring. Everything about her shabby little room seemed suddenly dear and desirable, and nothing about the grim old house out on Frothingham Drive seemed alluring in the least.

But with the statement to the restaurant cashier, she had promised herself that she would marry. She would go about it at once. But how should she begin? Thackeray, who had assured her it was possible, offered no assistance as to ways and means.

She scrambled off the bed for a pencil and a pad of paper. A program was the thing to have, of course. One never could accomplish anything without a program. But this program was not so simple as the usual: "Bath at 7:30, breakfast at 8:00." The construction of its twelve items occupied an hour and fifteen minutes

THE DAILY DOZEN

1. Call yourself Claire instead of Clara.
2. Make your hair a "crowning glory."
3. In dealing with Mr. Jenkins, let your motto be "Flattery, flattery, flattery." (Flatter everybody, just to keep in practice.)
4. Be dainty. (Use a subtle perfume, cobwebby handkerchiefs, silk stockings.)
5. Acquire a low laugh.
6. Shroud your past in mystery. (Don't for goodness sake, let anyone know that you went to public school, belong to the Methodist Church, and have never had a beau—not even in the movies.)
7. Keep your hands exquisitely manicured.
8. Learn some French phrases.
9. Go to the library and get books on "How to Be Beautiful," "Correct Dress and Speech for All Occasions."
10. Read up on Helen of Troy, Cleopatra, Salome and George Sand
11. Exploit your femininity.
12. Persist.

And thus began the metamorphosis of Clara into Claire!

HER noon hour the following day was devoted to the purchase of the subtle perfume, cobwebby handkerchiefs and silk stockings mentioned in Item 4. A "French Self-taught" was also procured. The shopping was exhilarating but a bit bewildering. She sniffed at so many perfumes that in her confusion, when tactfully pressed for a decision, she took what she had in hand at the moment—which happened to be white lily. White lily was, of course, out of the question and later she bestowed it on her landlady and secured the more suitable siren's breath.

When five o'clock released her from her desk, she hurried to the library in pursuit of Item 9. She tried to avoid the tall assistant librarian, but he slipped in to greet her ahead of the receiving clerk.

"'Sentimental Tommie' has come in," he called. "I've been saving it for you."

"I don't want it," said Claire—and then was appalled at her ungraciousness.

"Oh!" His face fell. "Can I—is there something else?"

"A beauty book," she answered, desperately, "and one on etiquette."

His brows were puzzled and her cheeks crimson.

"One moment," he murmured, hurrying off.

While he was gone, her heart pounded. Wouldn't he suspect? Wouldn't the whole world suspect and laugh at her? In fact, he was laughing when he returned with two ornate volumes under his arm, and——

"I'm suspicious of you," was his first remark.

Claire's heart stood still.

"Why, what do you mean?"

"You're writing a book yourself—and have a society heroine. You're reading up."

She sighed with relief, remembered Item 3 and offered: "It would take a clever person like you to write a book. I think you could write a wonderful one"

He paused in the stamping out of her books, his expression pleased.

"Do you really? I don't know how wonderful it's going to be——"

Having shoved out upon the sea of flattery, Claire continued to row valiantly.

"I'll be proud to think I knew you," she said, and smiled at him.

The crimson flush still lingered in her cheeks. The assistant librarian stared, as the vague young chap had done.

AS THE vague young chap had stared—but differently, Claire decided on her homeward way. He was nice, the assistant librarian. How like a small boy—a small boy confronted with strawberry shortcake—he had looked when she mentioned his book. She was troubled for the first time by the ethics of her enterprise. What would he think, if he knew——

"But he never will know," she hastened to assure herself, "and I do think he'd write a good book. It would be a sort of 'Treasure Island,' I imagine."

Claire Goodwin had spent the long Winter evenings curled among pillows at the foot of her bed. Here the gaslight fell on her book, and she could read and eat apples in luxury. But luxury such as that was not for Claire!

Claire Goodwin brushed her "crowning glory" vigorously that night. Her nut-brown hair responded with new luster. She awkwardly manicured her finger-nails. She bent and twisted and shivered in front of an open window. And even in bed she did not go to sleep, but waded through the French phrase book.

Yet her alarm went off an hour earlier than usual. No stolen naps for Claire—not with shoes to be shined and clothes to be brushed and cobwebby handkerchiefs to be subtly perfumed!

It was not many mornings later that old A. C. Jenkins, frowning abstractedly at his stenographer as he groped for the right word midway in a most important letter, suddenly ceased to frown at her abstractedly and never was known to do so again.

Instead of veiling her eyes and casting them upon her note-book (her former habit during such pauses) Claire opened them wide and cast them full upon him. Drawn by the clear gaze, he had been led to consider her and had discovered a crown of shining hair, a curve of glowing cheek and a wrist encircled, not by crushed linen as of old, but by a fresh white ruffle.

"What is it, Miss Goodwin?" asked A. C., as if she had spoken.

"Why, surely I didn't speak! I was only thinking."

"Tell me, now, what were you thinking?"

She laughed a low laugh. It was the first public appearance of this laugh, but it made a most successful début.

"It will sound impudent, I'm afraid. I was thinking what a command of English you have. Your letters are always so well phrased, so clean-cut. You have such—savoir faire."

"Humph!" said A. C. But he was rather partial to his literary style. When the letter was finished and Miss Goodwin gone, he remembered her words with satisfaction. He could not be annoyed with her, therefore, when he discovered that she had forgotten her handkerchief. It was a very tiny handkerchief—it made him think of a lavender cobweb—and it was perfumed but very subtly.

He returned it by the office boy and applied himself to work. He was a Titan for work, old A. C. Jenkins. But once during the morning he omitted a sound halfway between a snort and a chuckle.

"Savoir faire!" he said in a tone which proved that French self-taught may serve as well as any other.

ON THE whole, Claire's program was well drafted. There was just one clause which might better have been omitted—an innocent-looking clause—a wolf in sheep's clothing sort of clause. You may have noted it in Item 3.

The night she dropped into the library to ferret out the methods of Helen of Troy, Cleopatra, George Sand and the rest, she would have taken her books and gone if it had not been for that clause. The assistant librarian served her—and he did have nice eyes—yet she would not have spoken, for she was dedicated to her plan. But that wicked little clause fairly jogged her elbow. "You're to flatter everybody," it insisted. And, besides, she really wanted to know, so:

"How's your book going?" she inquired.

He flushed a little and tried his best to keep a smile in leash.

"It was nice of you to remember that," he said, his eyes on his work. "You're making a vamp of your heroine, aren't you?" He held up her chosen volume.

Claire laughed.

"I'd rather read than write," she said evasively. "I'd like to read your book. I have a hunch about it."

"You have? What?"

"I think it's like 'Treasure Island.'"

He laughed out—then, hushing his voice, leaned forward impulsively.

"Oh, heck! We can't talk here! Have you had dinner? Won't you eat with me to-night? My name's Hi Smith and yours is Clara Goodwin, and we've known each other two years, really."

"No wonder girls like beaux," Claire reflected later. But she wouldn't have gone, except for her insidious adviser. "Just to keep in practise," Item 3 hinted in her ear. She touched her library card with a pointed pink-tipped finger.

"Is it wrong on the card? My name is Claire—not Clara."

He regarded her appreciatively.

"It should be Claire," he said.

"WHOM SHE LOVES," SAID CLAIRE ALOUD, TO HI SMITH'S MYSTIFICATION

THE SHRINKING VIOLET

He finds the sure cure for shyness — and hold-up men!

By CHARLES DIVINE

"GET READY TO HAND ME THAT NECKLACE," GROWLED THE THIEF AT NATALIE, COVERING THE OTHERS WITH HIS AUTOMATIC

CHET TAYLOR was a living, one-hundred-and-thirty-five-pound, five-foot-nine example that there were still young men in a noisy young world who suffered in silence—even during Summer vacation. All around him, in the drawing-room of the big house to which they had all just motored from the country club, everybody else was hilariously happy. Especially Wilmer Humes. Wilmer was showing off—and for Natalie Blakesley!

Chet groaned. As a rival to Wilmer he was nothing to boast about. So he left the boasting to Wilmer. Wilmer wallowed in it. His robust chest roundly encased in a sweater as black as shoeblacking, his hair as glossy as a sheet of carbon-paper, his face so handsome that it made Chet miserable at his own facial shortcomings, Wilmer apparently could do everything. What was the use of being intelligent, if Natalie preferred boasting to brains?

But did she? That was the question that tormented Chet as he sprawled in an inconspicuous corner and looked on wretchedly while Wilmer occupied the center of the stage and Natalie bent forward in her smartest of smart sport attire. She was like a radiant young goddess who had adopted modern garb in order to come to earth and look around a bit. She had a delicious short upper lip which revealed dazzling white teeth when she smiled.

She smiled again at Wilmer. And again Chet groaned. He couldn't wag his ears or jerk his thumbs out of joint or clog-dance or crawl around a chair and take a pin out of the back with his teeth or stand on his head—or even on his dignity. He was jerked out of that by Wilmer, who sneeringly called him a shrinking violet and plunged him into a wrestling combat which left him on the drawing-room rug at Natalie's feet.

Chet staggered up and made for the veranda. Wilmer Humes was what was known as "the life of the party." Chet felt like its death.

"I wonder," he mused as he walked out to the road, "if into every man's life at some time comes the thought of suicide?"

It had come into his, he decided definitely, as he dragged his footsteps toward the amusement park, the towers of which rose at the edge of town.

In the park he cramped his long thin legs in a swan-boat on a miniature lake and gazed over the side at the water. Again he groaned. What kind of a self-respecting lake was it that didn't have a spot deep enough to drown in!

So he tried the Ferris wheel, thinking that there was a pinnacle from which one could hurl oneself conclusively to death and oblivion. But when his car reached the top, the view broadened out to include a vast impressive panorama. He couldn't hurl himself at a whole county. It made one lose one's sense of identity to be so small and high above the earth, and if one lost that, there was nothing left to hurl!

"Maybe if I stay here long enough I'll starve to death."

But before this happened his supply of tickets ran out. So he came back to earth, and fell into conversation with an actor leaning against the vaudeville pavilion. The actor had one of the ugliest faces Chet had ever seen—but it was friendly.

"I'm a ventriloquist."

Chet looked interested. That was an idea! Ventriloquism would make a brilliant parlor trick. He pressed the man for details of his art.

"Son, it's a gift!"

With the help of three dollars Chet persuaded him that he too possessed the gift.

"Besides," said Chet, "this is the age of specialization. The man who builds a mouse-trap better than anybody else will have the world making a beaten track to his door."

The actor stared at him, amazed.

"Well, in this here ventriloquism, you've got to keep your trap closed. Get what I mean? And your tongue in the back of your mouth. Only use the tip of it. See? Like this." He revealed a cavern in which Chet saw blazing a rich display of dental work. Under his rough exterior this man had a mouth of gold! "The best way to practise is in front of a mirror, like this: 'Willie, who was that lady I seen you walking down the street with yesterday?' 'That wasn't a lady, Jim—that was my wife!' And always look away at something, so your audience will do the same. Get what I mean? You don't want 'em watching your mug, especially if it's one like mine. That's a natural advantage I have in this line. People don't get interested in my face. Get what I mean? You ought to have the same success."

"Thanks for the compliment!"

THAT was Chet's first lesson in ventriloquism. He had many others before the Summer was over.

He was still practising his new art in the privacy of his den on the last day of vacation—and hoping against hope that it would be he, and not Wilmer Humes, who would ride home from the country-club dance with

The Golden Law of Love

By

HALL CAINE

Author of "The Woman Thou Gavest Me," "The Christian," "The Eternal City," and other distinguished novels

It is unnecessary to say what scenes I devised to make terrible the end of my loveless world; more terrible, as I made myself believe, than the close of Defoe's more realistic "Journal of the Plague." It is also unnecessary to say that beyond a rough scenario I never wrote my fantasy, and that it is now to be counted among the multitude of my books which, being begun, will never be completed. But I do not regret the months I spent on it if it deepened my sense of the importance of love as a force in human affairs; if it made me realize, perhaps more clearly than before, that love is the only creative passion in man and that nearly all the other passions are destructive; that love is life; that the other passions are death; that of all the miracles of God the greatest by far is the miracle of love; that God Himself is Love; that in a sense, love is God, and therefore the human family could not exist without it.

It would be easy to laugh at this, and the like of this. The "bright young people" of literature (middle-aged for the most part) are always doing so—calling it old-fashioned, sentimental, God knows what. Happily, the great minds in all ages and countries have had no uncertainty about the place of love in the scheme of life. "The reason why we honor love," says Emerson, "is because it looks up, not down, aspires and not despairs." "Life outweighs all things," says Goethe, "when there is love within." "Man, while he loves," says Lamb, "is never quite depraved." And we have it on still higher authority that "Love is strong as death. Many waters can not quench love, neither can the floods drown it."

TO REALIZE what the golden law of love is doing to carry on the world and to bind the children of men together, it is only necessary to look at its varying manifestations. Look at mother-love first. The love of the mother for her child, if not the most passionate form of love, is certainly the purest and the most unselfish. It sacrifices all things. It gives itself and is not bought. Lamartine says that to love as the mother loves, for the pure sake of loving, is "almost the characteristic of the angel." I am not sure that mother-love, although so deep and pure, is altogether angelic. There is a wild, untamable instinct in mother-love that is almost savage in its intensity. The human mother will fight as fiercely for her child as the beast of the jungle for her young. But it is all unselfish fighting. The mother-heart gets nothing for itself. The love of the mother for her son takes no account of his deserts. Worth can not win it. Worthlessness can not waste it. The meanest wastrel that ever walked the world has at some time, perhaps always, had a mother to love him. All history bears witness to this pitiful but beautiful paradox. Even the newspapers are full of it.

The other day a young dog, with the devil's dues in him, was tried and condemned for a cruel and cowardly murder. There had not been an extenuating word to say for the man. But as the spectators at the trial trooped out of court, relieved, no doubt, by a sense of justice justified, they came upon an old woman sitting alone in a dark corner of the corridor. Her face was ashen white and her eyes were dry and bloodshot, for all her tears had been shed. She was the mother of the condemned prisoner. And as the judge within had been dooming her miserable son to death, she, in her lonely place without, had been comforting her torn heart, I do not doubt, by thinking of the day of his birth, of the time of his innocent and helpless childhood, of his bright and happy boyhood, of the proud morning when she first watched him going off to school, and so on, and so on, until it had come to—this!

That is one of the records of mother-love that cut into the vitals of one's memory. I have another: Some years ago, in a cottage near my home in the Isle of Man, a poor old widow lived with her only son. He was a graceless and ungrateful young scoundrel and he had been a drag on her all his life. At last he left her to the charity of the parish and went off to America. Beyond this, she did not know what had become of him. But she never lost her faith that he would write to her some day. It was all she wanted—just to know where he was and that things were going well with him. Every evening for years she would walk from her cottage in a side lane to the corner of the highroad when the rural postman would be going by. Then the scene would be always the same—I saw it, frequently.

"Anything for me to-night, postman?"

"No, nothing for you to-night, mother."

And then the old thing would hobble back to her two sticks for another twenty-four hours of waiting by her lonely hearthstone.

I wish to heaven I could throw a crust to the "bright young people" by saying that the prodigal son came back at last to comfort his mother's hungry old soul for another sight of him. He never did. One early morning the neighbors brought me word that the old woman had been found dead in her bed, huddled up as from the cold and with her face to the wall. But without knowing anything of her last dark hour I dare swear that she died with a heart full of love and hope—her son must have died in America (that was the only reason he had not written to her) and his face would be the first she would see when she landed on the other shore!

Such is mother-love! In the scheme of human life what does it mean? It means that this is a part of God's way of carrying on this world. Without this mysterious, ineradicable, selfless and unconquerable love of the mother for the child that is flesh of her flesh and comes from the darkness of her womb, no woman on earth would face death as often as she brings a man child into the world.

LOOK, next, at father-love. It is only less unselfish. The time may have been when a man desired sons and son's sons for his own sake, for the power they gave him as a patriarch, and the dignity they brought him as the head of a tribe whose seed might inherit the earth. But the days of Abraham were brief. They were only a passing stage in the history of human progress and they are long since over. For the majority of men, through the countless centuries, the birth of a son has been an added charge, a measure of increased responsibility, only to be forgotten in the pride of love. But that is a pride that generally outweighs everything.

Fatherhood is a condition that can never be known to the man who is not a father. No successes a father can win are so dear to him as the successes (probably of immeasurably less consequence) that are won by his son; and no failures of his own leave a pain half so poignant as the pain of his son's failures. Who knows but that somewhere hidden behind this law of the father-heart lies, with the majority of men, the strongest impulse toward the acquisition of property? Not so much for himself as that he may leave his savings behind him for the security of his children against the hardships of life—that, I confidently believe, is the strongest spur to work (where it is ordinary, repetitive, every-day work), to early mornings and late nights of labor. I often feel that socialism (mine with that of others) has to make its

WHEN I was a much younger and perhaps more adventurous writer, I conceived the idea of a book to be called "The Last Thousand Days." It was intended to represent the final extermination of the human family from this planet—not by fire or flood but by the elimination of the greatest of the human passions. For its sins, particularly its sexual sins, the Almighty was to lift out of the heart of man the passion of love, and everything that had hitherto held humanity together was thereafter to fall to decay and death. Going to bed at night, so to speak, in full possession of all the passions it had used and abused, the human family was to get up in the morning with the one essential passion gone.

It was not immediately that humanity was to become aware of its paralyzing loss, but only little by little, as the operations of life revealed it. In the household that was to be my central scene, a young mother had so loved her child from the hour of its birth that she could hardly permit the breath of heaven to brush its forehead; but now the child was dying and the mother went out to a dance. A father had been so devoted to his son that he had sacrificed himself almost to the point of insanity to ensure the prosperity, distinction and honor of his future; but now the son was on the verge of life-long ruin and the father did not so much as stretch out a hand to save him.

LATER, the hospitals, the orphanages, the asylums for the blind, the insane, the crippled and the helpless generally had one by one to close their doors for want of funds. An epidemic came, but doctors and nurses gave no more service than they were certain they would be paid for. The epidemic deepened to a plague, and the dead poor were left to lie in the hovels in which they had died, until, for self-protection, the authorities huddled them underground. There was an earthquake at Messina, but no Lord Mayor's Fund for the relief of the thousands who had become homeless was so much as thought of. There was a famine in Russia, but a shipload of food, sent by somebody who had it to his interest to help to keep the Russian peasants alive, was emptied to its keel overnight at Riga, and not an ounce of bread reached the perishing people on the Volga.

Still later, everybody was to live consciously for himself and herself only. Home was to become an ice-house; family a name; marriage a mockery; business a game of grab; politics a shameless gamble; diplomacy an open exercise in the art of mutual deception; religion an unabashed hypocrisy; morality a senseless farce; the welfare of the weak and poor a meaningless aspiration, and the theory of the brotherhood of man and the Fatherhood of God a childish folly.

But at length it was to be realized that the whole fabric of civilized society was falling into dissolution; that the passions of avarice, greed, jealousy, hatred, and revenge were killing human society, and that the only passion that had ever been able to keep it alive, whether physically or spiritually, was the passion of love—Love with its children, Pity and Mercy and Justice.

The Pursuit — and Capture! INCREASING PURPOSE

By A. S. M. HUTCHINSON

Record-breaking Author of "If Winter Comes"

"GOD HE HATH STRANGE WAYS
AND FOR THE INCREASE OF
HIS PURPOSE CHOOSETH
HE STRANGE VESSELS"

"RUN AWAY, LINDA, AND POWDER YOUR NOSE," SAID SIM. "THIS IS MAN'S TALK"

WHAT HAS HAPPENED IN THE STORY:

THEIR name was Paris—Andrew, rich, austere; Charles, hard-pressed and peevish; and Simon, gay and lovable, the youngest of the three. But the war strangely changed young Sim. Fighting from first to last, witnessing death for long dark years, he felt a hideous blackness creeping into his sunny mind. "Why am I spared?" Why? Why? Why? An answer, as if from his beloved dead mother, came just in time to save his reason. "You are spared," his mother seemed to comfort him, "for a special purpose." This knowledge carried him through to the end of the war—drove him in peace time to resign his commission in the regular army. Only two things mattered: One, to find his lost Elizabeth, the girl who had written understanding letters to him at the front; the other, to find the meaning of this mysterious purpose of his. In the dark as to his future, Sim went to visit his brother Charles and his wife Alice. A strange and strained household this—dominated by a stricken great-uncle, Old Gand, and spied upon by Old Gand's male nurse, Swiss Jule. The spying perhaps was justified—Alice, unknown to the others, had entered into a love intrigue with Conrad Bryne, Old Gand's amorous doctor. The great ramshackle house in Blackheath was rife with approaching storms. Sim felt relief to escape to Andrew, his extravagant wife Linda and their fashionable group in Mayfair. Andrew held the position of financial adviser to Lord Staverton, one of England's richest industrial magnates. At a reception given by the great Stupendity, of department-store fame, Sim ran across a trail leading to Elizabeth Glade. He learned that she was secretary to the world-famous novelist, B. C. D. Ash, author of "If Harvest Fails" and "That Bondage." He learned, too, that her father had died in prison, convicted of embezzlement. Not in the least checked in his desire for her, Sim arranged with B. C. D. (whom he had known in France) for a meeting with Elizabeth at the author's modest workrooms in Bloomsbury. Sim wanted to tell her of his perplexities, tell her of the purpose which pursued him. But when at last these two came face to face—"I love you, Elizabeth," was what sprung from his heart. The girl responded gloriously, then fled from his arms—"but not to be loved, Sim." she said. She had made a vow not to marry until she had paid off all the money stolen by her father from Miss Andiron. It would perhaps take a full twenty years! Resolving to earn it for her, Sim then told Elizabeth about his haunting purpose. Strange indeed it seemed to both of them—but stranger still came Elizabeth's reply: "Sim, I believe that your purpose is of God!"

PART THREE

"I OFTEN think," Sim wrote in a letter to Elizabeth, "of that astonishing thing you said to me, that my purpose is 'of God.' And I just can not conceive any connection between God and me (this sounds flippant, almost blasphemous to write—but I can only write the words I talk and think) and, Elizabeth, I don't know that I want to."

The appearance of the letter, as Elizabeth read it, here changed—and the tone seemed to change. That which she had thus far read stood black upon the paper as though it had been left, while the writer thought, to dry—a fine pen-point had written it and carefully had formed the letters, as though the writer wrote slowly, with circumspection. That which followed was blue as though quickly written and quickly blotted; done with a flowing pen as though the writer wrote in heat, vexed; done in characters boldly formed and frequently underscored as though the writer, reading over what he had written, had read a challenge and with passion leveled his reply.

"I see I have said that I don't know whether I want there to be anything in my life between me and God. I was wrong. I know only too well that I don't. It isn't that I have any particular vices that I feel I should have to give up. I don't know that I have any real vices. But I don't want to be messed up with religion—I don't want that kind of thing—I don't understand it, and I resent it. I want to live my own way and I don't want to be interfered with. No, I say it flatly, Elizabeth, there is no connection that I can conceive between me and God. None."

He had written and erased words which seemed to be false starts at a new sentence. Then came:

"The only possible connection between me and God is my mother, and——"

The "and" was erased. With strange abruptness the letter ended there.

SIM wrote this letter, and many others, while on a trip out of London. It was arranged for him by Andrew. Its itinerary was among the locations of great and small industrial concerns, in the Midlands, in Lancashire, on the Clyde, in which Lord Staverton had controlling or sympathetic interest. And its object was to find for Sim some civil employment in which he could engage.

"Niggs, old man," he had said to Andrew on the morning after his meeting with Elizabeth. "Niggs, old man, I want a job now—I want to get to work."

Andrew gave his nearest approach to a smile. "That's supposed to have been the idea all along, isn't it?"

"Yes, but now I'm out for it, Niggs—and I want it in London."

"In London? It won't be easy. About half a million of you ex-army men are hunting jobs in London, heaps of them doing it on their uppers."

"It must be in London, Niggs."

"I doubt if it will be, Sim."

Sim took this with a troubled brow. He wanted employment now, and he felt, in this first urgent desire of it, that he did not mind what kind of employment. If it did not seem to suit his "Purpose," what matter—now? He had a new purpose. Money must be earned that he might marry Elizabeth. She had declared herself "not to be loved" until her vow was done (twenty years!). But she might, he felt, be won from it if it could be got round by paying off Miss Andiron from their married income. Along the same reasoning the employment must be in London. For Elizabeth certainly would insist on earning some of her debt herself and all her secretarial connections were in London.

Andrew said, "As to London, why not Charles's offer?"

"Niggs, because I want better pay than that."

"What did he offer you?"

"Two hundred and fifty pounds a year. I want twice that, Niggs."

"You'll not get it—in London."

Sim frowned again. "I thought pay ran higher here than in the provinces?"

"It does."

Andrew Paris stood before the fireplace and looked at his brother asking him for work in London precisely as he would have looked at any stranger similarly applying. "Point is, Sim, that in London competition is greater and opportunities—in your line—fewer."

Linda came in.

"Run away, Linda," Sim said. "Run away and powder your nose. This is man's talk." He turned to Andrew and laughed a little ruefully. "My line? I'm dashed if I know, Niggs, what my line is—quite."

Linda sat herself on the arm of his chair. "Your line is to look pretty in a nice red coat, and you were a silly little boy to leave the army."

"They don't wear red coats now, Ugly."

Andrew during these exchanges remained stern, reserved, upright against the mantelpiece. When the two had finished: "That is precisely the trouble," he said. "What can you do, Sim?"

Sim's mouth twitched. He looked troubled. These were signs which Andrew saw daily on the faces of the ex-service men who came to him, and on those faces they moved him not in the smallest degree. Business was business—it was not, and especially the business for which he stood was not, a charitable organization. But this was Sim! This was the jolly little beggar of the old days who called him Niggs, and this was simple, clean young Sim who in these days still greeted him with "Niggs, old man, how goes it?" Andrew put away his frigid air.

"Sim," he said kindly, "what you can do and do well is handle men. I know jobs, several, where I could put the right men, but the jobs are not your kind. If I knew——"

Linda cut in. "Andrew, I've always known you were a monster, but I think now you're the limit. It's just this same old fiendishness of yours about not using your position for anything that any one wants. If——"

Andrew pronounced gravely, "That is it."

"Well, you ought to be boiled and sent in a hand-cart to feed the Dogs Home at Battersea. I'd send you, and mint sauce with you—if dogs like mint sauce—with pleasure. If you know of any jobs, you ought to put Sim into them, all of them. He's your brother, and he's fought for his country, and he's a dear, and I love him. What more could you want?"

Sim said: "Andrew's perfectly right, Linda."

"Right! My goodness, I would like to slap your face, Sim! Siding with him after I—" She tossed up her hands in mock disgust.

"Well, he is right," Sim declared. "Apart from anything else, what's the good of shoving me into a job I don't know the first thing about?"

"Because you could learn and because he could hold you there while you did learn or keep you there forever if you didn't learn. He can do anything, that man."

"But that's a thing he doesn't do," Andrew said gravely. He touched a bell and a servant instantly appeared. "Bring my hat and stick. Is the car there?" Sim or no Sim, he was iron on this point of never in remotest degree using his influence. "You come along with me, Sim," he said. "We'll go hard into this. I've an idea."

"Good-by for ever, Sim," cried Linda. "I know his ideas. He's going to send you where the name of Staverton has never been heard. Tell me what is the postal service to the moon and I'll write you all about my divorce."

"What I suggest, old man," said Andrew, escaped from Linda and driving citywards, "is that you shall do a trip around a lot of big industrial plants in the provinces. You can see people and they can see you. You can handle men and there are men to handle."

Sim said: "I'll do that, Niggs. It's good of you, old man. When can you fix me up to start?"

"I'll get a secretary to work out a list right away. I'll write the introductions by to-night's mail. To-morrow or the day after you can start."

Sim repeated: "I'll do that, Niggs."

SIM was two months on this tour. He stayed everywhere as the guest of a director of each business he visited. "Give the boy the run of the place," Andrew had written to his friends. And Sim, popular as ever in himself, influentially recommended, was given not only the free run of that which he was out to see, but the free comradeship of all who administered those places. He wrote to Elizabeth every day, and he wrote, at the beginning, very light-heartedly. "'Japhet in Search of a Father,'" his first letter said. "Did you ever read that, Elizabeth? I knew Marryat by heart when I was a boy. Well, I am Simon in search of a Job. It is going to be fun, I can see."

Fun appeared in the early letters. They were headed Simon in search of a Job, and they were written in the key of fun. It did not last. The heading, after being constant for some while, suddenly disappeared and there was no reference to its omission.

"I am not liking this very much," he wrote. "I can't see myself fitting into this sort of life somehow."

That was at the beginning of the change.

Later he wrote:

"The trouble with me is that my time's my own all day, and a free pass everywhere—through the offices and through the yards, poking about where the men live and where the unemployed stand in line, and feeding and frivoling at night and week-ends where the masters live. The trouble with me is that I see both sides of the picture. It's a little unsettling, seeing both sides, Elizabeth."

The letter written last before his return again to London said:

"Elizabeth, I have wanted frightfully and I have tried frightfully to get a job. You know why. I am coming back and I haven't any job. Strongly and more strongly, as I have gone about among these factories, I have felt that not in working there can possibly lie the purpose which kept me through the war, made me leave the service, and has had me drifting in search of it ever since. I am as far from it as ever. But I have learned a lot.

"Elizabeth, it does seem to me significant that no job which has been offered me has offered me sufficient. I have been ready, anxious, to take one if it will give me you. But not one of them will give me you. It does look to me as if something mysteriously is working to keep me out of any false hopes until I find it. Just at present I feel an urge to get away quietly by myself somewhere, away from all this rush and noise that I have been living in, and think out the thoughts that I have gathered here."

This letter carried a postscript: "Elizabeth, I sometimes have an uncanny frightened feeling that God is after me."

THREE days after Sim's return to London he again was in the train, impelled this time by that "urge to get away quietly by myself somewhere" of which he had written to Elizabeth. "To think out those thoughts that I have gathered here," he had told her—and returning to Mayfair Street with those thoughts instead of with the employment he had set out to find, it was in explanation of that failure that he offered the thoughts to Andrew.

"Fruitless, eh, Sim?" Andrew had said.

Linda was out to a dinner-dance ("feed, flit and flirt," as she expressed it). The brothers had dined alone. Now, in two deep armchairs before the drawing-room fire, Andrew reopened the thing they had begun to debate.

"Fruitless, eh?"

Sim gazed into the fire. He said slowly: "Well, I shouldn't call it fruitless, Niggs. It has taught me a lot. I know where I am now."

Andrew exhaled a long breath of tobacco smoke and idly watched it drift about his cigar. He was but very mildly interested. "Yes, that's useful," he said lazily. He had made rings with the last of his exhalations and, elbow on the arm of his chair, drew his cigar through them. "Precisely where are you?"

Sim said: "Niggs, I should say that I am at a point where it seems to me that there's something a bit wrong with everything."

Andrew made the sound of a little puff down his nose. "That's comprehensive, anyway."

"Yes, it's comprehensive, Niggs," Sim agreed.

The minute-hand of the clock upon the mantel-shelf before them moved full five of its divisions, its ticking and a gentle flutter of the flames the only sound within the room.

SIM sat up. "I'll tell you a thing, Niggs. Comprehensive, you said. Well, I'll tell you a thing I ran across that is comprehensive, too. This happened at Ginnel Read's, the big——"

Andrew murmured: "I know them well."

"Good. Well, they employ hundreds of hands—I suppose they must have nearly two thousand on their pay-roll, men and girls. I should say that of all the factories I saw, Ginnel Read's was about the best—the most modern, the most up to date, I mean. I never anywhere saw people working under better conditions."

"There you are!" said Andrew. His tone was considerably more alert, and, without advancing in interest so far as to sit up, he straightened his position a degree and twisted to aline his eyes with his brother's. "There you are! When at dinner just now you were talking about the different conditions between workers and owners, Sim. I didn't butt in to argue the matter. But I could have named Ginnel Read. I'm glad you have, for me."

"Yes; but wait, Niggs. It is a picture of model, more than model, workshops—model employers, if ever there were any, you'd say. But in a pub near by—I told you how I poked about everywhere—in a pub near by I got talking to one of the employees, a middle-aged chap, a sulky, taciturn sort of devil. However, we got putting it across and he opened up. I had started on racing. He hopped straight out of that on to politics, socialism, capitalism, class war and all that; and he put up a lot of bitter stuff—though true, much of it, I'd seen it, Niggs—about the miserable conditions of the workers as opposed to the luxurious lives of the spenders—that was his division of society, workers and spenders. I said to him, 'Well, any way, you Ginnel Read people haven't got much to complain about. You work under model conditions that twenty years ago would have been thought heaven, and that crowds of other workers would think heaven to-day—conditions,' I said, 'a dashed sight better than ever there were at my public school.' Niggs he spat on the ground. 'Model conditions,' he said, 'perfect ventilation, warmth, light, wash-houses with running hot water, canteens, first-aid departments, recreation-rooms, all the rest of it. What in hell do you think they give us model conditions like that for?' I said, 'Why, to do their duty by you.' He spat again. 'Duty—hell!' he said, 'all that stuff all those model conditions are just to get more out of us!'"

Andrew ticked the ash of his cigar into a tray beside him. "A criminal lunatic," he said dispassionately.

"Niggs," Sim said, "there's a lot of truth in it."

Andrew gave him sudden and bolt-upright attention. "Truth! Why man alive, Sim——"

Sim said: "Niggs, there is."

At his brother's violent surprize he might have been expected to flush deeply. But he did not flush. His face remained steady and, though he fumbled for words, his voice was steady. "There is, Niggs. It's not all for his people Ginnel fits them up like that. It is partly. I'll go further, Niggs, and say it is mostly, with him and every employer like him, because he knows, because they know, that with the best conditions they can get the best work."

Andrew, containing himself, said: "Well?"

"They don't put a thousand, or ten thousand, no, nor yet a five-pound note, Niggs, into laying out their factories for the benefit of their people only. They put the money in because they know that they'll get it back, in more efficient labor, many times over."

Andrew said: "Well? What's wrong with that? It's your expectorating friend's way of looking at it, and, by Jove, I'd be sorry to believe it's yours. But granting the point of view, it benefits both parties, doesn't it? What's wrong with it?"

Sim bent forward and touched Andrew's knee and smiled at him. "Don't get wild with me, Niggs. I'm in a funny sort of state these days and I'm only just feeling round these things and they startle me as much as they do you, only in a different way. Don't get wild, Niggs."

A GREAT ADVENTURE

—That's what Dr. Hugh Black calls "The Increasing Purpose." This foremost spiritual leader, the author of "Friendship" and many other books which will be an inspiration for all time, has been reading A. S. M. Hutchinson's new novel now appearing in THE DELINEATOR. Here is what he says about it:

Portrait by Mary Christine, Montclair, N. J.

HUGH BLACK

"The Increasing Purpose" is more than a story of contemporary life—it touches deeper motives, without which life is frittered away in triviality or swamped in grossness. Without faith in spiritual values we have not sufficient motive to carry on the high tasks of man.

Mr. Hutchinson's diagnosis of some aspects of post-war psychology is true and is skilfully done. In tracing the nemesis of worldliness and the withering of the ordinary sources of life there are times when I feel that this story has some of the mighty quality of Greek drama.

As for the "message" which comes to the hero, Simon Paris—stripped of its sensational features, it is, of course, no new revelation. He finds peace for himself and hope for the world in the ancient decencies, in the great adventure of faith and in the joy of sacrificial service. It is a fine thing that a man of Mr. Hutchinson's quality should choose for his subject this profoundest of all themes.

Andrew gave the look he always had for Sim. "I don't get wild with you, Sim."

"Good old Niggs! I don't say about this that the workers don't get something out of it. They do—a heap. All I'm saying is that there's a lot of truth in what that chap indirectly said—that the employer who wants to think that he does a lot for his people can't claim that by giving them the best possible working conditions he is doing it. Because he isn't, Niggs. What he does for them on those lines is not done wholly and solely for them. In some degree it is done for his own benefit also."

"What would you have him do?"

Sim for a little was silent. "Well, I don't quite know."

"Well, there we are then," said Andrew.

SIM drew himself forward to the edge of his chair. His cigar was finished and he bent over his clasped hands, arms on his knees, looking into the fire. He said slowly: "No—I do know, in a way, Niggs. But, as I said, I'm only just beginning to feel round these things and I can't fix them very well, especially in words. Niggs, whenever you hear business men, the kind of men I've been living with, you yourself, Niggs, whenever you hear them discussing a question as between themselves and their employees, they always use the terms a practical matter, or a personal matter, or a matter of principle, or a matter of business. Niggs, why—that is what I notice—why never a human matter?"

Andrew said dryly: "What's the connection?"

Still with eyes upon the fire as though deep in some such crucible the secret lay, still with slow voice and as though through many obstacles he felt his way toward it: "Why, that every matter of that kind discussed affects somebody else, Niggs—some one who is not present, some one with no voice in that place, but, Niggs, some one human. That is the base of it—that is the base of everything, of every single thing, it seems to me—a human base. Niggs, if everything has got a human base, why is not everything looked at, discussed from, and administered from the human standpoint?"

Andrew's tone was the dry and patient tone of a school master to a wondering pupil: "I meant what's the connection with the thing we were discussing—model workshops, wasn't it?—created for the employees, as I say; done for profit, as you and your expectorating friend affect to believe. Where's the connection there?"

Sim said: "Why, somewhere here, Niggs. I think this is what I'm trying to say. These people, these employers, whatever they may do for their people, their hearts aren't in it. Men like Ginnel, men like you, Niggs, are warm enough in your people's interests in your office hours, but, Niggs, it's only in your office hours that your heart is there. When you leave your desks you take your hearts with you."

You take your hearts with you—as if the phrase were a path on which, nightbound and groping, he suddenly had stumbled; as if, stumbling upon it, confidence and swifter movement were given him, he faced Andrew full and spoke quickly: "You take your hearts with you. That is what I meant, Niggs, about everything being a bit wrong somewhere; and about there being truth in what that man said."

Andrew's voice exchanged its dryness for a sharpness: "What do you expect us to do?"

"I don't quite know," Sim went on, his brows puzzled. "I don't quite know what they can do. That's my trouble, Niggs. That's as far as I've got. It is the human side of things that I am seeing. It isn't only in this employer-employee business, it's in everything. I look at people, and in the newspapers I read about people, and I think about people, and, Niggs, I find myself looking, reading, thinking from the human side. That's vague, I know—it's devilish vague to me, let alone trying to explain it. But take Old Gand, take poor old Charles, well, I'm seeing them differently. I think of times Old Gand has made me curse him and I think of times I've been utterly fed up with Charles—well, I look at the human side, their side, and it looks—it looks mighty different, Niggs." He stopped.

There had been mounting in Andrew a growing anger at (as he termed it to himself) Sim's extraordinary rigmarole. He had been lazily uninterested, then playfully critical, then mildly hostile. Now he felt moved to be sharp and to make an end of it, and the words that Sim next spoke gave him his opening.

"That's as far as I've got," Sim said. "I know where I am now, but I don't know where I am going."

Andrew took the opening. "And I will be absolutely damned if I do," said Andrew.

The words went from him sharp as he could edge them. Immediately he regretted the sharpness. This was Sim!

He leaned quickly forward and held out his hand. "Sorry, Sim."

Sim grasped the hand and gave the Sim smile. "That's all right, Niggs—that's all right, old man."

THE VISION PASSED. IT LEFT SIM A SENSE OF GREAT QUIET. HE SEEMED TO HAVE NO THOUGHTS—PEACE ONLY

A LETTER from B. C. D. awaited Sim on that evening of his return to London and of his talk with Andrew. It also contained a latch-key. "Miss Glade tells me you are back in town to-morrow," B. C. D. wrote. "I think I am going away for a bit to-night, so here is my latch-key and the run of my rooms so that you can keep Miss Glade from picking and stealing." He had not stated where he was going, but he added beneath his signature, "Please don't tell any one where I am going." Lardy Quinnet declared that no signature of the famous novelist could be considered genuine if without these words; and the famous novelist told Sim that he believed firmly that they would be found typed on his heart when he was dead.

He was gone—somewhere—when Sim, at Elizabeth's hour, went to B. C. D.'s rooms on the morrow. Sim was a little early. He stared at B. C. D.'s neat book-shelves. At an end of one were ranged many folded contour maps—the famous novelist was a great walker and his methodical mind made him walk methodically. Sim's mind was bent on getting away somewhere. These maps were the keys for getting away of a man who made a profession of it. Sim pulled one at random from the stack. There came with it an envelope on which was written in B. C. D.'s neat handwriting, "Places to bunk to."

Sim smiled. "Just what I'm in search of," he thought.

In precise rows were names of places—none was familiar, and Sim had no doubt that this was their claim to selection. Smiling, he closed his eyes and touched the paper with a finger. "Longfield," he read. "Where on earth is Longfield?" At the end of the maps was an A. B. C. railway guide. He took it up. "Longfield Halt" was the only Longfield given and with it no trains but only a note: "Trains as for Barton Magna, stopping only by notice given to the guard. No up trains."

"It sounds buried enough," was Sim's thought. "I'll go there"—and he turned to Barton Magna, discovered that it was in Westershire, noted a convenient train (there were but four a day), and when Elizabeth arrived told her.

"Elizabeth, I'm going to a place called Barton Magna. Ever hear of it?"

Elizabeth never had. "But I am glad, Sim," she presently was saying, "that you are going to do this. It is what you feel that you want to do, isn't it?"

"Very much," Sim said.

"Then, Sim, I do feel that it is what you ought to do. There is a purpose for you, I am sure of it—and I am sure you best can find it by following impulses that come to you. Sim, your letters, every line of them, made me more and more certain of this purpose, whatever it may be. All those things that you said, the way in which you found yourself looking at everything—Sim, you know, they weren't like you—they weren't of your class, of your training—they were very extraordinary for you, Sim."

Sim's laugh was a little rueful. "I knew they were when I tried last night to tell them to Andrew."

She said: "Poor Sim!"

He took her hands. "That's where you are wonderful, Elizabeth."

She did not understand. "Where?"

"HEL" BREAKS LOOSE

But the darndog brings his mistress back a bit of Paradise

By DARRAGH ALDRICH

NO ONE, save the Burtons themselves to whom this particular Airedale puppy belonged, ever used other designation for him than the darndog. As for the puppy's given name (I had almost written "Christian" name—which Heaven forbid!) it was really not so much of an explosive epithet as it sounded. His name was Helvetius—a name that he had most logically earned by his ceaseless conflict with Cæsar, a collie, who had lived on the place at the time of Hel's dramatic entrance. This elder dignitary, by the way, had promptly reversed history and died of exhaustion before Helvetius was in the least subdued.

COULD THAT AIREDALE PUPPY REALLY BE THE ORIGINATOR OF SUCH EAR-SPLITTING YELPS?

Alan Burton, of whom I had never even heard at the beginning of the period which I am about to chronicle, had been away on his annual fortnight's fishing and canoe trip for several days before I ran across Hel for the first time. "Ran over" might be more accurate, because a clever crouch on Hel's part, as my car went above him, was all that saved his life. There were times later when I regretted that crouch—but this tale must be taken in order, if order is possible in anything that has to do with the darndog.

You have gathered at least that it was not by proper introduction in the bosom of his family I met this fateful pup. Quite the contrary.

MIDNIGHT. Mid-August. Mid-road. A deserted stretch of the Country Club Boulevard. Enter Hel hurriedly—by way of a leap at the radiator. Of course I couldn't pull up for several yards. Then I went back confidently expecting to find his prostrate corpse. Instead I found him quite unhurt, but so thoroughly frightened that (almost for the last time) he was accessible. It may be that from my one word of comment when I saw him sitting there he thought I was greeting him by name.

He had evidently come far. There was no house about and his whimpering attempt to lick my hand undid me. I put him aboard.

When I reached my bachelor lodgings, I explained the situation to the night switchboard operator.

"Somebody's pet dog. Handsome collar, you see. Can't leave him out all night. Trace him in the morning, by the license tag; but to-night—?" I put it as wistfully as I knew how. As a consequence I received permission to put the pup in the basement until I could locate the owner in the morning.

Now, my apartment is on the third floor in the front of the building, and Hel was given comfortable quarters in the basement-rear. Despite these facts, however, Hel's vocalization did not permit sleep to visit my eyelids. Could that puppy really be the originator of such raucous ear-splitting yelps? My telephone-bell whirred madly. I felt sorry for the poor switchboard operator. He said that mine was the only apartment in the building which had not sworn at him during the past half-hour. Something would have to be done about that darndog.

Of course I could not lose the fellow his position merely because I chose to adopt a canine waif at midnight.

"Undoubtedly the little nuisance is lonesome," I suggested. "I'll take him up here with me—and the landlord can throw me out to-morrow if he likes."

Hel left the basement with enthusiasm and stretched contentedly upon my best rug, falling at once into a slumber of profound exhaustion. I watched him a few minutes relievedly and then dropped off myself.

When I awoke, rather later than usual, Hel sprang at once into my consciousness. He was no longer stretched out on the rug. In the spot where he had lain were straggling my dress trousers, with one leg most efficiently shredded. One of my pumps lay near it. Intact—but the other was missing.

A rat-tat-tat on the tiled floor of my bath gave me a clue. I leaped for the sound and attempted to jerk the shiny black remnant from Hel's jaws. He was delighted with this, and entered into the new game with zest, growling in voluptuous content as he hung on. I propitiated him in vain.

With unlucky suddenness he became aware of the justice of my plea and let go. I lunged backward into the bathtub in the position of a half-open jack-knife. Hel, being a true optimist, found the bright side of the other fellow's mishap and leaped with joyous shouts at my bare feet.

When I was able to, I closed myself, blade by blade, into the chilly but safe confines of the tub and considered. My tie was within reach, and by a clever grab I managed to get Hel by the collar and leash him to the plumbing. Then I rushed to the telephone. It appeared that the municipal department which licenses dogs was not yet open.

A sudden thought struck me. Perhaps the dog was merely hungry. I ordered up a large bowl of bread and milk, which a curious bell-boy presented at the door. I stood a moment—a fatal moment—considering.

I NEVER realized that there was any particular odor to bread and milk, but there must be. I had intended to serve the puppy in true Roman fashion—at the bath. However, after one loud sniff (which was almost a snort) and a wild champing of the padded feet on the tiled floor of the bathroom, there was a rasping zzzzt of the tie and I found Hel at my feet sucking up his breakfast from the wonderful Chinese rug for which I had just paid more than I had any business—or income—to pay. In desperation, however, I took advantage of his momentary preoccupation in making a final effort to ascertain the owner of my guest. To my relief, the answer came at last.

"Mr. Alan Burton owns him. Name, 'Helvetius.' Called 'Hel' for short. Address, 7 Marbury Road, East Cliffe."

I groaned inwardly. East Cliffe was a picturesque but sparsely settled little suburb in the general direction of the country club. It was inhabited by people who were supposed to love Nature better than their kind, and the roads were abominable. Perhaps this Burton had a town office. It would serve him right. But he had not—at least, not by name. So I called the residence. A delicious low-pitched voice answered, fluting into tremulous delight as I made known Hel's inadvertent capture.

"Oh, how wonderful that you found him! You can't conceive of the relief I feel. Alan adores him—and I was sure he was lost forever. I was awake all last night listening for his bark."

"I am surprised," I observed gently, "that you did not hear him."

"Then you are near by? And I've searched the neighborhood—think of it! He has been gone since yesterday morning. Where shall I call for him? Mr. Burton isn't home, you know."

I glanced about my tattered apartment and drew my robe more closely around my figure.

"Dear Mrs. Burton, I shouldn't consider——"

"Do you think he could be trusted to a messenger? I am here alone with two maids, so there is no one to send——"

Now, I never could resist one of those traily feminine voices—moreover, to wait until a messenger should arrive was unthinkable.

"Don't consider it! I'll run around with him myself right away!" I told her gallantly. "My car is at the door—and I shall be there in far less time than a messenger could make it." (East Cliffe was only a matter of twenty miles.)

"Oh," she breathed with a little catch in her voice—quite the loveliest that I ever heard—"you are wonderfully kind. It is too much to——"

"Not in the least. It will be a—Ouch! Damn! I—I beg your pardon——"

"I know!" (What precious sympathy—not the ghost of a hauteur at my unconventional phrasing.) "It's Hel. wasn't it?"

"It was," I assured her grimly, "for my ankles."

Of course I did not relish being made ridiculous in the eyes—or the ears, rather—of a beautiful woman. (I knew she was beautiful from her voice. Nature has an unfair way of dealing out her gifts.) However, I should cheerfully have stood on my head in the corner if nothing else would have brought out that delicious gurgly sound in her voice as she hung up the receiver. I continued dressing rather more carefully than usual.

"Come on, Hellie," I besought ingratiatingly. Hellie kept a wary eye upon me as I slid toward him. "Want to go by-by?"

By-by was the precise word for it.

Through my arms he darted and out of the door which I had inadvertently left open.

Heads poked out as I dashed down the corridor in pursuit of Hel on his by-by tour. It was an exhausting chase before a few helpful neighbors and myself had collared him. His utter weariness made him a submissive occupant of my car.

Drawings by Harold Von Schmidt

WITH UNLUCKY SUDDENNESS HEL LET GO AND I LUNGED BACKWARD INTO THE BATHTUB IN THE POSITION OF A HALF-OPEN JACK-KNIFE

As he stretched himself down from the seat beside me when at last we reached Marbury Road, East Cliffe, he was as demure as a débutante. Plainly I could not play the rescuing hero.

The lady of the perfect voice was quite evidently awaiting me as I wandered up the walk to the charming new home with its bridelike frilly curtains. (Poor little bride! To be saddled with a pup like Hel!)

She was the bridiest sort of a bride, too, as she moved smilingly toward me from the garden, swinging a pale pink sunhat of some misty material and holding an armful of the fragrant roses she had just cut. I shall remember that vision all my life. A gipsy—with laughing red lips and fathomless eyes below her demurely smooth dusky hair.

"I am afraid our puppy has given you a great deal of trouble," she said, waving the docile beast toward an astonished-looking maid who had just appeared.

THROUGH MY ARMS HE DARTED—AND AWAY ON HIS BY-BY TOUR

"None whatever," I assured her gallantly. "He was devastatingly entertaining!" (I thanked my perusal of our newer novelists for their favorite word.)

She gave me a suspicious glance and her lips twitched.

"And to bring him way out here so early——"

"Oh, I often take a little run before my office needs me," I protested extravagantly.

Her expression was inscrutable.

"None the less," she emphasized, "I shall insist that when Mr. Burton returns he shall thank you properly—adequately, if that be possible."

"My dear Mrs. Burton, I——"

"For that reason," she pursued, "I shall have to ask your card or address—or— Oh, Hel!" The stress upon the last syllable was startling, to say the least. "Oh, my Georgette hat! My preciousest—onliest— Oh, I had no business to bring it out to the garden this morning—Oh!" She dashed after the puppy, who had appeared from nowhere and now was waltzing with some pink fluffy material over the emerald lawn. I decided to lend my aid.

Hither and yon we raced, until finally he ran into the arms of a tearfully protesting maid.

"Oh, ma'am, Mis' Burton," she wept as she removed his clenched jaws from a remnant of the crêpe. "I just let go of him one minute while I fixed his breakfast——"

A VISION of milk-soaked rug rose before me as I politely but somewhat coldly informed them that I had done what I could toward alleviating his pangs of hunger before I returned him.

"That was inexpressibly kind," comforted his mistress, "for dogs must suffer more than humans when they are hungry—and I am famished right now. I simply could not eat until I had made sure we really had Hel safe and sound."

"I am breakfastless, myself," I observed boldly, "because I couldn't bear to eat until you were sure."

"Oh, how awful! You poor b—man!" she corrected hastily. "You must have breakfast with me at once. Mr. Burton would be furious with me if I let you take that long ride over these terrible roads when you were hungry." The maid was given orders and I weakly protested until the table was set upon the terrace and the tray actually appeared.

Now close your eyes and contemplate. Background—August's vivid garden colors. Opposite me— Oh, what's the use! I watched her white hands moving among the china as I drank golden nectar and nearly choked over the ambrosia when her gipsy eyes met mine in the most casual inquiry about the cooking of the eggs.

I may as well make my confession now and have it over with. Though I have had touches of the delicious madness more than once in my life, the memory of that morning still brings with it a heady sensation of which no other experience even holds a hint. I stayed in all scarcely more than an hour, but before I left I knew that I was helplessly, hopelessly in love with another man's wife. I loathed the plain gold wedding-ring upon her left hand—the only ornament she wore. I tortured myself with frequent mention of her husband—and she drove the stabbing pain to my heart by manifest regrets that he was not present to thank me in person. It was the most horrible and delicious hour I have ever known.

I drove dazedly back to town, my hand tingling where it had touched hers at parting. I swore softly at myself. My collar seemed choking me. I raised my hand to loosen the thing, and my forefinger met my collar band!

Then I remembered, with frightful clarity of vision, my collar and tie swinging from the newel-post in the corridor near my door. I had flung them there hastily to keep them fresh from the moist exertions of the by-by dash.

Thus ended the first episode involving Hel the darndog.

ALTHOUGH I did not, of course, in the least anticipate being called upon to renew my acquaintance with Helvetius, I felt a peculiar interest obsessing me with regard to lists of names beginning with B. The directory first informed me that Alan Burton was the junior partner of an architectural firm. An architectural society later told me that he had been a fellow citizen of mine for only a brief while. Much to my surprise, from the membership committee of my own country club I discovered that I had probably seen him on the golf course.

He had been married within the year, so a club acquaintance told me. His wife was a beauty—sang charmingly. I was sure of it!

It was the afternoon of that day that I was summoned to the telephone to hear her ringing voice again.

"Mr. Sayre? It is perfectly unforgivable in me to call upon you like this is an emergency, but I don't know a soul in town and I am desperate——"

I strove to keep the eagerness out of my dignified protestations of delight to be of service.

"I know you like Hel—" she began and then with a gasp stopped short.

"Indeed you do, Mrs. Burton—I—I mean indeed I do." I tried to help her out, but it was no go. Her tone froze me.

"I intended to say that I shouldn't like to say anything about the dog except to a friend of his—who understands him—but he is nervous and—and can you tell me where to find a man—a trustworthy, efficient man not afraid of dogs, to—to reset shrubbery, and replace the sod on the terrace, and replant a few flowerbeds? My—Mr. Burton is so particular about the looks of the grounds and—and Hel's broken loose again!"

Something broke loose within me, for the last words were smothered in a sob. Blessed little lamb—all alone with two worthless maids and that—darndog!

Of course there were hundreds of men to be had—lucky devils. But a strange man—those appealing eyes and sensitive little mouth—my decision was swiftly made.

"If you permit me, Mrs. Burton, I will send out a man whom I know personally. He—er—has done quite a bit of work for me, in fact. Not expert—but what you want is more a general handy man than a landscape gardener."

"Oh, how perfectly dear—splendid of you!" Her words rushed over the wire joyously. "To-morrow morning?"

"I am afraid that all of his morning's time has been spoken for," I demurred, "but he might be able to get there in the mid-afternoon. Shall we say to-day, at three-thirty? A couple of hours for a day or two ought to put it in shape—before your husband returns."

"I can't tell you how grateful I am," she gurgled, and I thought I gathered from her very demureness that she saw the whole scheme.

When I presented myself at the back door of 7 Marbury Road in my oldest duck-hunting attire (in which, I grant you, I have always thought I cut a better figure than in anything else) the maid was a bit surprised, not to say frightened, but the mistress, when summoned, greeted me as an entire stranger. She accepted my recommendations thoughtfully and put to me several questions regarding my qualifications for the work.

Until deepening dusk of that and the other days that followed, I labored, dinnerless, under her excessively autocratic directions.

During all that time, I surprised no flicker of recognition in her luminous dark eyes. I began to wonder if practical joking paid. Considered merely as a joke, this adventure most certainly did not, as my aching muscles testified at night. But as a measure of service for the most bewitching little person in the world—well, I was wretched when the time of my dismissal was at hand.

With the arrival of this shamelessly postponed hour, the payment for my services became the dreaded question between us. Although she still continued haughtily unaware of my identity, the lively color came and went in her cheeks as she fingered her mesh bag. I rejoiced in her discomfort, for hitherto I had been the only one to feel foolish. The tremulousness of the red lips, however, as I pronounced my work without charge, went to my head.

"OH, HEL!" HER STRESS ON THE LAST SYLLABLE WAS STARTLING, TO SAY THE LEAST. "OH, MY GEORGETTE HAT!"

LITTLE TEXAS SMILED BRAVELY. "MOTHER, WE'RE NOT AFRAID OF ANYTHING, ARE WE?" SHE SAID

The Circus is here!

LITTLE TEXAS

ALL THE STORY IS HERE

By DIXIE WILLSON

The sweetest girl on earth becomes a shooting star

KING and Meg had been saving-up their money to buy oil-lands in Texas, so when a wee baby appeared and they spent it all for her, this mite of a girl became just little Texas!

Kingsley Fitzgerald was her really-truly name. It was her father's, too, and her rich and haughty grandfather's—a St. Louis multimillionaire, who knew nothing at all about her. For when her father had married Meg, an exquisite French circus performer, a cable had come to him in France, "Return alone or not at all. K. F." King just never went home. Suddenly he died. And Meg promised him to send their daughter to her grandfather when she was twelve years old. Meantime she rejoined the circus, the Great Melbourne Shows, in America. The happy years sped swiftly. Too soon there came the day when a promise must be kept. Dear little Texas, with Joe, one of the circus hands, left the big show at Three Trees, Arkansas, for the pilgrimage to St. Louis. They had just one clue to the grandfather's whereabouts—a card with his lawyer's name, Richard Zylder, upon it. It so happened that Kingsley Fitzgerald, Senior, was on the same train that carried little Texas in search of him. Her confidences to the conductor were repeated to the austere grandfather. He went and looked at the shining gold head, the gray eyes—King's eyes—and his heart hardened again against his wilful son. Arriving at St. Louis he immediately telephoned his lawyer to deny his existence when the child should come seeking him.

The little girl and her devoted escort put up for the night at Mrs. Crandle's boarding-house. Among the boarders Texas particularly took to one Mr. Fobes—"for a very special reason." High-hearted, Texas and Jim set out the next morning, but only to hear Mr. Zylder's cold words of dismissal—which sent Texas' eager heart to the bottom of her stubby shoes.

PART TWO

THERE were fifteen canvas tops in the Great Melbourne Shows. At the main front gate were the ticket-wagons, the side-show tent with its flaming line of banners, and the great striped entrance where the crowd surged into the menagerie. Beyond the menagerie the big top loomed as high and wide as the sky itself. Three sawdust rings and two stages—a hundred spot-lights—fifteen thousand seats—and at the back door of the great flashing wonderful show, the cluster of tents where the people of the circus lived and moved.

The ladies' dressing-tent, the men's tent—each with its circle of trunks, its water-buckets and canvas chairs; the tent of the wild west troupe; the pad-room for the beautiful blue-blooded horses; the dog tent—many others—and, last of all, the cook-tents with their long tables and benches. And moving through the life of every day the inhabitants of this little world, constantly busy, constantly happy, hung their washings in the sun on the guy-lines, marked their games of target on the grass and swung their hammocks from wagon to wagon—living their gipsy mornings, glittering afternoons, quiet twilights and fanfare nights—with Texas the adored little daughter of it all.

THERE was another canvas tent—a very little, very quiet tent, away from the music and flash of the back door—and in it was a big broad-shouldered some one, whom none of the crowds ever saw or knew was there. While the band was playing and the rings were alive with their marvels of beauty and color and skill, Doctor Mifflin in his little hospital-tent would be mending broken bones and bruised bodies with practised fingers that from long years knew how to do it the best way and the quickest.

In a family of more than a thousand people, with a risk every minute for most of them, the doctor was as busy as the man who sold tickets. He had been with the circus since long before Meg Fitzgerald and little Texas had come to be part of it. He was bald-headed and blue-eyed—the sort of a man everybody just wanted to tell their troubles to. Doctor Mifflin had long been close to the mother and her little girl—but the one who had been closest of all was Madame Helen, the leopard-trainer—slender and blond, with fearless, beautiful eyes.

Madame had been in France when Meg, a girl of fourteen, had first won the public to the gay little circus where four years later King Fitzgerald had found her.

It was Madame who had brought Meg and the child to America to the Great Melbourne Circus. It was Madame who had taken care of Texas while Meg had practised long hours, bringing the tricks back again to her feet and her fingers. And it was Madame, with her little folding table set out in the shadow of the leopard cage, who had taught Texas her lessons four hours every day.

Next to Madame, Texas felt that her affection was divided in equal parts between Miss Tiny, the dwarf; Captain Gordon, the giant; Jim's monkey (whom she loved very, very much); Papa Saunders, the manager; Bum Casey, who tended the elephants; a certain young zebra in the menagerie; Aunt Mary, in charge of costumes; Joe; Doctor Mifflin, and Torchy, the dwarf light-man.

Very often and very seriously she had checked them all off on ten fingers—but more often and more seriously she had checked as far as eighty fingers and then given up, just realizing that there was no use trying to pick favorites, because every person, every animal, every grass and flower on every lot, was packed into her loving little heart as tight as it could hold them.

IT WAS more than usually hot for Arkansas the day after Texas went away. There was scarcely a breath of wind. The show had left Three Trees behind it and put up its glamour in Pine Bluff—but the circus is always the same, no matter what day or what place you find it.

Meg finished her act on the flying trapeze, swung down to the ground, threw handfuls of kisses in answer to the applause—then suddenly, gently, like a wilting flower, her face went white, she slipped to the ground, and the boys carried her into Doctor Mifflin's hospital-tent.

When she opened her eyes, his kind hand was over hers.

"Well, Butterfly," he smiled, "what's all this about?"

Meg looked at him as though looking out of a dream.

"I—I don't know," she said. "My heart just—stopped beating a minute, I guess!"

As her breath came back, she looked up at the doctor with that same little smile that made Texas so lovable.

"Meg, you've made up your mind, have you, to let that little girl of yours live with her grandfather always?" the doctor asked.

"I suppose that is what her father would wish," she answered softly.

"And will you go with her?" he wanted to know. "Will you leave the circus now?"

Meg looked away.

"I—don't know," she said slowly. "It seems as though Mr. Fitzgerald would want her mother to be with her, but if he—doesn't—it's all right—I'll just keep on here. And maybe I won't give her up to him at all! I can take care of us and maybe I'll do it!"

The doctor walked over to his open door, where a troupe of pink-ribboned poodles were yapping to go in for their turn. The calliope was just finishing Gipsy Jean's number, and through the space above the canvas wall showed the heads of the crowd screaming with laughter at Tommy's tricks with the gray goose.

"Meg," he said gently, "you must let Texas go to her grandfather to stay—and he must understand that you are to be taken care of, too. I've wanted to tell you this for a long while. To-day is the third time that heart of yours has, as you say, 'stopped beating for a minute,' and you can't take care of either Texas or yourself any longer. You'll be strong and fine again if you rest; but your heart has worked as long as it can and, frankly, if little Texas didn't have this grandfather to go to, I would not know how to advise you! If it is true that all the money you have saved was lost in the New York bank, he has come at a time when you need him very badly—because, dear Meg—do you know you can work less than one week longer?"

In the circus the first lesson every one learns is grit to carry through to the finish—no matter what. Meg had learned it long ago. Now she only lay quiet, her hand in the doctor's—no sudden tears—no flinching at what he had told her.

"Then—I'm glad she's gone to find her grandfather," she said at last. "I've had her twelve beautiful years."

They sat there quietly together a minute. Through the open door of the doctor's tent they watched the performers going into the ring—they heard the band playing—the crowd clapping and shouting.

Meg brushed her hand across her eyes and sat up.

"But Doctor Mifflin," she said, her voice trembling just a little, "the only life I know is the circus. My friends—the things I love to do—I don't know how I could leave it!"

"Meg, dear," the doctor smiled, as he slipped his strong arm around her to walk with her across the trampled grass to the door of the dressing-tent, "the best and biggest things we find in life are the things that are hardest to do—and one place where we learn to know it the best is right here at the back door of the circus!"

MEG never rode parade and so she usually didn't leave the cars until parade bugles were flaring through town. Texas always went to the lot early with Aunt Mary and could dress in her Cinderella costume for parade all herself, while Meg took the time for things "at home" in the cars. But the morning after her little talk with the doctor she was ready very early with the hope that the morning mail would bring a letter from her little girl.

She was so early on the lot that nothing was up but the cook-house, flying its red-and-white flag for breakfast. The huge canvas of the big top was spread ready to swing up, long wagons of poles were lumbering over the ground, cages moving into place, trunks unloading, men shouting—but it wasn't too early for mail.

By a pile of hay bales Aunt Mary was casting her eyes over her square spectacles and calling off letters to a chattering group around her.

The line of elephants were just trudging in, Bum Casey shuffling at the head of them. He saw Meg and pulled off his rag of a cap.

"You'll have a letter from that kid to-day, won't yuh?" he asked eagerly.

Aunt Mary triumphantly handed an envelope to Meg. Every one clustered around her as she opened the blotty little boarding-house letter.

THERE was a little silence when Meg had finished reading it aloud, a little thought in every one's mind of how much seemed missing with just the going away of one sweet voice singing out its good mornings—two eager eyes finding crickets in the grass——

It was Aunt Mary who took up the thread of the day again.

"Well, that's a wonderful piece of writing for twelve years old, I must say!" she bustled. "Now, Meg, get your breakfast and get back here. I need you to go downtown with me to do a bit of shopping."

It was half-past nine when Meg and Aunt Mary left the lot for their little shopping tour. The streets were like a flower-garden, with pink dresses, blue dresses, ribbons and sashes. Balloon men, the corner street-shows that trail the circus and a gay town band were doing their share for the day. The circus parade had started before the two shoppers were ready to return to the lot.

They were at the counter of a little drug-store when above all the street noises came that sound of flaring bugles. Aunt Mary caught Meg's hand and pulled her to the door.

"Now, don't Jackie Bones look wonderful carrying the banner with his—why, he's got the wrong suit on! I made those extra-wide yellow-satin breeches for Sandy! And would you look at Eddie playing the bass drum! I didn't know Eddie played in the——"

But suddenly she felt Meg's hand against her arm, saw Meg's eyes wide—almost frightened.

"Why look!" Meg said breathlessly. "Aunt Mary, look!"

Following the mounted band a tiny white-and-gold carriage was coming with six white ponies. And like a small princess among the pale pillows rode little Texas in her coach and six—her curls golden in the sun, her lips dimpling in a smile.

Meg was hardly conscious of the crowd exclaiming at the child's loveliness as the little coach approached and passed. Then Bum—enveloped in trailing Arabian robes—came leading the elephants. When he saw Meg standing there, he broke into smiles and, ignoring all parade rules, took a long step out of line, close enough to speak to her.

"Meg, she came back!" he grinned. "She's back to stay! There isn't any grandpa!"

IT WAS like Mr. Kingsley Fitzgerald that he never felt lonely in the great white mansion where he lived ever since the Fitzgerald estate had been his. With his servants, his horses, his books and his memories, he only counted life gracious when it left him alone.

The servants had long gone about their various duties in silence—Mrs. Becker, the cook, seemed in fact to be the only person about the place to whom silence was a duty rather than a choice.

Mrs. Becker was plump and round like a fresh apple, and her kitchen the one room in the house

WHEN accidents happen, every mother should know what to do and how to do it; for the care given immediately after an accident is of the greatest importance. Previous training, and the possession of good judgment and common sense, may enable the mother to relieve the suffering child and perhaps even save his life.

Of course, the family physician or some other doctor should be sent for without delay. For the mother, three simple rules must be observed: Keep cool. Be quick. Keep quiet.

Children's temperaments differ greatly. Some, when injured, are stoical and make very little fuss, while others become violently excited and hysterical at the slightest accident. With children of the latter class too much sympathy is harmful, and the wisest plan under these circumstances is to make as little as possible of an accident.

Severe injuries produce severe symptoms. In such cases the clothing should be loosened, and the child placed in a comfortable position and kept warm until the arrival of the physician. If he be unconscious, the color of the face should be observed. If he be red and flushed, raise his head to draw the blood away from it. If he be pale, lower his head so the blood will flow to it more readily.

BABIES and small children are liable to injuries from falling. If the child cries lustily, there is no cause for alarm; if he becomes unconscious or stupefied and listless, the condition may be serious and the doctor must be sent for without delay. Make the child comfortable, and if he be pale, breathing with difficulty but able to swallow, give a few drops of aromatic spirits of ammonia in a little water. A fall may produce a slight concussion of the brain, and cause unconsciousness. Fortunately, on account of the soft and undeveloped bones of the head, a true fracture of the skull is uncommon. On the other hand, the collar-bone, or clavicle, is a bone not infrequently broken, and this is sometimes overlooked at the time of the accident. Fretfulness and pain on the lifting or moving of the child's arm should cause the mother to send for a physician.

The bones of a child are much less brittle than those of an adult. When they are "broken," they do not break in two, but only partially. These so-called "green stick" fractures are painful and usually produce decided deformities unless the extent and severity of the break are accurately determined from an X-ray photograph.

If an arm or a leg is fractured, it should be supported with an improvised splint. A small stick, cane, umbrella, stiff cardboard, or even several newspapers folded to give stiffness will answer. A broken leg can be bandaged to the sound one, or the arm to the side.

Bruises are injuries in which the skin is not broken. They do little damage, except for the pain, discomfort and temporary disfigurement caused. As the result of blood escaping into the tissues, a swelling soon appears, which increases in size and later turns purple. This color changes through various shades of green and yellow until the blood has been absorbed. The prompt application of ice will keep the swelling down, and may prevent discoloration. If ice be not available, compresses of very hot water may be applied.

CUTS should receive different treatment. Here the skin is broken, and every care and precaution must be taken to prevent infection. The mother should scrub her hands thoroughly with soap, hot water and nail-brush before touching or cleansing the wound. If the cut be deep or extreme, with edges separated, the child should have surgical attention at once. A small cut can be dressed by the mother. It should be washed with hot boric-acid solution—a teaspoon to a pint of water, absorbent cotton being used as a sponge. This will both cleanse the wound and prevent bleeding. A compress made of gauze or clean, soft muslin, soaked in the boric-acid solution, is then placed over the wound and bandaged on. This can be left on for several days if it remains unstained and sweet-smelling and the child shows no signs of pain or fever. If the wound becomes infected, and pus ooze out, the first dressing must be carefully soaked off without pulling, the wound again washed with the boric-acid solution, and a fresh dressing applied. This must be done daily until the wound heals. If an infected wound does not improve rapidly, call the doctor.

In more severe cuts the bleeding can be controlled by firm pressure with a finger until the doctor arrives. When an artery has been cut, the blood spurts out of the wound in jets. Direct pressure with a finger or compress of gauze will hold it in check if placed above the wound—that is, between the injury and the heart. A cord or handkerchief tightly wrapped around the arm or leg will also serve.

A lacerated wound has ragged edges and usually does not bleed freely. Such wounds do not heal cleanly and are apt to leave unsightly scars. They must be carefully cleansed, as they are apt to contain dirt. The edges should be brought as close together as possible, and the wound covered with a moist boric-acid compress. In some cases it is a wise plan to paint the wound with tincture of iodin. The dressings in these cases must be changed daily.

A punctured wound is one caused by a splinter, nail, fish-hook, knife or other sharp body. After the object has been removed, a hot poultice or hot compresses should be applied to relieve the pain and reduce the swelling. Your physician will no doubt inject tetanus antitoxin in all cases of punctured wounds caused by dirty objects such as rusty nails, in order to prevent the possibility of lockjaw.

A SPRAIN is an injury to a joint resulting from twisting or wrenching. In such cases the blood vessels are torn, and blood collects about the joint, causing discoloration of the skin and swelling. There is severe pain on attempted motion, and in severe cases the recovery is very slow and the bad effects last much longer than after broken bones. Until the physician arrives the joint should be kept at absolute rest, and hot compresses applied, or ice applications used if there be much bleeding.

A strain is the name given to an injury of a muscle. This causes pain or discomfort on motion, with stiffness and lameness. It is not necessary to call a doctor except in severe cases. The muscle should be gently rubbed, always toward the body, with a solution of half alcohol and half water. If very painful, the muscle must be kept at rest and later given a gentle massage.

BURNS and scalds are among the most frequent injuries which befall children, both in the home and on the street. In these cases prompt treatment before the arrival of the doctor is very necessary. When a child's clothes catch on fire, a rug, blanket, dress, skirt or any available thick material should be at once wrapped about the child in order to smother the fire. The clothing should be very carefully removed after the fire has been extinguished, so as not to tear the blisters which will have been produced.

The first object in all burns and scalds is to relieve the pain by protecting the injured surface from the air and preventing any rubbing or pressure by the clothing. In dressing the wounds, the blisters should be opened at the edges with a clean needle that has been sterilized by being held a moment in a flame. This permits the watery serum to run out. As the skin of the blister forms an excellent protection for the raw surface underneath, it should never be torn or allowed to be rubbed off.

Burns are classified into three degrees, according to their severity. Burns of the first degree are superficial ones in which the skin is reddened. Blisters are formed in burns of the second degree; while burns of the third degree are very severe and dangerous, as they involve the deeper layers of the skin. If extensive, they are apt to prove fatal. The doctor should be summoned in cases of all but the very slightest burns, as it is impossible at first to ascertain their severity.

Lime-water and linseed-oil, when mixed together, form a thick, pasty liquid known as carron-oil. This should be poured freely over the burn, which is then covered with sterile gauze or soft linen cloths soaked in the oil. A thick paste of bicarbonate of soda should be applied if carron-oil be not available. Cold-cream, petroleum jelly or olive-oil can be used in emergencies to protect the burn. Strong acids or alkalis produce ugly burns. Acid burns should be neutralized with bicarbonate of soda (cooking soda) or with milk of magnesia, while burns from alkalis such as quick lime, caustic soda, etc., should be covered with compresses soaked in vinegar and water, lemon-juice, boric acid, or other mild acid.

THE instinct of curiosity in young children leads to the tasting of things. This unfortunately sometimes causes them to swallow poison, with serious and often fatal effects. Prevention can be accomplished by allowing nothing of a dangerous character within sight or reach. This includes any medicine and pills which may have been prescribed for the child or other members of the family. The very few poisons used as household remedies should be kept locked in the medicine-cabinet on the top shelf. The bottles should not only be plainly labeled, but should be distinctive, with roughened and sharp edges so that they can be detected in the dark by the sense of touch.

It is not possible or practicable to describe all the symptoms of the various forms of poison in this article. All the mother needs to know is that some poison has been swallowed and what she must do before the doctor arrives. In calling the doctor let him know if possible just what kind of poison has been swallowed, so that he can bring the proper antidote. The bottle or pill-box or other receptacle from which the poison has been taken should be shown to him.

The first thing the mother must do when a child has swallowed poison is to get rid of the material swallowed. This is done by emptying the stomach by an emetic and encouraging vomiting. A teaspoon of mustard in a cup of warm water, a teaspoon of sirup of ipecac or a teaspoon of common table salt in a cup of water, are all efficient

A "BAMBINO" (BABY) FROM THE ROW OF FOURTEEN STATUE BABIES ON THE "HOSPITAL OF THE INNOCENTS" IN FLORENCE

MY LITTLE PAGE

DEAR bambini
(that is "children" in Italian, and the small ones of you are "bimbi").

If only I could send everybody a present from Italy! You'll have to count this Italian number as my Italian souvenir to each of you. Anyway, I did buy you a real Italian prize—the Pinocchio doll.

Pinocchio, you know, was a naughty wooden puppet, whose old carpenter father carved him from a magic piece of wood. Pinocchio had many strange adventures, and whenever he told a lie, his nose grew longer! But the Fairy with the Blue Hair watched over him, until, at last, he grew good enough to turn into a real boy.

Pinocchio's story is told in a book which all Italian children know. Write to THE LITTLE DELINEATOR to find out where you can buy it in English.

Please show you like our foreign numbers and want more, by trying for the Pinocchio contest. And don't forget the Deli-club. New members, send a two-cent stamp for your club badge, and both old and new members, send a stamped, self-addressed envelope for the Club Secret Letter to THE LITTLE DELINEATOR, New York.

Good-by, bambini and bimbi,

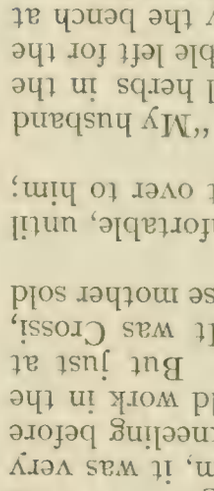
Your editor in Italy,

HARRIET IDE EAGER.

WIN A WOODEN PINOCCHIO!



Here's a real wooden puppet, from Italy—the famous funny Pinocchio. Write a letter to your editor, telling what you like best this month and why, and how it helps you to understand Italy and Italian children. The most interesting, helpful letter will win this wooden Pinocchio. Address Pinocchio Contest, THE LITTLE DELINEATOR, New York, N. Y.

AN ITALIAN SCHOOL BOY

THESE two stories come from a boy's book called "Cuore" or "Heart," by an Italian writer, De Amicis. He wrote the book, after he was grown, from an old diary he had kept in his school-days.

IN A GARRET

MOTHER read in the newspaper about a poor woman who needed clothes, so yesterday evening, mother, my sister Silvia and I went to take her some. I carried the package and Silvia had the paper with the woman's initials and address. We had to go to the top of an old house, and down a long hall with doors on both sides.

Mother knocked at the last door, and a woman came. She was fair and very thin, and still quite young. There was a blue handkerchief on her head, and somehow all of a sudden, I had a strange feeling that she and her handkerchief had both seen better days together.

"Are you the one whose name was in the paper?" asked mother.

"Yes signora."

"Well," said mother, "we've brought you some clothes."

And the woman began to thank us and bless us, till I thought she would never stop. So in the meantime, I took a look around the room, it was very bare. In one corner I saw a boy, with his back turned to us, kneeling before a chair. He seemed to be writing, but I wondered how he could work in the dark, with his paper on the chair and his inkstand on the floor. But just at that minute, I recognized his red hair and his ragged coat. It was Crossi, one of the boys in my class—the boy with the shriveled arm, whose mother sold herbs on the street.

Just then Crossi turned around. I stood there, feeling uncomfortable, until he smiled at me, then mother gave me a little push and I went over to him; Crossi got up and took my hand.

"My boy and I are all alone," his mother was saying to mine. "My husband has been in America for six years, and now, I'm too sick to sell herbs in the street as I used to, to make extra money. We haven't even a table left for the poor boy to do his home work on. They have even taken away the bench at the door where he used to write. No place to study without ruining his eyes. I'm thankful I can send him to school, at any rate, for the city gives him his books and copy-books. Poor child, he does want to study. It's hard luck, signora, hard luck for both of us!"

Mother gave her everything in her purse, and kissed the boy good-by. As we went out, she said almost crying: "Oh, Enrico, look how that poor boy has to work. And you have every comfort, and you think it's hard to study. Why, he deserves more credit for one day's work than you do for a whole year. Schools ought to give all the first prizes to boys like that."

THE COAL-CARRIER AND THE GENTLEMAN

CARLO NOBIS is very proud because his father is a fine gentleman with a black beard, very tall and serious, and he comes to call for Carlo nearly every day. Yesterday morning, young Nobis was quarreling with Betti, one of the little boys, whose father is a coal-carrier. Just because he was in the wrong, and couldn't think of anything more to say, Carlo cried: "Oh, your father's nothing but a rag-bag!"

Betti's face turned red up to his hair. He said nothing, but tears came to his eyes, and when he went home, he told his father. So that afternoon, here came his little sooty-faced father back with him. Carlo Nobis's father was helping him off with his coat at the door as usual, and when the coal-carrier began to make his complaint to the teacher, and everybody was keeping very still, he heard his name spoken and came in to ask why.

"It's this workman," our teacher explained. "He complains that your Carlo called him a rag-bag to his boy."

Nobis's father frowned, and his face flushed.

"Did you say that?" he asked.

But Carlo just stood there in the middle of the room, facing little Betti, and hung his head silently. His father took his arm and pushed him toward Betti till they were almost touching.

"Beg his pardon," he said. "Repeat these words after me: 'I beg your pardon for the wicked, foolish, mean words I said against your father, whom my father feels honored to take by the hand.'"

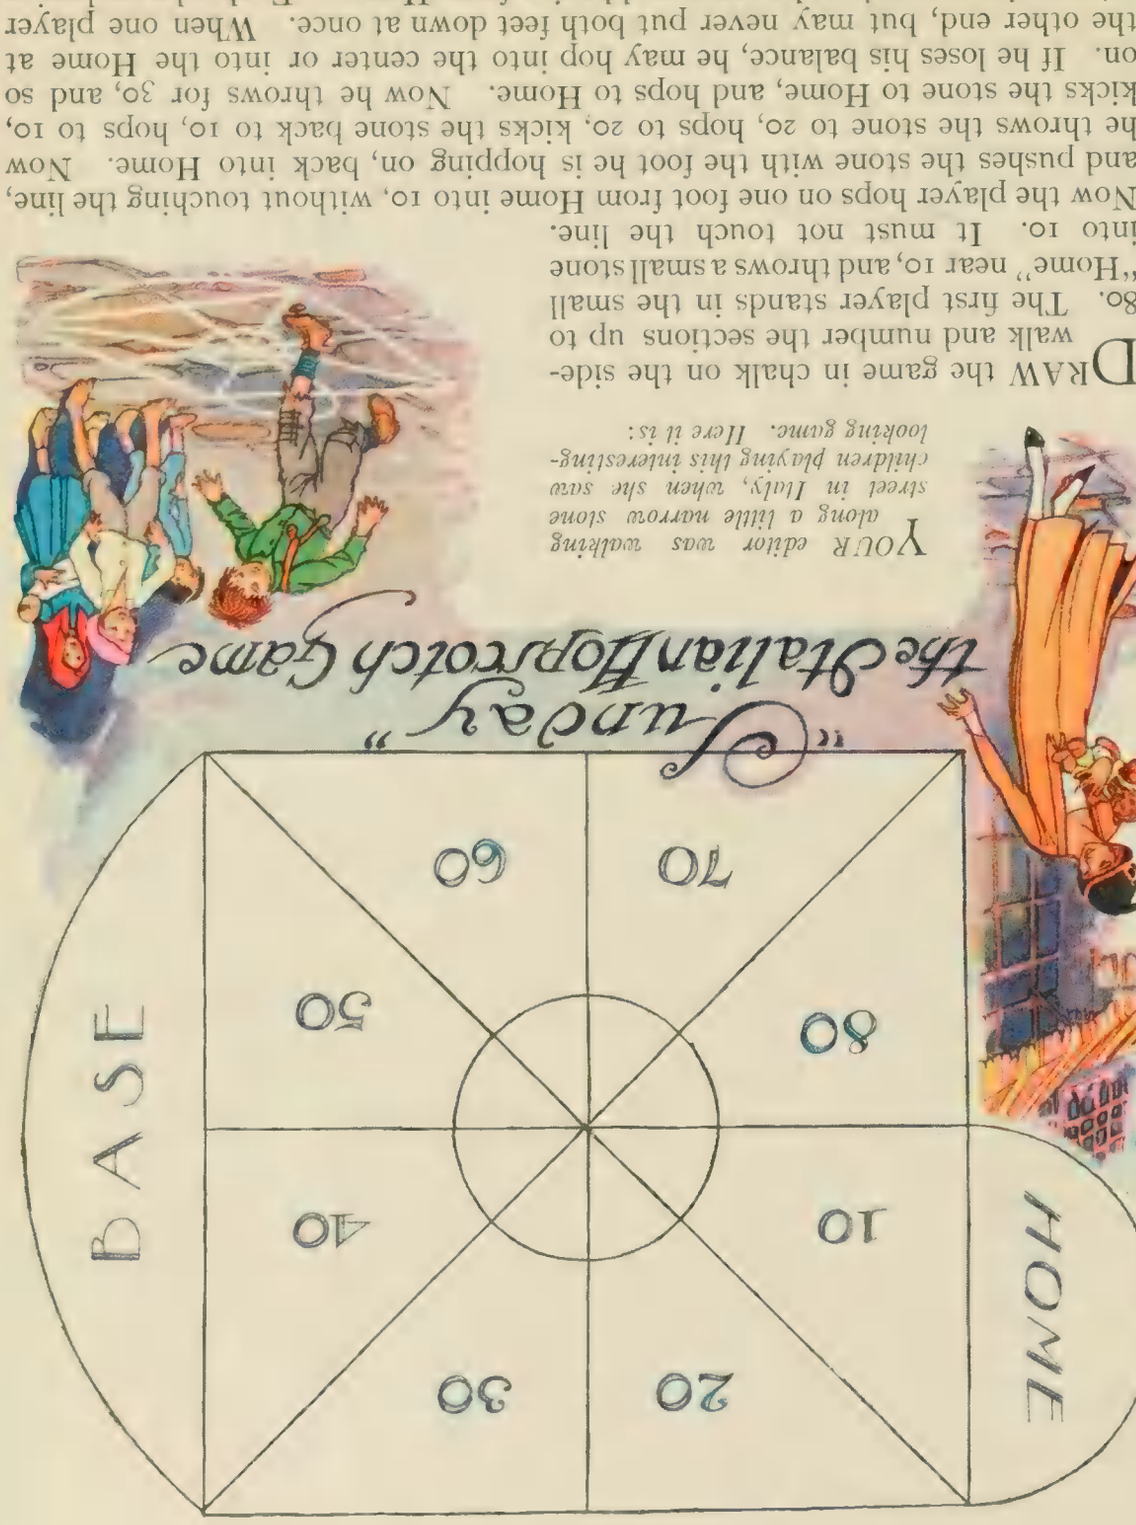
The coal-carrier raised his hand as if he wanted to say: "No, no, I don't want you to," but the gentleman still paid no attention.

So his son began slowly in a low voice, without once raising his eyes:

"I beg your pardon—for the wicked—foolish—mean—words I said against your father—whom my father—feels honored to take by the hand."

Then the two men shook hands heartily, and the coal-carrier pushed his boy straight into Carlo's arms.

"Please do me the favor of seating them together," said the gentleman.



So the teacher moved Betti to the bench with Nobis, and as soon as they were settled, Nobis's father said good-by and left.

The coal-carrier stayed on a few moments, looking thoughtfully at the two boys. After a while, he walked over to their bench, and stood looking at Nobis kindly and apologetically, as if he wanted to speak to him. But he said nothing, and brushed his forehead with his long fingers. At last he started for the door, looked back once more, and went out.

"Remember what you have seen today, boys," said our teacher. "This has been the finest lesson of the year."

AN ITALIAN MADONNA

WHEN you go to Italy some day, you will visit the galleries of beautiful old paintings. Many of them are religious pictures. This lovely Madonna, painted by Raphael over four hundred years ago, which you will see when you cross the ocean, has smiled calmly on through all the centuries.

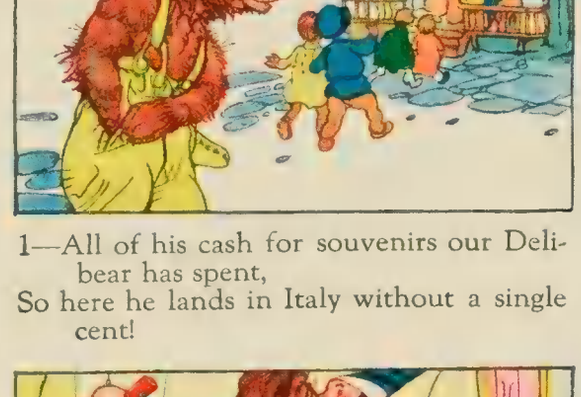
"Sunday" the Italian Hopscotch Game

YOUR editor was walking along a little narrow stone street in Italy, when she saw children playing this interesting-looking game. Here it is:

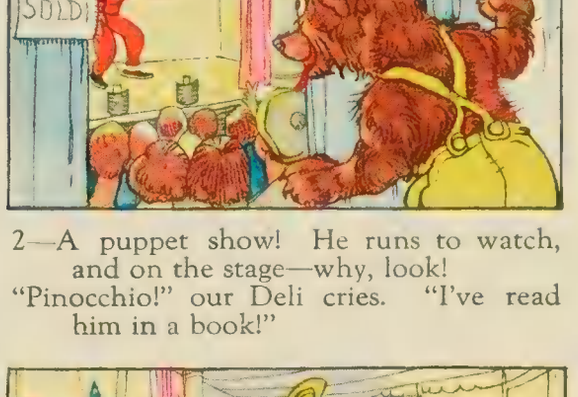
DRAW the game in chalk on the sidewalk and number the sections up to 80. The first player stands in the small "Home" near 10, and throws a small stone into 10. It must not touch the line. Now the player hops on one foot from Home into 10, without touching the line, and pushes the stone with the foot he is hopping on, back into Home. Now he throws the stone to 20, hops to 20, kicks the stone back to 10, hops to 10, kicks the stone to Home, and hops to Home. Now he throws for 30, and so on. If he loses his balance, he may hop into the center or into the Home at the other end, but may never put both feet down at once. When one player misses, the next takes the stone and begins from Home. Each player begins again where he stopped before. The first to reach 80 and back again wins.

DELI-BEAR MEETS OLD FRIENDS IN ITALY

1—All of his cash for souvenirs our Deli-bear has spent,
So here he lands in Italy without a single cent!

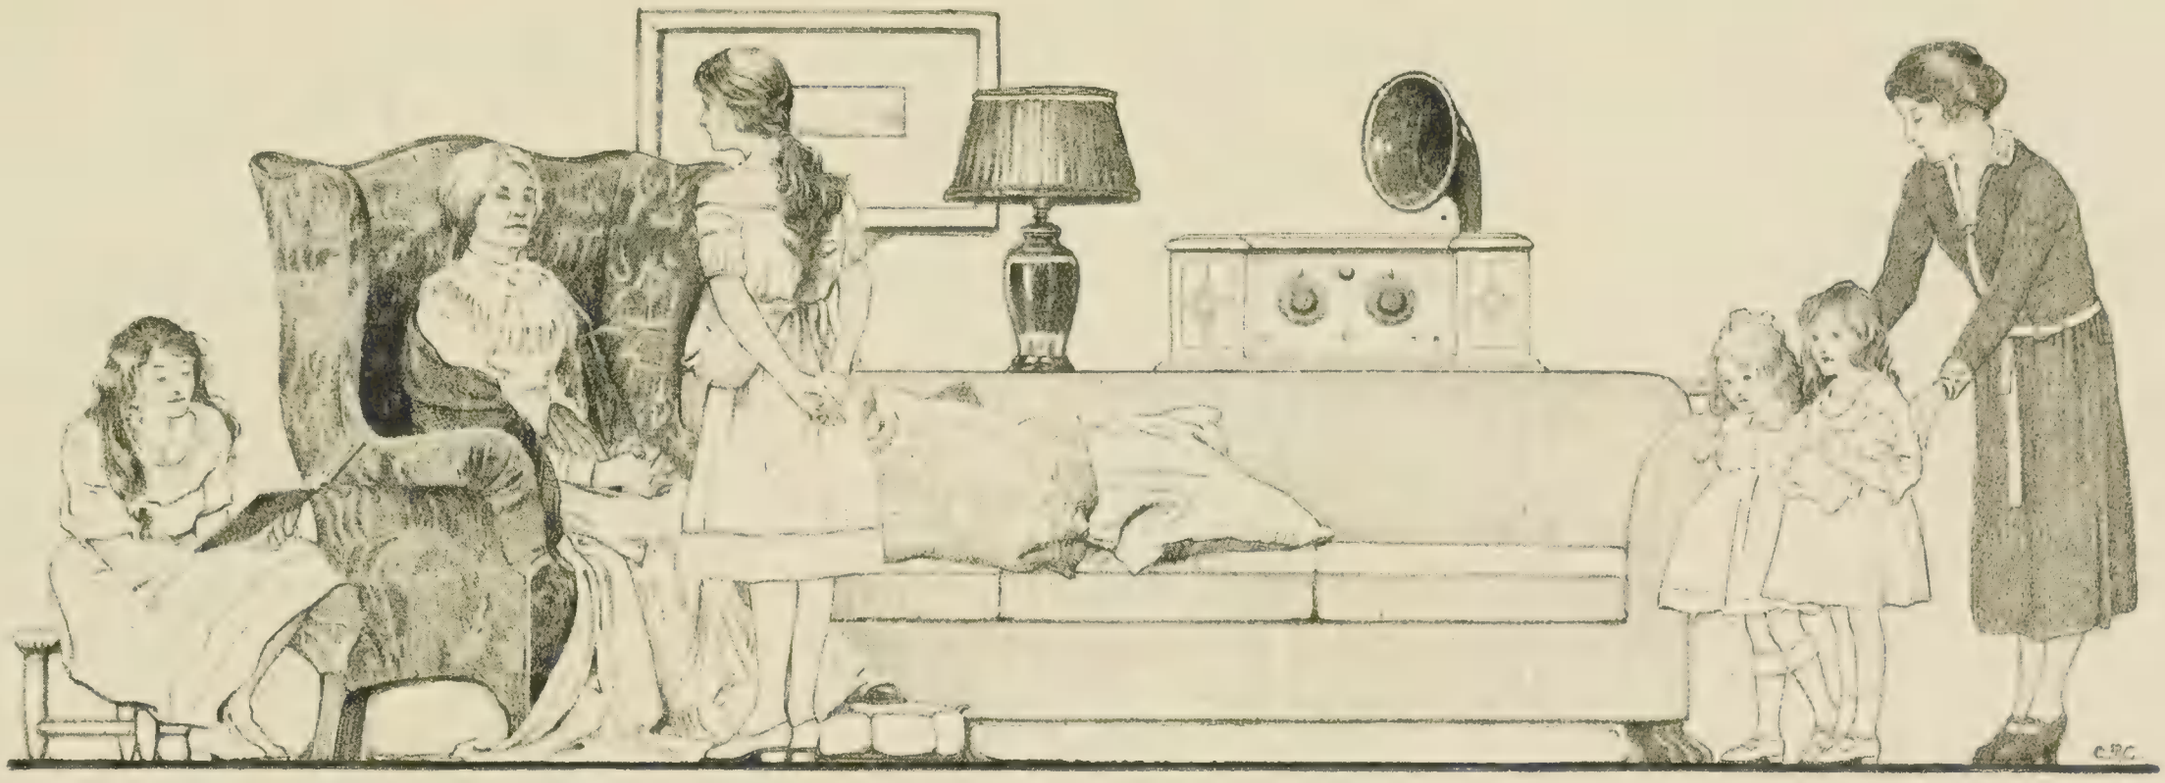


2—A puppet show! He runs to watch, and on the stage—why, look!
"Pinocchio!" our Deli cries. "I've read him in a book!"



3—While they kiss both cheeks—Italian style—out runs another fellow,
A happy friend from home—Italians call him "Fortunello!"

4—"Bravo! Bravo! The little bear!" laughs every girl and boy,
Who think he's just another kind of wooden puppet-toy.



5—Of course, the man who runs the show begs Deli-bear to stay,
And act as Uncle Sam—with macaroni every day!

6—He fills his paws with centimes too. And soon our Deli-cub
Invites Pinocchio and the rest to join his Deli-club.

Are you Cheating your Child?

Good manners are an asset; bad manners a lifelong handicap

By ELSIE C. MEAD

WHAT mother would admit that she was actually cheating her children out of something that rightfully belonged to them? Yet that is what every mother is doing who allows her boys and girls to grow up rude and boorish, or lacking in knowledge or practise of the little courtesies that rub off so many of the sharp edges of daily living.

Good maners are a definite asset, like lands or bonds; they can be acquired for nothing, and yet they have a real money value as a factor in success. The wise mother will begin teaching them and forcing her children to practise them even in babyhood; for the child who has reached twelve years or more and still has no manners is a difficult problem. It means that he has resisted all previous training in thoughtfulness, and is entirely indifferent to the small amenities which should by this time be second nature to him. This is the mother's last chance to save him from future embarrassment; so she should double her efforts on his behalf. Her main obstacles are the child's budding self-consciousness and the obstinacy of bad habits. The principal thing to remember is that training without example is more useless at this age than ever before, as the child is now wise enough to detect discrepancies between precept and behavior. We can not sidestep our responsibility in being the criterion by which our children judge the world about them.

MANY of our children lack reverence, perhaps as a result of an over-emphasis on the theme "any a man is the equal of any other man in these United States." To illustrate my meaning, let me quote from a book by Helen R. Martin called "The Snob." In a monolog spoken by one of the characters in the book, a Pennsylvania Dutchman, a professor of music in the academy, he is represented as trying to impress his new neighbors in the following way: "Now just to show you how I never knuckle down to anybody, no matter how high a person it is, here once when I was courting my wife I took her for a buggy ride to visit the Gettysburg battle-field, and when we stopped on top of the hill to take in the nice view another carriage came up behind us and the driver yelled out, 'Will you drive to one side? You are obstructing the view for the President of the United States.' It was sure enough President McKinley in the buggy behind us! But do you suppose that made any difference? It did not; I had as much right to the middle of the road and the front view as the President of the United States, or any senator, or any cabinet member or even any king had! For I was an American citizen. I stood on my rights. I called back: 'I have this place and I am keeping this place.' Well, that party in the back carriage, he hollered and he bawled and he swore, but not one inch would I move till I got good and ready. Then and not till then I moved. That's the kind of man I am. I always was and I always will be."

How should we deal practically with this boastful spirit? I know no better aid to the puzzled parent than such organizations as the Camp Fire Girls or the Boy and Girl Scouts.

No child can continuously repeat the Scout Promise and salute the flag without absorbing reverence for God and country, and the slogan "No day without a good deed to crown it" is a definite call to unselfishness.

Sloppiness in speech also is characteristic of this age, "yup" taking the plan of "Yes, mother," and "Yes, sir," which are so attractive.

The abbreviations "ma" and "pa" or "mama" and "papa" should now be supplanted by "mother" and "father." "Yes, sir," and "No, sir," have survived and are properly used by younger persons to older ones or by employees to their business superiors. On the other hand, I believe "No, ma'am," and "Yes, ma'am" should be dropped entirely from our vocabulary, and we should use instead "No, mother," or "Yes, Mrs. X."

The children who are sent away to school often return with certain improved ideas of behavior; a child, induced by herd psychology, has learned to rise with less awkwardness when older people enter the room and seems more at ease in greeting people.

But invariably the children return from boarding-school with table manners impaired, due no doubt to the usual rush of school meals, lack of checking up and the example of other careless children.

Remember, however, not to correct the child at table, but note very carefully all efforts made in the right direction and be sure to emphasize these when calling attention to his delinquencies. Corrections before people should only be resorted to when other means have failed, and should be held over the child as a wholesome threat, for the child of scout age usually has a good deal of pride and the wise appeal to this often succeeds better than punishment. A youngster should be taught there is no such thing as "company table manners," and that decent behavior must be practised at home as well as abroad.

IF ANY one asked me to enumerate proper table manners for a child, I should say first, "No talking unless spoken to." Children eat more than adults and should learn to eat slowly and chew properly, and this can not be done if they keep up a constant chatter, to say nothing of the consequent discomfort to the adults present. Second, the child should learn to chew with his mouth shut; third, he should break his bread in small pieces before buttering it; fourth, he should eat his soup quietly from the side of the spoon; fifth, he should learn to serve himself from the platter and vegetable dish without going at them as if he were shoveling coal, and he should not use his knife as if it were a saw. Also he should learn not to pile his plate to overflowing.

I do not overlook the fact that there are some children who never seem to learn, and they perhaps must be studied and treated in different ways from the ones I have suggested. The dreamy, absent-minded child, if not checked up, grows up into a neglectful, sloppy adult. With the shy child who from sheer self-consciousness does the rude and awkward thing, sympathetic judgment must be used, for too constant correcting of such a child will only strengthen the habit by increasing his self-consciousness. A careful selection of companions and wise praise when things go right, calling attention to the politeness of other children, are some of the means that can be used with a diffident child.

Interrupting is never excusable (unless the house is on fire). We unconsciously encourage it by answering in order to be done with the child and send him on his way. Do not let this annoying practise get any hold on him.

If you notice that your children do not shake hands properly by grasping the hand firmly and looking at the person they are greeting, insist on this with both your boys and girls. Your boy almost unconsciously learns to doff his hat to women on the street and removes it, on coming indoors, in emulation of his father. You also teach your boy to give his seat to a woman in a trolley-car.

The mother has a real problem to solve when she has been holding up the father as the ideal of masculine behavior and he returns at night tired and, heedless of the example he is setting, slams the doors, answers questions abruptly, forgets to draw out his wife's chair at the dining-table, and behaves generally like a careless boy.

Making unnecessary noise is bad manners; and if this has not been cured in the nursery age, make a point of doing it now. Slamming of doors, banging up and down stairs, slinging shoes on the floor, flopping into a chair with one's entire weight are particularly obnoxious performances. Members of a family may become immune to such a hubbub and only notice it when a guest is seen to wince, but the tired lines in the face of the mother are often caused by the racket she has had to endure.

There is such a furor of camping and an easy-going attitude toward the informality of clothes that a little studied discipline along these lines will not come amiss. Children of the post-nursery age should be required to change their clothes for the evening meal—it is a cleanly and well-bred custom and the reaction is an increased self-respect. Too much casualness soon deteriorates into a definite lower standard of living.

I MUST make a plea for concerted action, for there is nothing that so undermines the discipline and clogs the machinery of a home as when a child knows that he can appeal from the judgment of one parent to another.

The various ideas I have discussed in these articles are not new and have been written about for many years, but my reiteration is a very earnest reminder to my readers who have children under their control to regard manners as the outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace—and that if children do not acquire them at home, they will go through life with a severe handicap. We need never fear in this day of freedom and unconventionality that by overtraining we run the risk of making our children the prigs of a former generation.

Ways of keeping food from spoiling

By CLARIBEL NYE

CHILLS THAT MEAN HEALTH

Your staunch friend—the refrigerator—will help you prevent food spoilage. But do you know how to keep your refrigerator spotless and sweet-smelling, so that odors will not conflict; how to use ice economically?

All the problems of refrigerator selection and care are discussed in "Your Refrigerator," the new leaflet prepared by the Home-Making Department, which will be sent for just a two-cent stamp to cover postage. Send your request to the Home-Making Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

MOLD on the bread, bubbles through the can of fruit opened just yesterday—these and many other equally disagreeable instances of untimely spoiling of food are the common experiences of home-makers at this season of the year.

Much of the loss of food through spoilage is due to living organisms such as yeast, mold or bacteria. High temperatures, as in boiling or steaming, will, if given time, destroy them. Low temperatures, as in a good ice-box, will check them. The use of salt, sugar, vinegar or a coating of fat, oil or paraffin often helps.

Cooking or recooking is the most common way of delaying spoilage. Left-over food may often be kept several days by being brought to the boiling-point for two or three minutes, cooled quickly and kept in a cool place. Left-over soups or soup-stock, gravies, vegetables, meats, fruits and milk may be thus saved from immediate spoilage.

Rapid cooling of foods that have been heat-treated and are not to be eaten immediately is very important. It is always dangerous to leave a bulk of hot food to cool slowly in a warm place, for it favors the growth of any harmful bacteria which may not have been destroyed by cooking. If a large quantity of food is to be protected from spoilage, it should be divided into smaller portions and cooled in shallow receptacles in a cool and clean place.

Foods should not be covered while they are cooling, except with a piece of thin, clean cheesecloth, and bread should never be wrapped while it is still warm or moist.

When soup-stock is made, all the fat should be left on the meat. When the soup cools, this hardens on the surface of the stock. Soup-stock should be allowed to cool rapidly, should be put away at once in a cool place and the cake of fat on the surface should be left unbroken until just before the soup is used. If there is more than is needed for the one meal, reheat the stock with the fat returned to it, boil several minutes and treat as if it were fresh stock.

Parts of roasts may be kept from spoiling by roasting them again for half an hour. If the meat is already well done, it may be covered with a wet cloth before being placed in the roaster to reheat.

Meats keep longer if they are not cut in small pieces either before or after cooking. Poultry will keep longer undrawn than drawn, therefore it is well to have it untouched until just before it is to be cooked. If in very hot weather cold cooked meat has been cut in small pieces, it should be spread out in shallow pans placed if possible between pans of ice; or if it is to be used for salad, it may be thoroughly marinated with a marinade made as follows:

3 tablespoons oil	½ teaspoon pepper
6 tablespoons vinegar	½ teaspoon onion-juice
1 teaspoon salt	(if desired)

Mix the ingredients thoroughly in the order given. The oil and vinegar will delay spoilage and improve the flavor of the salad.

The spoilage of meats which can not be used immediately may also be somewhat delayed by sprinkling with salt and pepper, using the amounts customary for flavoring. The salt and pepper should be rubbed on well or pounded in. Vinegar is of much greater assistance in delaying spoilage. Cover the meat closely with a cloth saturated with vinegar. Either wet the cloth repeatedly with vinegar or arrange the cloth-wrapped meat so that an edge of the cloth dips into a small pan of vinegar and in this way is kept constantly wet with it. The vinegar helps to make the meat tender. Practically all the vinegar volatilizes in the cooking so there is little flavor of it left in the meat. The same procedure may be followed with cooked meat, but unless it is reheated the flavor of the vinegar will be noticeable.

In many homes it is customary to buy whole hams, and unless the ham is used quickly the cut ends may mold. This can be prevented by covering this cut surface of the ham with a cloth saturated with vinegar. The ham may also be protected by brushing the cut end with hot fat.

Many a farm household keeps for a varying length of time sausage or ducks or chickens which are first fried or cooked thoroughly, then packed into a clean crock and covered with slightly smoking hot fat.

Brine is particularly useful in preventing butter from deterioration. It should be a saturated solution—that is, salt should be added until no more will dissolve in the water. If any butter rises above the top of the brine, it will spoil; therefore an inverted plate or saucer should be placed on the brine and held down with a clean stone or some weight other than metal. The housekeeper who keeps butter by the crock should cover the butter with a cloth wet in brine.

To keep cheese from drying out wrap the cut surface with cheese-cloth wet with vinegar or cover it with cheese-cloth and brush the cloth with melted paraffin.

Mold is a common cause of spoilage in the case of breadstuffs. To delay or prevent molding several precautions are worth following. Do not wrap freshly-baked

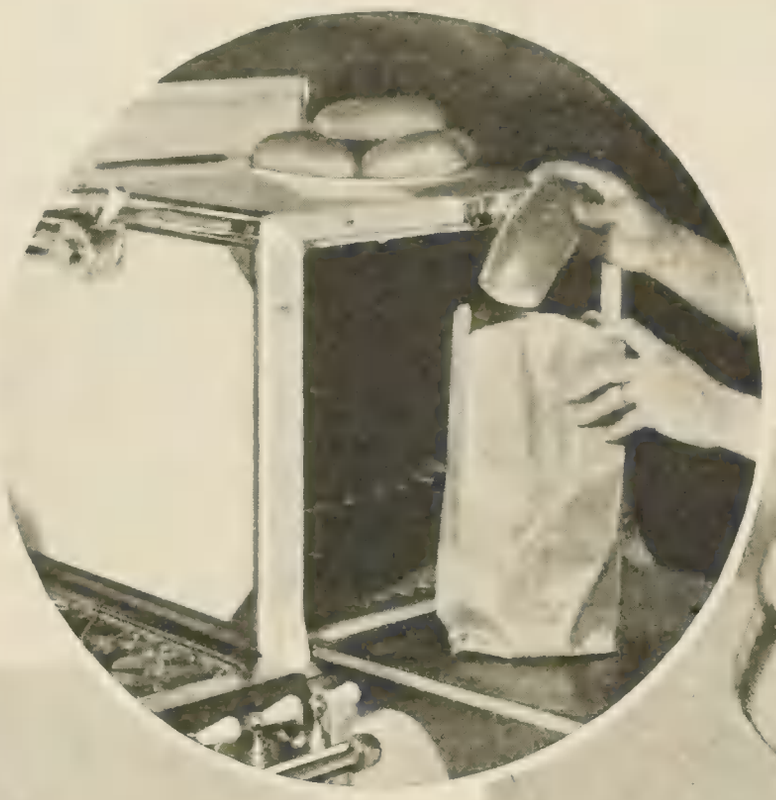
This article is written because spoilage is expensive waste. It is the loss of a little food here and there through unwise purchase or careless planning of meals or failure to protect it from spoilage which has made the French say that they could live on what we waste in our kitchens.



With most of us the income is not sufficient to feed the family and provide for waste as well. And why should our income provide for waste when it can be put to better use—to home or health or education?

Just common every-day waste capitalized into savings is the best way to pile up a surplus or pay our debts.

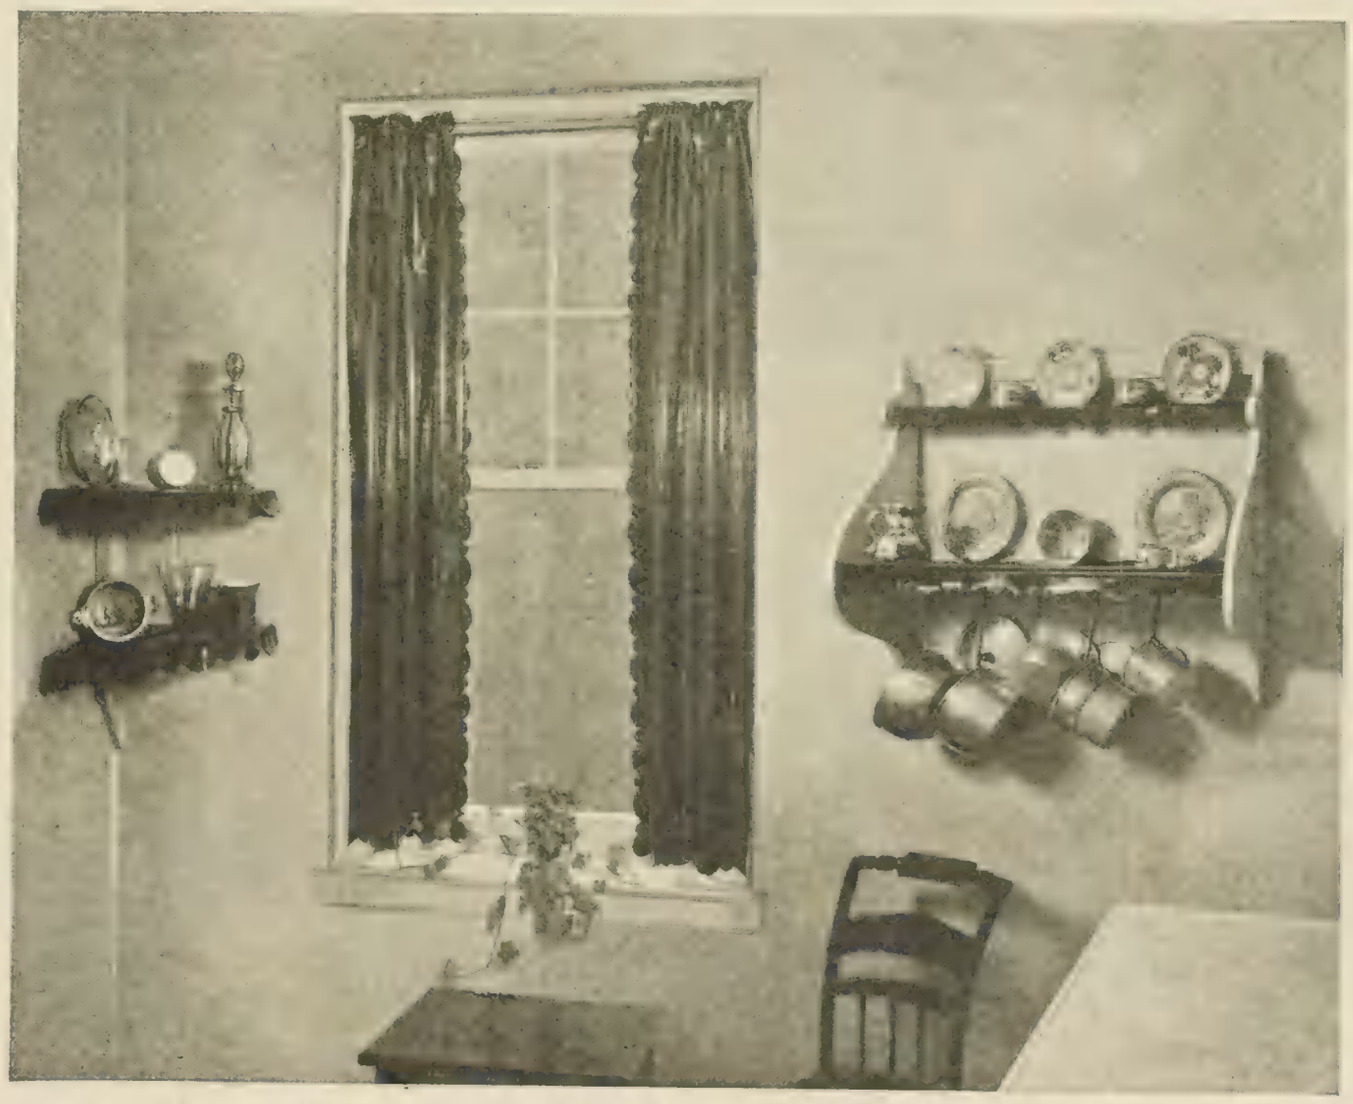
To the Lovers of the Home Beautiful: This popular department is now, you see, definitely established among THE DELINEATOR'S famous group. Your kind support has made this possible. In return, I invite your counsel and your criticism. You have building and furnishing problems, and it is my pleasure to serve you and help you solve them. Please consider me your friend and write me often.

LEONTINE H. SANDERS.

From this decorative water-proof material you can easily make a magazine-rack, apron, and many other articles. For full directions write Mrs. Sanders, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, enclosing merely a two-cent stamp for postage.

For porch use, house furniture may be protected with decorated coverings. Cut a paper pattern of the upper back and seat of the chair, leaving the sides open and scalloping the lower edges. Lay pattern on the fabric and cut. Insert eyelets along the sides and lace together with blue cord. Outline scallops in blue oil-paint, and apply DELINEATOR stencil pattern No. 40 in blue, yellow and green paint. The table covering may be made by cutting a cover pattern from a bridge-table and lacing together and decorating to match chair coverings.



A YARD OF BUFF-COLORED MATERIAL AND A "DELINEATOR" STENCIL MAKE THIS ATTRACTIVE LUNCHEON-SET, WHICH IS CUT ON PERFECTLY STRAIGHT LINES, WITH THE CORNERS LOPPED OFF FOR VARIATION

In the illustration above, the black water-proof fabric makes unusual slip-covers for the seat and back cushions of a painted wicker chair. Measure and cut materials as you would for covering adjustable furniture cushions. Then bind and stitch the seams with a bright orange or blue of the same water-proof material or with cotton tape. Leave one seam open at the lower back of each to insert the cushion. Gloucester hammocks and other outdoor furniture with exposed delicate fabrics may have cushions covered with this interesting material.

Quite the most individual hammock, porch or motor-boat cushions one could make. Rose and black, black and green, burnt orange and blue, are the colors used in the group. The checkered cushion is made by cutting two pieces of plain black material nineteen inches square. On one of these squares are appliquéd five smaller apple-green squares, six by six, checker-board fashion. Stitch these close to the edge without turning in edges. Then sew up side seams, bind with apple-green, and finish corners with colored wooden balls.

YES, KITCHEN-WINDOW CURTAINS AND SHELF-COVERS TO MATCH, ALL OF BRIGHT RED. THE SCALLOPS ARE BUTTONHOLED, AND DOTTED WITH BLACK PAINT

This garden flower-basket, useful also for a host of other purposes, in colors suitable for the out-of-doors, holds scissors and trowel in small pockets just under the handle. To make, cut one circle of the green water-proof material twenty-one inches in diameter, and another of pale yellow one-half inch wider. Lay wrong sides together. The green will be the outside of the basket; turn over this one-half inch of the yellow around circle and stitch. Over stitching paint a one-fourth-inch brown band. Cut two green triangles eight inches long and six inches at base. Bind and paint to match edge of circle. Two eighteen-inch bands are stitched under pockets as handles.

Beauty and the Ice-box

By

CELIA CAROLINE COLE

ONCE we had to stay in town until August. And because we had never before known Summer in a city, and for years had known it only with the waves sprawling over us and the golf-course stretching around us, we were no more prepared for the thing that hot pavements do to your feet, what miles of city streets without a single garden do to your eyes and mind, and what sun without wind and waves do to your body and soul, than a baby who has frolicked with the stars is prepared for rattles and safety pins.

Three things impressed us the first hot day we went out—our own discomfort, the cool, smart, picturesque women on the streets, and the hot, tired-looking men.

And the next time we went out we looked cool and pleasant, too, for we had done the thing we are always preaching to everybody else to do—we had learned how.

Keep in the top of the ice-box, along with the lettuce and milk and grape-juice and ginger ale, your bottle of tonic or astringent. Then always have a pad of absorbent cotton spread over the ice, so that any moment you can give your face and neck a deliciously cool cleansing tonic bath or, after the cold-cream cleansing, a cold refreshing astringent pat; then use wich-hazel.

And there is a glorious almond bath-paste that comforts you like a racy sea-breeze when you come home all hot and discouraged. You dip into a lukewarm tub and then, standing up, wet, take a little of the paste in your palm and rub it all over you, fragrant and cooling and very cleansing. After you have rubbed it in thoroughly, run a cool shower or dip again into the tub and rinse off the paste.

EXERCISES FOR THAT SAGGED LOOK

Another cooling bath is an Epsom-salt sponge; then do not dry yourself with a towel, but let the air dry you. Go to bed, and in the morning shower the salt off, or take a cold or lukewarm plunge.

Take an air-bath every day or night; it is second in value—so far as beauty goes—to a water bath. Nearly one per cent. of the total amount of oxygen taken into the body is taken in through the skin. Make a point of every day going about your room or lying down free of all clothes Let all your pores breathe. You'll take cold less frequently. Early morning sun, evening cool—let your whole body enjoy it, fetterless and comfortable. Modesties, like people, are divided into two groups, the false and the true.

Feet that have been on hot city pavements should be bathed at night in very warm water, then in cold; put a little cooling Epsom salt in the warm water, or some healing lotion, then give them an air-bath, all night long, if you can.

If you are not in the office, but can stay at home, a good way to defeat that sagged hot-weather look is to get up about five in the morning, take a plunge or shower, do a few setting-up exercises—we'll send you a hot-weather set, if you like—cleanse the face with the cool tonic, then do all those things you have to do in the daily round before the sun is hot upon your head. At two o'clock lie down and take your air-bath. Sleep. Lose in sleep those stupid hours from two to five.

When you make ready to saunter out into the gaieties, there are several very pleasant things you can do to keep fresh and cool-looking. After cleansing and patting with cold tonic or astringent, you can put on a delightful, rather frothy cream, which you lightly pat in, leave on for ten or twenty minutes until it is nearly absorbed, then wipe off with a tissue; next, lightly rub in a foundation cream which is the complement of this frothy cream, made very thin by adding a bit of tonic; then—oh, so swiftly!—run ice over the face once or twice, no more, and pat it dry with tissue. A whiff of rouge, powder, you are like cool creamy velvet, and you'll stay that way.

COLD CREAMS WILL HELP YOU TO LOOK FRESH AND COOL

TO MAKE YOUR SKIN TONIC MORE REFRESHING, KEEP IT IN THE ICE-BOX

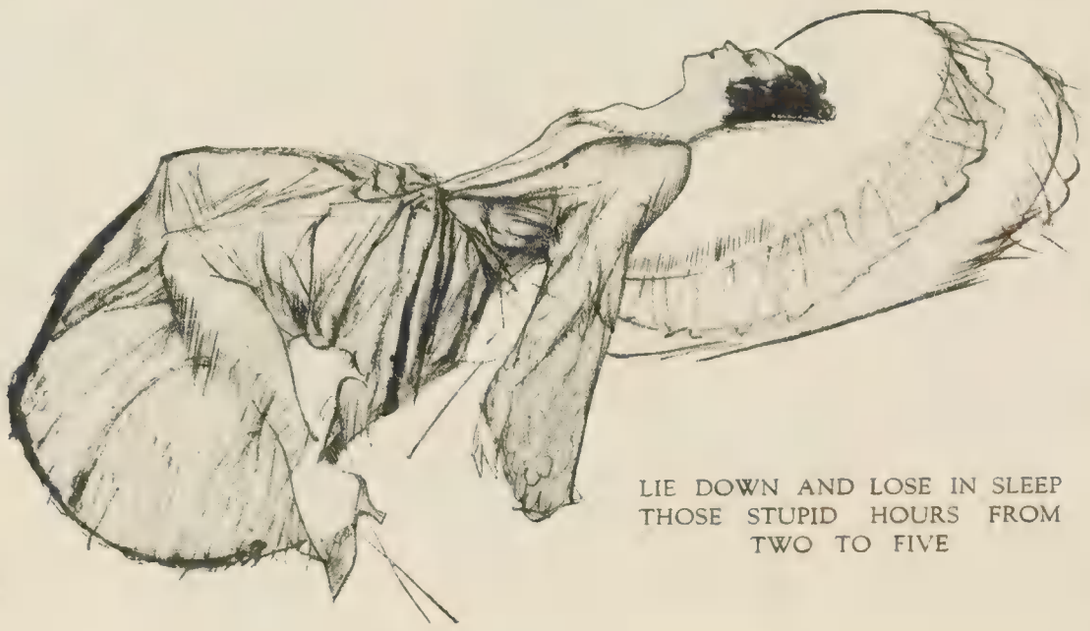
Another beautiful protection against looking hot is that luscious cream that water won't wash off and no perspiration will come through. Dilute it with tonic and rub on smoothly; the oxid in it makes it cling and is beneficial to the skin. It gives a very lovely tone. Or mix with the one perfect liquid powder a bit of a velvety foundation cream that is as white and cool and dazzling as snow always is in poetry, mix in the palm of the hand, rub on lightly, smooth with a tissue. Again the cool velvety look that won't come shiny, even though you dance on a hot night or play tennis in glaring sun.

For perspiration there are several very good deodorants on the market, a beautiful new one that is not medicated, and that other which not only deodorizes but regulates perspiration and is absolutely harmless. Common baking-soda fluffed under the arms with a puff is also effective and harmless.

There is an eye treatment for relief of eyes after the glare and dirt of day and after sleepless or festive nights. Cleanse with an eye-tonic or boric-acid water or mild salt water boiled, then look up and press a delicious eye-cream, soft and fragrant and nourishing, lightly but firmly beneath the eyes and at the corners where the "crow's-feet" come, close the eyes, press over the lids, leave on for five minutes. Relax in an easy-chair with a bowl of very hot water beside you. Then take the little comforting eye-packs that are the heart and soul of this treatment, made of fragrant, healing herbs, dip in the hot water, lay over the eyes, mold them close. Lie and dream. Then do it again. And again, as long as you like. Then when you have rested enough, dip a piece of absorbent cotton into ice-water, squeeze out, saturate with eye-astringent and pat gently on and around the eyes. The "burnt holes in the blanket" vanish.

The eye cream should be applied every night and left on all night. So many good-looking men have puffs under their eyes. The above treatment will reduce those puffs to nothing, if faithfully done. And there is another extremely good puff reducer on the market. Just why a man can be called good-looking, even when he has a bald head, a bow window and puffs under his eyes, we don't know. But we do know that his wife would create a tremendous to-do if she tried to "get by" with them. If we of the stancher sex would be a little more stern with them in our judgment, these almost handsome men, perhaps there would be fewer puffs and bow windows and bald heads in the world.

Glare and heat and dust—but beauty walks in their midst like a lily rising from the mud.



Have we ever told you about the revival we once read about where everybody got awfully excited and leaped to his feet and shouted, "I want to be saved, Lord, I want to be saved!" Emotion rose like a swift tide. A small girl of five years was caught in it; her eyes grew as mysterious as stars, her lips began to whisper. Her father caught her up and, lifting her high, cried out, "Hear what a little child has to say." "I want a pink sash!" she shouted with all her might.

That's what we want. Only our pink sash is a wide, floating cobweb of beauty that will enfold not only every woman in the world but men too, so that ugly human beings become as extinct as the dinosaur.

It can be done. Think what a race of gods would walk the earth.

ARE YOUR SPIRITS AT ZERO

when the thermometer is at a hundred? If they are, it's probably because you know you don't look your best. Sticky clothes, shiny nose, damp, unruly hair—they're enough to make anyone miserable. But there are ways of beating the weather. Celia Caroline Cole has told you some in this article, and she has prepared two leaflets that will be of further help in giving you hot-weather comfort. Send a two-cent stamp for postage, and we will mail you "How to Keep Cool in Summer" and "Treatment of Sunburn and Tan." 1. Copper bands at the décolleté and below the hip gleam through the meshes of a Havana-brown lace frock from Drecoll. The flared gores or godets, which one sees everywhere in Paris, run up higher at the front than in back

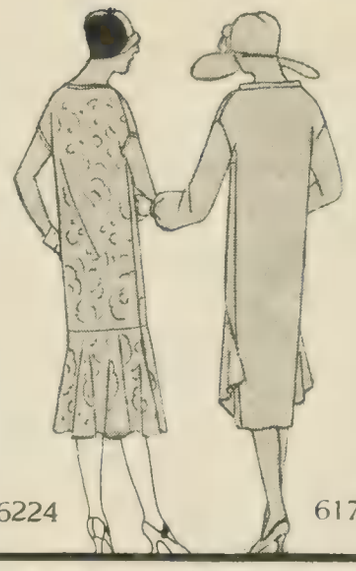
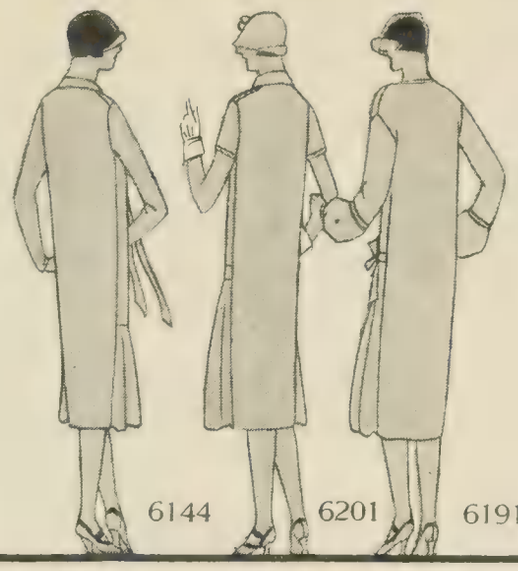
2. Bernard uses two tones of gray with the darker gray for bands at the hem, cuffs and for tassel ends. Inverted plaits are cleverly inserted in this frock to give the fulness that the short skirt is beginning to insist on



3. Charlotte borrows the wood browns for this lovely ensemble suit. The coat flares open or is wrapped around and held at one side. The flared sleeve, and tie-collar and box-plaited apron of the frock are typically Parisian and chic

4. Phillippe et Gaston reverse the position of the circular flare. Slip up the center back it circles the figure and brings up at each side front on a coat of mixed white, red and brown burafyle. The collar, pipings and buttons are of red brown soft kid. Modele déposé



5. Georgette takes brown and beige for an ensemble suit of check kasha with a collar of chat tigré. Plain brown kasha bands trim the belt, cuffs and along the line of the flare. The buttons are of brown wood

6. Very much belted above, this coat has plenty of freedom below in flat plaits at each side front and back. Made of green popla, it is trimmed with stitched-down slits on the collar, cuffs and belts. The buttons are of green galalith. From Marie-Louise (Blanche Lebouvier)

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine (flounce cut crosswise). Lower edge 2⅝ yards.

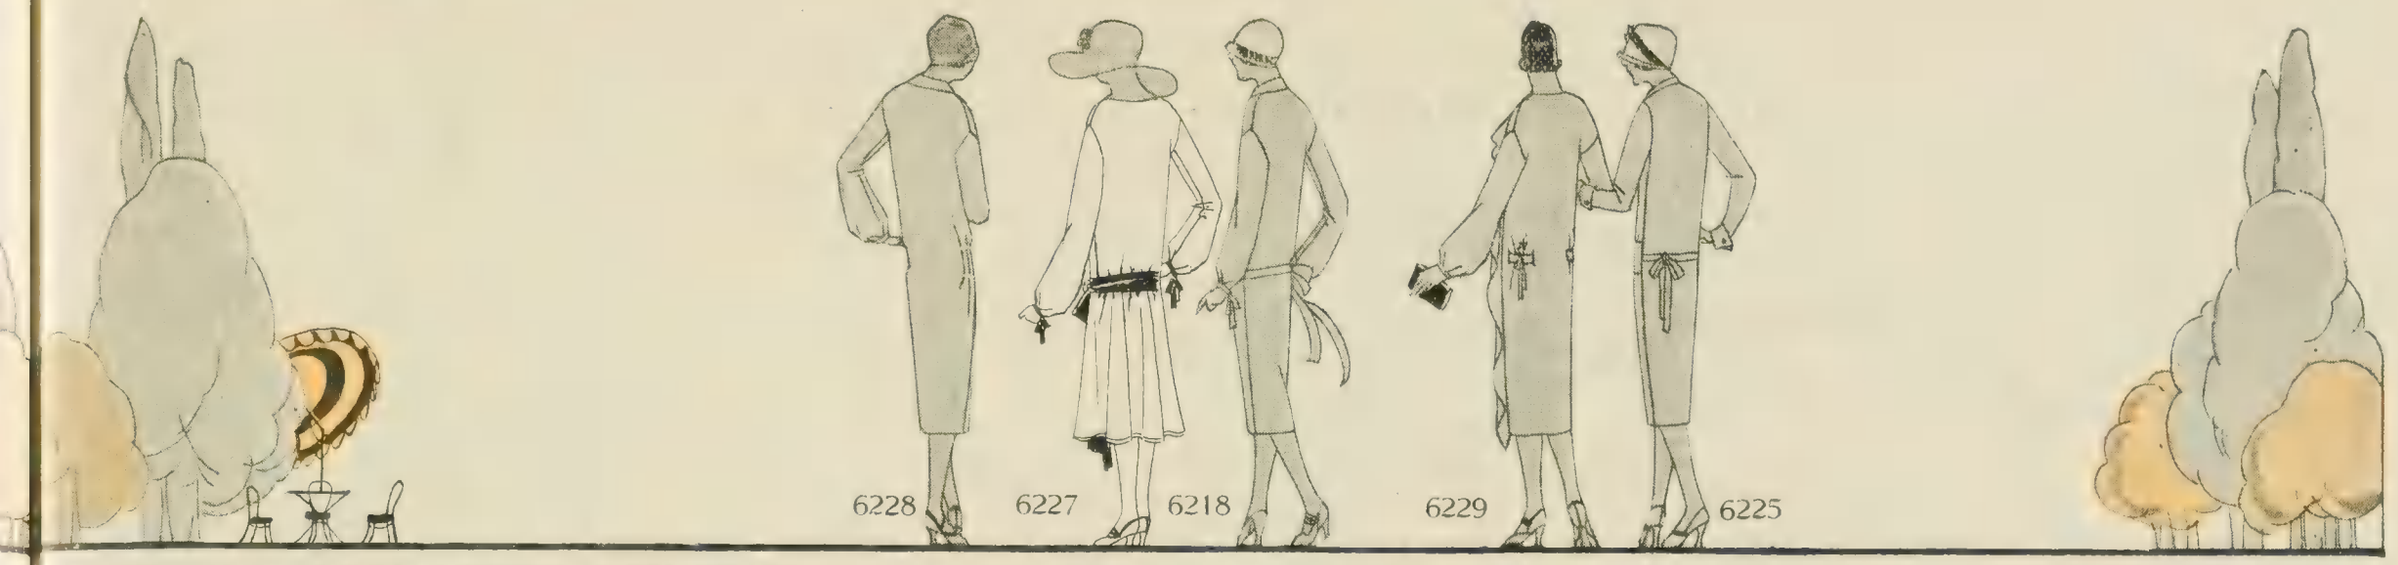
The dress is good style for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6144—Half a flounce is quite as smart as a whole one according to a one-piece slip-over frock, close-fitting at the hipline, with a circular flare across the front. Use Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, satin, radium, printed with plain to match, etc.

36 bust requires 3 yards 40-inch printed crêpe de Chine. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6172—"Most attractive" is the comment on this tie collar and sectional apron attached in a fancy outline. Make this slip-over one-piece frock of flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma, crêpe satin, etc., with lace, etc.



36 bust requires 3 yards 35-inch Georgette, 1 yard 35-inch lace. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6201—Assured chic distinguishes a new type of frock with a circular front attached below the hipline. It is a one-piece dress and slips on over the head. Use taffeta, faille silk, crêpe satin, satin Canton or Canton crêpe with Venise lace; or flat crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, etc. Lower edge 44 inches

36 bust requires 3⅝ yards 39-inch crêpe satin.

The dress is smart for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

OR OBTAINS MORE WIDTH BY THE ULL STRAIGHT SKIRT

6228—With inverted tucks at the sides a charming slip-over one-piece frock may be made of flat crêpe, crêpe satin, satin Canton, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or crêpe de Chine, with contrasting or with a crêpe de Chine tie. The straight lower edge makes it suitable for the bordered wide crêpe de Chines, silk crêpes, etc. Lower edge 48 inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch flat crêpe..

The dress is attractive for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

Dress 6228 Dress 6227 Dress 6218 Dress 6229 Dress 6225

6227—Staging a comeback, the full straight skirt is attached at the low waistline of a slip-over frock of printed Georgette, chiffon or chiffon voile, with a flesh-colored satin narrow drop skirt and long camisole lining, etc. Lower edge of skirt 3 yards.

36 bust requires 3⅞ yards 39-inch printed Georgette and ⅞ yard 39-inch plain Georgette.

The dress is becoming to ladies 32 to 44 bust.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6229—The tuck gives the Russian closing effect on this slip-over frock. Make this one-piece dress with its straight lower edge of crêpe satin, satin Canton, etc. With wide borders or (for certain figures) other wide materials make it without underarm seams.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch printed crêpe de Chine. Lower edge 46 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6225—A good dress for sports has a wide belt at the front in a two-piece effect. It fits the hipline closely, has an inverted plait at the center front and a straight lower edge. Use silk broadcloth, heavy crêpe de Chine or flannel, striped with plain, etc.

36 bust requires 3¼ yards 35-inch cotton broadcloth. Lower edge with plait drawn out 51 inches.

The dress is good style for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

THE SUMMER MODE FAVORS PRINTS, THE STRAIGHT PLAITS, THE SOFT GODETS

Dress 6157 Dress 6185

THE fulness that has crept into style depends largely on the time, the place and the flounce. The time, of course, is Summer—the thin Summer silks and sheer cotton materials seem to demand the softness that fulness gives. The place is at the front of the frock and the flounce is of many types—plaited, shirred, circular or sectional. The boyish mode, observing the new trend of fashion, has adopted a tailored fulness in a box-plaited section and inserted it smartly across the front in a picket-fence outline.

The ripple of godets, the graceful droop of jabots, the shirrings of the apron and the flutter of the tie collar all emphasize the new soft note and feminize smart dress once more.

FLOUNCES AND FLOWERED LINES OF STRIPES AND DROOP OF APRONS, AND JABOTS

INTEREST in Summer silks and cottons is divided, like all Gaul, in three parts, for the printed materials, the striped ones and the lovely borders bid equally for the smart woman's patronage. The popularity of this charming trio sweeps on undiminished as the season rolls along and definitely establishes as truth the fashion forecast that the Summer would be gay with the bright colors and designs that bloomed in the shops this Spring. Every type of print is finding favor. It matters not whether it is small and intricate or large and free, whether it runs in stripes, circles, vertical and horizontal bars or in the curving lines of iron-work tracery. "All designs that are fit to print" seems to be the slogan.

ONE goes down to the sea in stripes and prints or in plain-color dresses for the Summer holidays, or to the mountains similarly smart. Tiny frocks are made of cotton broadcloth, cotton crêpe, linen, linen-finished cottons, fine cotton crêpe, pin-check ginghams, pin-dot swiss, cotton voile, chambray, organdy, dimity, pongee, shantung silk broadcloth, challis, etc. More elaborate ones choose crêpe de Chine, Georgette, taffeta, net or point d'esprit.

The grown-up vacationer can wear the lovely bordered wide silk crêpes, crêpe de Chines and crêpe satins, or the plain or printed materials of the silk-crêpe family including crêpe de Chine, Canton crêpe, satin Canton, flat crêpe, crêpe satin, etc.

Dress 6217 6217 6203 6219 6199 Dress 6199

6215—10222—On the theory that one can not have too much of a good thing, a wrap-around frock inserts a plaited section at each side. The appliquéd flowers trim the shoulder and closing. Make them of harmonizing colors. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton or plain satin with contrasting silk crêpe; flat crêpe, Canton crêpe or heavy crêpe de Chine with contrasting for this one-piece frock. For early Autumn use wool crêpe, soft twills, worsteds, kasha, etc. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge with plaits out 2 yards.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 39-inch flat crêpe.

The dress is for ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6203—Youthful slenderness is the impression this one-piece frock gives. It slips on over the head and the lower edge is straight. It may be made of crêpe de Chine, radium, shantung, cotton broadcloth, cotton crêpe of good weight, cotton shantung or linen-finished cottons, printed or striped with plain to match; striped or plaid linen, plaid cotton crêpe of good weight or gingham with plain to match; striped or plain silk broadcloth, striped or plain flannel, wool jersey, etc. Lower edge 46 inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 35-inch silk check.

The dress is charming for ladies 33 to 41 bust, also misses.

THE APPEAL OF YOUTH LIES IN FROCKS THAT SLENDERIZE BY THE LONG LINES OF COLLARS, CLOSINGS, PLAITS OR STRIPES

6217—The simple frock is the one for borders. It needs no other trimming. Make this one-piece slip-over dress of bordered silks such as heavy silk crêpe, crêpe satin or crêpe de Chine, or half-and-half flannel, etc., with plain to match; novelty faille and satin, crosswise designs, heavy silk crêpe, ribbed silks, etc. It has a straight lower edge and the collar and cuffs may be detachable. It may have a body lining. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 1¾ yard 54-inch bordered flannel.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6199—Plaits make the short skirt wearable without destroying the straight silhouette. They are inserted at the left side of this one-piece dress which fits the hipline closely. The lower edge is straight. Use heavy silk crêpe with satin, heavy satin or wool crêpe with silk crêpe. For traveling or for early Autumn use twills, worsteds, cashmere, kasha or camel's-hair twills with faille silk or silk crêpe in a harmonizing color, etc. Lower edge with plaits drawn out 1⅝ yard.

36 bust requires 2½ yards 39-inch heavy satin.

The dress is attractive for ladies 36 to 50 bust.

6219—For street wear and for traveling no costume quite equals the coat-dress. Smartly tailored, this straight-line frock fits closely at the hipline. Use flannel, twills, worsteds, cashmere, wool crêpe, kasha, camel's-hair twills, stripes, plaids or checks with harmonizing crêpe de Chine or silk crêpe; or serge with harmonizing satin. Or make it of wool rep with satin to harmonize. It may have a French body lining and may be worn with a belt. The smart front closing makes it easy to slip into. Lower edge 45½ inches.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch flannel.

The dress is becoming to ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6231—This wearable frock is becoming to practically all types. It is a one-piece dress and it slips on over the head. The lower edge is straight and the collar and cuffs may be detachable. Make it of heavy crêpe de Chine, pongee, cotton pongee or cotton broadcloth with contrasting or striped or printed with plain to match; silk broadcloth with contrasting or striped with plain to match; light-weight flannel or light-weight wool jersey, striped or printed radium with plain to match, etc. Lower edge 48 inches.

36 bust requires 2⅛ yards 54-inch striped flannel.

The dress is very attractive for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6237—The circular skirt swings in a new mode for Summer frocks. This one is of the two-piece type and is joined at the hipline to a frock that slips on over the head. Make the dress of crêpe satin or plain satin with silk crêpe in contrast; satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or heavy crêpe de Chine with contrasting. Or use printed heavy crêpe de Chine, printed silk crêpe, printed crêpe faille or crêpe satin with plain to match. It may have a body lining. Lower edge about 2⅛ yards.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 39-inch silk crêpe.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6235—The coat which has a smart flare to its lower part is the last word from France. This one swaggers a bit, pleasantly conscious of its raglan sleeves and tailored pockets. The collar may be buttoned up to the neck. Make this single-breasted flare coat of flannel, tweed, homespun, cheviot, camel's-hair twills, checks, plaids, etc. Mothers who are looking ahead into the coming season will also like it made of chinchilla. It will make a very smart and serviceable school coat.

12 years requires 1⅞ yard 54-inch flannel.

The coat is very good looking for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

PARIS FINDS SIMPLE STYLES, RELIEVED BY PLAITS OR FLARES, STRIPES OR PRINTS, SMART FOR ALL AGES

6232—10119—An embroidered flower marks the spot where the belt disappears. Work these flowers at each side front to match the collar and cuffs. This one-piece frock has a cluster of plaits at each side front and back. It slips on over the head and is attractive made of crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, Georgette, chiffon voile, cotton voile or fine cotton crêpe, all of one material or with contrasting. Or use these materials printed in small designs with plain to match.

13 years requires 3⅛ yards 36-inch cotton voile.

The dress is charming for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6238—Striped materials make striking frocks for the younger generation as well as for the older. This one-piece dress has a collar that rolls into a tab down on the front. Make it of cotton crêpe of good weight, cotton broadcloth, cotton shantung, linen, linen-finished cottons, silk broadcloth, heavy crêpe de Chine, shantung or flannel, striped with plain to match or plain with contrasting. This frock slips on over the head 13 years requires 2½ yards 32-inch cotton broadcloth.

The dress is smart for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6236—10208—The rippling circular flounce lengthens the one-piece upper part of a new slip-over frock that fits closely at the hipline. The flower on the shoulder is hand-made; the one above the flounce is embroidered. Work in contrast. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe de Chine or crêpe Roma, etc. The collar and cuffs may be detachable. Lower edge 2½ yards.

17 years requires 2⅝ yards 39-inch silk crêpe (circular flounce cut crosswise).

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, ladies 38, 40 bust.

6234—The slender frock has the charm of simple cut and youthful line. This one-piece type of dress slips on over the head and fits the hipline closely. The collar and cuffs may be detachable. Use heavy silk crêpe or ribbed silks with harmonizing satin or heavy satin with harmonizing silk crêpe; or bordered wide silk crêpe, bordered wide crêpe satin, bordered wide crêpe de Chine with plain to match; bordered wide flannel or half-and-half flannel, etc. The lower edge is straight.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 35-inch printed silk. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

PLAITS ARE CENTERED OR PUSHED TO ONE SIDE, CLOSINGS ARE RUSSIAN OR END IN A TAB

36 bust requires 3½ yards 35-inch plaid silk.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6195—10317—One can slip easily into a one-piece frock with a Russian closing. It fits the hipline closely and may have a detachable collar for its open neckline and detachable cuffs. The embroidery is decorative. Work in harmonizing colors. Use heavy silk crêpe with satin or heavy satin with silk crêpe; plaids, stripes or checks with plain to match; flannel with contrasting or with crêpe de Chine; wool crêpe, etc. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge 43½ inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6207—For style and for width this one-piece slip-over frock puts an inverted plait at the center front. The hipline fits closely and the straight lower edge makes it suitable for wide borders in heavy crêpe de Chine, heavy silk crêpe, heavy crêpe satin or flannel, or striped wide silk broadcloth, etc., striped heavy crêpe de Chine, striped silk broadcloth, striped radium, striped pongee, etc., all with plain to match.

36 bust requires 1⅞ yards 56-inch bordered flannel. Lower edge with plait out 52 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses

6177—The collar that turns into a tab closing is one of the season's hits. This one-piece dress fits the hipline closely and slips on over the head. The lower edge is straight. Use heavy silk crêpe with self or contrasting satin, crêpe satin with self or contrasting silk crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine with contrasting, etc., or these silks in wide borders, etc. Lower edge 45 inches.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 27-inch flannel.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6180—6196—10787—Over a skirt with a center front inverted plait and a straight lower edge one wears a mannish blouse with a shoulder yoke and either French or plain cuffs. The monogram is smart. Work in contrast. The skirt is attached to a camisole body for this type of blouse or to an inside belt only. The collar may be separate. Lower edge with plait drawn out 50 inches.

36 bust or 19 years and 38 hip require 3⅝ yards 39-inch flat crêpe (skirt cut crosswise).

The blouse is for 32 to 44 bust; skirt for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

6182—5715—10104—Another shoulder-yoke blouse, slip-over type, with a straight lower edge is made of silk broadcloth, heavy crêpe de Chine, etc. The embroidery is unique. Work in color. The closed wrap-around straight skirt has a cluster of plaits at the closing and is attached to a camisole body (or to an outside belt only). Lower edge with plaits out 52½ inches.

36 bust and 38 hip require 2½ yards 54-inch flannel (with skirt attached to camisole body).

But it's not nearly so bad as it might be

TIME was when an accident like this meant a ruined little frock. But today mothers are using certain marvelous new fabrics that keep their original beauty regardless of the countless washings to remove spots and stains.

How natural to want your children always dressed in pretty clothes! And now you may have them, practically and economically — as many, many mothers have already found—by using Everfast Wash Fabrics. These lovely materials simply will not fade, no matter what you do.

Boiling and washing with any soap or powder has not the slightest effect on their beautiful colors. Brilliant sunshine will not fade them. Nor will rain, salt air and uric acid. Everfast Wash Fabrics are fast color under all conditions. So completely has this been proved, that every yard, whatever its color, is guaranteed.

GUARANTEE: If any Everfast Wash Fabric fades, for any reason whatsoever, we will refund, through your dealer, not only the purchase price of the material, but the making cost of the garment as well.

There are more than fifty different Everfast materials, in dozens of exquisite colors and designs, from which you can make charming suits and dresses for your children's every need. Swanky little suits for boys, of Everfast suiting or poplin. Dainty checked or plain ginghams, Tubtex and Fineweve for girls. And when you plan clothes for yourself, you will delight in the wonderful assortment of Everfast voiles, broadcloths, linens and other favorite materials, as well as the striking fabrics, many of them novelties, exclusive to Everfast.

Soon you will be preparing for the next school session. Already physicians, nurses and boards of health are broadcasting their message to mothers. "Dress the children in wash clothes all year round. It's healthier." And more and more women are heeding this sound advice. For this, nothing is so satisfactory as Everfast Wash Fabrics.

Everfast Wash Fabrics cost but a trifle more than ordinary cotton materials. And yet how much more they give you! Almost every good store carries a full assortment of Everfast weaves and colors. Many, also, have ready-made apparel of Everfast. If your dealer does not have them, write us, and we will direct you to one who does. N. GARMENTS INTIMATE AND OTHERWISE FOR VARIOUS AGES AND BOTH SEXES

38 hip requires 1¾ yard 35-inch silk.

The knickers are for ladies, 35 to 49½ hip.

6216—Things are not always what they seem. The Russian closing is an illusion cleverly effected by a trimming band and buttons. Make this slip-over, one-piece frock with straight lower edge or wide silk broadcloth or wide flannel, striped with plain to match; or plain or striped cotton crêpe of good-weight, linen, linen-finished cottons, heavy crêpe de Chine, striped shantung, etc. Lower edge 46 inches.

36 bust requires 1¾ yard 56-inch striped silk broadcloth.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

Knickers 6194 Dress 6216 Pajamas 6178

6178—This garment answers pleasantly to the name of pajamas or lounging-robe. It is proud of its hand-made frog. Use shirtings, radium, cotton broadcloth, pongee or crêpe de Chine, striped with plain to match; sateen, mercerized fabrics, cotton crêpe, wash silks, wash satin, etc., with contrasting; cretonne etc.

36 bust requires 3⅞ yards 35-inch cotton broadcloth.

The pajamas are for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6188—The tam-o'-Shanter keeps its hold on style because it is so artistically becoming, and a plaited one is particularly so. Furthermore it has the added virtue of being quite new. It is made from one piece of material and may be gathered. Use velvet, satin, faille silk or radium with grosgrain ribbon to match.

21-inch head measure requires ⅜ yard 36 or 39-inch material for all views.

The tam-o'-Shanter is for girls, children, misses and ladies.

6226—Wee half-portion gentlemen find double-breasted things satisfyingly smart. This clever little suit consists of a blouse and short straight trousers. Make it of linen, linen-finished cottons, chambray, rep, poplin, galatea, madras, pongee, etc. The collar and cuffs may be attached or detachable.

4 years requires 1⅝ yard 35-inch linen.

The suit is adorable for little boys 2 to 6 years.

Tam-o'-Shanter 6188 Suit 6226 Coat 6198

6198—One flares forth smartly in a little single-breasted coat with a convertible collar. Make this raglan style flare coat of tweed, home-spun, cheviot, flannel, camel's-hair twills, or checks. For early Fall add chinchilla to this list. Venetian or twill lining is much used and flannel will make a warm lining for next season.

5 years requires 1⅛ yard 54-inch check wool.

The coat is charming for little girls 1 to 7 years old.

Nightgown 6222

6220

Dutch costume 6220

Jumper 6210

6222—Good-looking and becoming and charmingly modest this nightgown adopts the roll-back collar so successful in fashions this season. This is a simple and practical garment and may be made of cotton crêpe, muslin, long-cloth, nainsook, etc. It is lovely in crêpe de Chine. It slips on over the head and may have a long sleeve.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 36-inch muslin. Lower edge 2 yards.

The nightgown is for ladies 32 to 50 bust.

6220—One expects a background of windmills and black-and-white cows for this quaint figure which might have stepped from between the covers of "Hans Andersen or The Silver Skates." But instead it will be found in a setting of fancy-dress fêtes, etc. Make this typical Dutch costume of linen-finished cottons, sateen, cambric, paper muslin or percale.

8 years requires 2½ yards 35-inch sateen.

The costume is quaint for boys 4 to 12 years.

6210—A smart garment for the amateur or seasoned suburban gardener et al is this jumper. It may be made in either of two styles—with or without a band. Use denim, khaki, drill or duck. It is easily made and it is a very serviceable garment, for it keeps the shirt worn underneath it from getting soiled.

40 breast requires 2⅝ yards 36-inch drill.

The jumper is practical for men or boys from 30 to 48 breast.

10368—Attempting to corner all the stitches, this design for corners and motifs uses one-stitch, lazy-daisy, outline, cross-stitch and French knots. For use on tea-cloths, napkins, scarfs, luncheon-sets, etc., it can be adapted to 4 large corners 5 by 12½ inches, 4 large corners 4 by 14 inches, 4 baskets 8 by 9½ inches, 4 motifs 5 by 7½ inches and 42 assorted motifs.

Embroidery design 10367

10367—An economy design presents two quite separate trimmings for use on children's clothes, blouses, hats, etc., or on any garment where just a little embroidery is required. Work it in cross-stitch and one-stitch. It can be adapted to 3⅜ yards of 2⅛-inch banding, 3⅜ yards of ⅜-inch banding, 3⅜ yards of ¼-inch banding, 3⅜ yards of 1-inch banding, 2 neck outlines and 46 assorted motifs.

Embroidery design 10365

10365—Smocking, scallops and little sprays of embroidery combine in a design for children's clothes, underwear, etc. This design can be adapted to 2½ yards of scallops ¾ inch wide, 8⅝ yards of smocking dots 2 inches wide for style 3, 1⅛ yard of smocking dots 4 inches wide for style 1, 3⅞ yards of smocking dots 1⅞ inch wide for style 2, and 2 neck outlines.

"Some few years ago I ate Yeast for bacterial infections, boils and carbuncles. Within three weeks my infections disappeared and I have never been troubled since. But I have an especial message to mothers. Four children were born to me in four years, and they are perfect babies and I am a good specimen of a healthy mother—thanks to Fleischmann's Yeast. Not only did it settle my stomach, when other things failed, but also toned up my system, and gave me an appetite, which is most essential in motherhood."

Theodosia Hession, R. N., Brooklyn, N. Y.

"I never knew when a bilious attack would come on me, even though careful of my diet. Once I was in the midst of preparing a big dinner party; another time I was week-ending with friends—one time I was driving my car down a narrow mountain road. The usual violent headache followed, the usual gone feeling the next day from the effect of a purgative. I had heard of Fleischmann's Yeast, its aids to digestion and elimination. I tried that, at first one cake a day . . . My last bilious spell was one year and three months ago and I feel positive that I will not have another."

Nora Weber, Denver, Colo.

Now they are really well

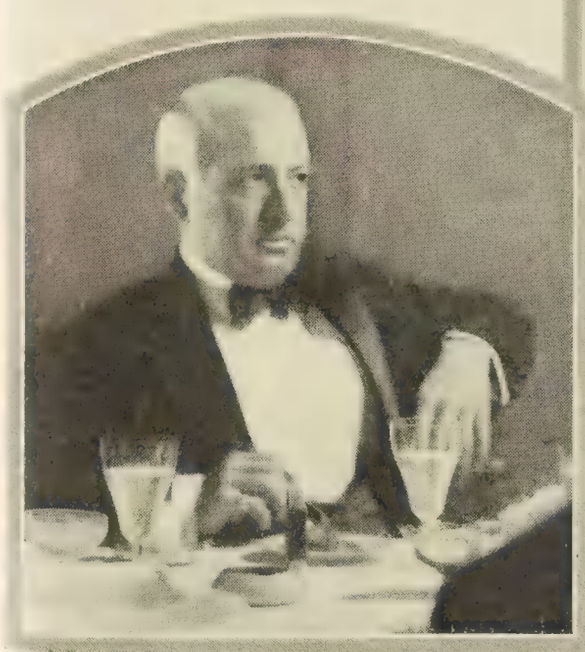
Vital, joyous, certain once more of their power, thousands have found the way to glorious health through one simple food

Not a "cure-all," not a medicine in any sense—Fleischmann's Yeast is simply a remarkable fresh food.

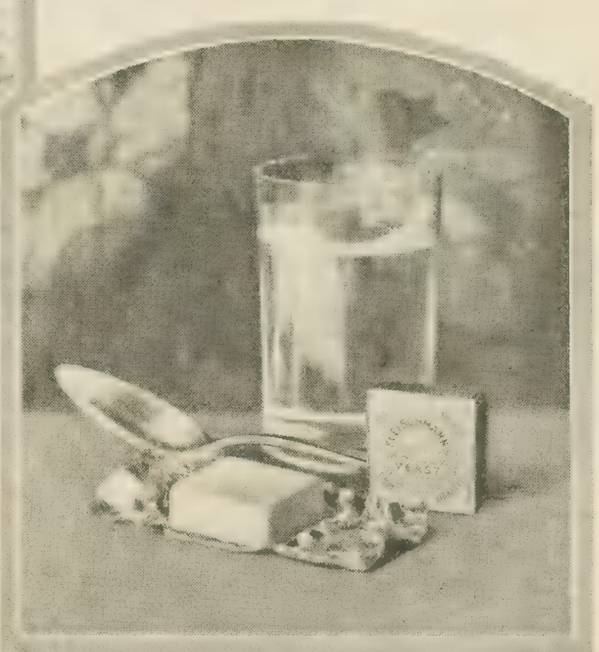


The millions of tiny active yeast plants in every cake invigorate the whole system. They aid digestion—clear the skin—banish the poisons of constipation. Where cathartics give only temporary relief, yeast strengthens the intestinal muscles and makes them healthy and active. And day by day it releases new stores of energy.

All grocers have Fleischmann's Yeast. Start eating it today! And let us send you a free copy of our latest booklet on Yeast for Health. Health Research Dept. C-19, The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington Street, New York.

"For six years I was ailing, nervous and depressed, interested in nothing, accomplishing nothing, rarely for twenty-four consecutive hours free from pain—all caused I know by intestinal putrefaction. At last I asked a nurse 'If there was anything in the yeast fad?' She assured me there was. I began eating daily three cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast. Relief from constipation and pain followed. I continued to take it as a tonic and food, regaining strength and energy and the long-discontinued compliments on my complexion. Today I am vigorously well, praise be to Fleischmann's Yeast."

Kate D. Meares, College Place, S. C.



"Four years ago I was all run down from nervous strain and constipation. I had no vitality; was barely able to drag myself around. Then I began to take Fleischmann's Yeast. Since that time I have been growing better and stronger. During these past 4 years I have done my ordinary work as office auditor. Besides, I have written mss. totaling 756,000 words, and have held constant official position in 3 organizations."

F. T. Mass, Dallas, Texas

"A year ago two friends and myself stayed nine weeks in an arid region of Mexico—living on the crude supplies the country afforded—and hope. My stomach was weak from abuse. My bonanza was a coarse, irritated skin—a breaking-out all over my body. I used a horde of 'positive cures' and then, discouraged, tried Fleischmann's Yeast. In two months I was as I am today. My skin was better than 'back to normal' and I was ready for every 'let's go'."

V. C. Spies, Barrett, Cal.

This famous food tones up the entire system—banishes constipation, skin troubles, stomach disorders. Eat 2 or 3 cakes regularly every day before meals: on crackers—in fruit juices or milk—or just plain. For constipation especially, dissolve one cake in hot water (not scalding) before breakfast and at bedtime.

Buy several cakes at a time—they will keep fresh in a cool dry place for two or three days.

VEGETABLE DINNERS

Adapted from the Butterick Cook Book

Just before serving, top the spinach with egg and the carrots with hot cream sauce—and you have all the essentials for a healthful dinner or just keeping well? Whatever you do you need vegetables in your diet. They are necessary for health, and a vegetable dinner now and then is just the thing. We have given all the recipes we have space for here, but if you want more, just drop a line to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and ask for "Vegetable Variations." You will enjoy crisp baked corn pudding, tender broiled tomatoes and other new dishes we have. We'll also send you our recipes for "Seven Vegetable Sauces" if you wish. Enclose a two-cent stamp for postage—please!

REDUCING OR GAINING

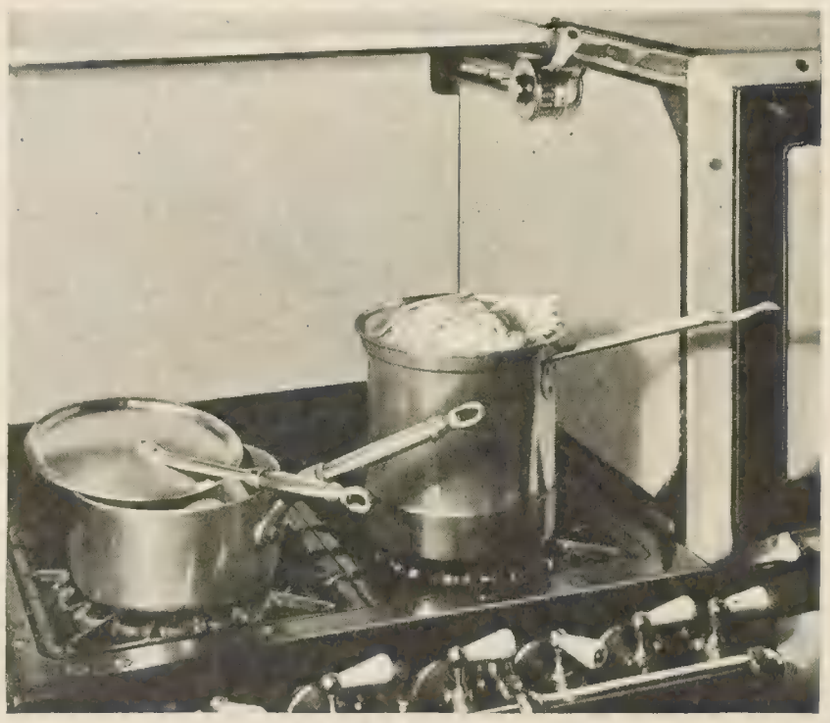
VEGETABLE dinners are growing in popularity in this country. Consciously or unconsciously this is probably the result of the feeling that vegetables have benefits for us that foods we may like better can not confer. Perhaps some of us have progressed to the point where we recognize, through the wider use of vegetables, redder cheeks—the red of nature—straighter bones, more perfect elimination of wastes and a general improvement in the whole tone of health. As a matter of general practise one vegetable dinner a week would be a sane proceeding in the average household, and now with the season for fresh vegetables at its height is the time to begin to acquire this habit.

The real vegetable dinner should be made up of at least three vegetables besides potato. The first vegetable should be a green one—when possible a green such as spinach, chard or something similar. The second vegetable may well give an added note of color, as do beets, carrots, beans, tomatoes. The third vegetable may be chosen to satisfy some special taste or for any other reason. One of the vegetables should be cooked to include milk, cheese or eggs. A relish and a garnish, bread and butter, a beverage, a dessert and the dinner is complete.

Some suggested combinations for dinners



1. Creamed spinach, broiled tomatoes, stuffed onions, potato puff.
2. New green cabbage, stewed tomatoes, shell beans, stuffed baked potatoes.
3. Okra, green corn, fresh sliced tomatoes on lettuce, creamed new potatoes.
4. Chard, corn pudding, buttered beets, hashed-brown potatoes.
5. String-beans, stuffed baked tomato, buttered onions, potatoes au gratin.
6. Spinach, American fashion, green peas, carrots, baked potatoes.

Preparation of vegetables for cooking

Wash all vegetables before cooking, even though they look clean. Soak wilted vegetables before peeling them; dry and old Winter vegetables may be improved by soaking them for several hours. Scrape thin-skinned vegetables; peel thick-skinned vegetables, or remove the skin after cooking. Make thin peelings, except in the case of turnips, from which a thick peel or corky material should be removed.

Directions for cooking vegetables

Put vegetables on to cook in boiling water. Use a teaspoon of salt to each quart of water but do not add the salt until the vegetables are almost done. Mild-juiced vegetables should be cooked until they are tender in a small amount of water with the cover ajar. There should be very little water left when cooking is finished and, as often as possible, this should be included with the vegetable when it is served. Tomatoes will cook in their own juices without the addition of water. Spinach will cook in the water that is left on the leaves after it is washed. Strong-juiced vegetables should be cooked in a larger amount of water and without a cover, to allow the volatile oils to escape, in order to reduce the flavor and to retain the color. A too strong flavor is often disagreeable, and rather overwhelms the milder vegetables.

Don't imprison strong-juiced vegetables. Cook cabbage in an open kettle. Milder vegetables are cooked with the cover ajar

Vegetables are often overcooked, which makes them soft and flabby, develops undesirable flavor, and spoils the color. A darkening of color is always an indication of overcooking. Soda shortens the time of cooking, because it softens the water, and vegetables cook more quickly in soft water than in hard; soda also helps to retain the green color of vegetables, but not more than one-fourth of a teaspoon should be used for

MENUS FOR AUGUST

By Jessie A. Boys

These menus were carefully planned so as to have correct nutritional values. Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

"What shall I have for dinner to-morrow"—"How can I give Dick variety in his breakfast?" One meal is hardly over before you must plan for the next. Why not follow the meal plans suggested here? They're satisfying and well balanced and taste, oh, so good! If you don't know how to make smooth, golden cheese fondue, molded salmon salad, or any of the other starred dishes, ask the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., for the recipes. We'll be glad to send them to you if you enclose a two-cent stamp for postage

THE abundance of fruits and vegetables available just now makes the housewife long for new ways of serving them. A little thought and a little ingenuity will often answer the question. Thus, the simplest way of serving cucumbers is as "sliced" cucumbers. A different "atmosphere" is obtained by cutting lengthwise in stick form. The next most common usage is as cucumber salad either sliced or diced. If lettuce is not obtainable, as is so often the case in places where home gardens are the rule, the cucumbers may be sliced, dressed with a French dressing, arranged in a serving-dish and passed as a relish. This will serve as a salad, yet be different.

Again, when a fresh whole peach is served at the table, how shall it be eaten? If one pare it, the resulting peach-stained linen will cause a frown. The simplest thing is to cut the peach in halves, remove the pit and with a spoon eat the peach as one does cantaloup.

Peach shortcake (Friday luncheon below) may be made like strawberry shortcake and be either hot or cold. Perhaps peach shortcakes are liked better cold than are those of strawberries. A very good peach shortcake is built up of stale angel-cake, sugared sliced peaches (fresh, of course) and whipped cream.

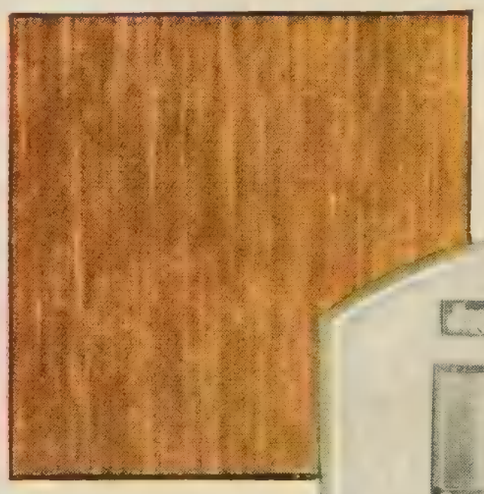
French Dressing is the simplest and at the same time the most sophisticated dressing for salads of crisp green lettuce, fresh fruit or cold vegetables.

Just mix three parts of Wesson Oil, one part of lemon juice or vinegar, salt and pepper to taste. Add chopped onion, crumbled cheese, the yolk of a hard boiled egg, mustard, Worcestershire Sauce, or any seasoning that you like, to give the dressing a new relish whenever you wish.

THE charm of this attractive dining-room lies in its simplicity of furnishings and deft handling of color. The floor, which is Armstrong's Marble Tile Linoleum (Pattern M62), serves as the basis for the decorative treatment, lending an air of dignity to the whole interior.

Heedless feet of lively children cannot scuff or scar this floor

THE woman who planned this simply yet tastefully decorated dining-room was wise—wondrously wise! She was one of those home-loving persons who cannot exist without lovely and restful things about her. She was also a very proud and happy mother of two small, but rapidly growing boys.



At first she was frankly puzzled, as thoughtful mothers will always be when they plan home decoration. She wanted a home that satisfied her love for beauty. She also wanted a home that would be a sensible, practical one for her children to grow up in.

Happily, she decided to start at the natural foundation for any room's decorative scheme—the floor. She knew that the careless feet of growing children would soon scratch and scar a floor of wood.

So she decided upon a floor that was soft and kind to tiny feet, one that could not be tracked and scratched—a warm, springy floor of Armstrong's Linoleum.

The floor she selected at her local store was laid in a day without dust, dirt, or bother. Experts firmly cemented it in place over a lining of builders' heavy deadening felt. Then it was waxed and polished to a rich, soft sheen.

Its mellow coloring immediately suggested the decorative treatment, simple yet dignified and beautiful, too. Its attractive pattern, unbroken by dust-grabbing cracks, invited the use of small rugs, easily taken up and cleaned. And the floor itself is kept spotlessly gleaming by a daily dusting with a dry mop. Is it any wonder that today this woman has colorful, easy-to-clean floors of Armstrong's Linoleum in every room of her pretty home!

This new Handcraft tile design (Pattern No. 3140) also comes in blended reds, greens, and blues.

This nursery floor is kind to tiny feet. It is a warm, springy, and clean floor of Armstrong's Jaspé Linoleum. A section of brown Jaspé is shown above. It also comes in green, gray, and blue. Pattern Nos. 13 to 19.

For home-planners who believe that interior decoration can be beautiful as well as practical, we maintain a Bureau of Interior Decoration headed by an experienced decorator, Hazel Dell Brown. A letter to Mrs. Brown will bring you helpful suggestions. This service is free.

each quart of water. Vegetables should not be allowed to stand in water after they are cooked. After draining they may be kept hot in a double boiler.

Canned vegetables that are allowed to aerate for an hour before heating are thought to have a better flavor than when they are heated as soon as they are opened.

CREAMED SPINACH

2 pounds spinach
1 tablespoon butter or butter substitute
Salt
2 tablespoons cream
2 hard-cooked egg-yolks
Pepper

Remove roots and wilted leaves of the spinach. Wash in several waters, until all trace of sand has disappeared. Place in a large kettle without additional water; the water which clings to the leaves is sufficient. Cover the kettle and cook until the spinach is tender. The time of cooking depends on the age of the spinach. Long cooking darkens it. Salt the water just before cooking is completed. When done, drain well and chop fine. Return to fire, add butter or butter substitute, salt and pepper, and stir until the fat is melted, then add cream, finely chopped yolks and mix well.

STUFFED ONIONS

6 medium to large onions
½ cup chopped ham or chopped green pepper
½ cup soft bread-crums
½ cup milk
½ teaspoon salt
Fine, dry bread-crums
Pepper
1 tablespoon fat

Remove a slice from the top of each onion, and parboil the onions until almost tender. Drain and remove the centers, making six little cups. Chop the onion that was scooped out, and combine with it the ham and soft crums. Add seasoning and refill the onion cups. Place them in a baking-dish, cover with dry, hard crums, add the milk, and then bake them until they are tender (350 degrees Fahrenheit).

POTATO PUFF OR SOUFFLÉ

2 cups hot mashed potatoes
2 eggs
2 tablespoons butter or butter substitute
1 cup milk

To the mashed potatoes add the fat, the egg-yolks, which have been beaten until very light, and the milk. Stir until well blended, and then fold in the stiffly beaten egg-whites. Mix lightly and pile the mass into a well-greased baking-dish. Bake in a moderate oven (350 degrees Fahrenheit) about ten minutes. Serve at once, as this does not improve with time.

BOILED OKRA

1 quart okra pods
Salt and pepper
Vinegar
Butter or butter substitute

The pods of okra are so sticky that special care is needed to avoid breaking them during the cleaning. Wash them well, and remove the stems, then place in sufficient water to cover them, and boil until tender. Add salt just before cooking is completed. They should boil very slowly, as rapid boiling will break them in pieces. When tender, toss the okra into a colander and when drained lay it in a dish. Heat some butter or butter substitute, vinegar and a little salt and pepper, mix well and pour the sauce over the okra in the dish.

STUFFED BAKED TOMATOES

6 tomatoes
1½ cups soft bread-crums
¼ teaspoon pepper
2 tablespoons butter or butter substitute
1 teaspoon salt

The tomatoes should be very firm, smooth and of equal size. Cut a piece from the stem of each tomato, and remove the centers without breaking the walls. Make a stuffing of the centers of the tomatoes, crums, seasonings and melted butter or butter substitute, and mix well. Sprinkle each tomato well with salt and pepper, and fill with the stuffing, packing it in quite solidly. Place a small piece of butter or butter substitute on the top of each, arrange the tomatoes in a baking-dish, and bake in a moderate oven (350 degrees Fahrenheit) until tender. Serve hot in the baking-dish.

COOL SIPS FOR CALLERS

PERK UP!

Sip a colorful Violet Fancy or Golden Glow Punch from a dewy glass tinkling with frosty cracked ice. These hot days there's nothing more refreshing than a novel cool drink

Besides the drinks you read about in this article, we have a leaflet which gives you recipes for ten other delicious concoctions

Just for a two-cent stamp to cover postage we will gladly mail you "Ten Zestful Beverages." Address your request to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

THERE are many refreshing drinks which are as delicious with the porch meal or sandwich picnic as at the tea or lawn party or served informally.

In preparing the various hot-weather drinks, all the fresh Summer fruits, oranges, lemons, carbonated waters, ginger ale and some extracts and spices have their uses, but the real secret is to have the mixture well flavored and strong enough so that the melting ice will not make it insipid.

A frequent mistake is the use of too much sugar, which detracts from the zest which a cold drink should possess. A bit of salt will improve the flavor of nearly all cold beverages. Carbonated water gives an effervescent and sparkling product. All these beverages should be "well shaken" or beaten "before taking."

It is advisable in all cases to allow the mixed beverage to stand on ice for at least one hour before serving, which gives the mixture a chance to infuse and ripen.

A simple sirup is the basis of most cold drinks. Added to cold tea, coffee or any kind of fruit-juice and cracked ice, a cool, refreshing beverage is instantly produced. A mellow, well-blended flavor can never be obtained by using sugar to sweeten cold beverages. Sirups of several flavors may be made in quantity and kept on hand for use when needed.

SIMPLE SIRUP

1 pound sugar
1 pint water

Boil for five minutes.

PLAIN OR FANCY LEMONADES

¼ cup simple sirup
Juice 1 lemon
¼ glass shaved ice
Cold water

In plain lemonade four tablespoons of any kind of fruit-sirup may be used in place of the simple sirup. Bruised mint, tender sprigs of sorrel or one tablespoon of bright tart jelly give a change in flavor. Soda lemonade is made by substituting soda-water for the plain water in the recipe.

CHOCOLATE FLUFF SHAKE

1 egg
3 tablespoons chocolate-sirup
¾ cup milk
Shaved ice
Nutmeg

Beat egg-yolk, add sirup and milk, beat thoroughly until foamy. Put ice in tall glasses, pour over it the chocolate mixture. Beat egg-white stiff, add one teaspoon of sugar and pile lightly on chocolate. Sprinkle a bit of nutmeg over the top.

MAPLE FLOAT

⅔ cup milk
2 tablespoons maple-sirup
1 egg-yolk
Whipped cream

Beat the yolk, add sirup and milk, beat or shake. Pour into a glass, add whipped cream. Set glass on a maple leaf on a small plate. This drink is delicious with macaroons or with dainty sweet wafers.

As good as they sound are chocolate fluff shakes or icy maple floats

BERRY CRUSH

1 quart berries
2 cups sugar
1 pint apple-juice
Juice of 3 lemons
Ice

Any kind of berries will do—a combination of two or more kinds may be used successfully. Crush the berries, add the sugar, mix thoroughly, let stand two hours. Add other juices. Strain into punch-bowl over large piece of ice. Garnish with a few thin slices of lemon or with a few of the whole berries. The rich berries of Summer make this an unusually interesting beverage of deep purplish or reddish hue.

MOCK CIDER

1 quart cold black tea
1 quart pineapple-juice
Juice 2 lemons
¼ cup simple sirup
Red raspberries

Mix first four ingredients, strain in punch-bowl over piece of ice. Add raspberries just before serving.

Fresh sweet apple cider iced is, of course, a delightful beverage.

BUTTERMILK-FRUIT SHAKE

1 quart buttermilk
Juice 1 lemon
Juice 2 oranges
⅓ cup simple sirup

Put all ingredients in a bowl, beat thoroughly with an egg-beater and pour over cracked ice.

CANTON CUP

¼ cup ginger-sirup drained from preserved Canton ginger
1 pint ginger ale
1 quart cold black tea
½ cup simple sirup

Mix all ingredients. Let stand in the ice-box at least one hour. Serve in glass cups with shaved ice.

GINGER-MINT PUNCH

4 lemons
2 oranges
1½ cups simple sirup
1 quart water
1 pint ginger ale
6 sprays mint

Strain the juice of lemons and oranges; add water and ginger ale. Wash the mint and bruise the stems. Add to mixture and let stand in a cold place one hour. Pour into a punch-bowl over ice.

ORIENTAL DELIGHT

1 cup raisins
1 cup sugar
3 pints water
2-inch piece cinnamon stick
1 cup quince jelly

Simmer raisins, sugar, cinnamon and water together fifteen minutes. Strain and cool. Beat jelly thoroughly and add to other ingredients. Serve with cracked ice.

COFFEE-SIRUP

1 cup ground coffee
3 pints cold water

Heat to the boiling-point. Let stand eight minutes. Strain through double cheese-cloth and add three cups of sugar, one pint of water. Boil two minutes. When cool, add one tablespoon of vanilla.

ORANGE-SIRUP

5 large oranges
1 lemon
2 cups sugar
1 cup water

Boil sugar and water five minutes. Grate the rind of oranges and lemon, add the juice and sirup. Mix, let stand two hours; strain.

LEMON-SIRUP

Follow directions for orange-sirup, using 6 lemons.

FRUIT-SIRUP

(Pineapple, raspberry, grape, apricot, etc.)

1 cup strawberry-juice
1 quart simple sirup
Juice 1 lemon

SPICED FRUIT-SIRUP

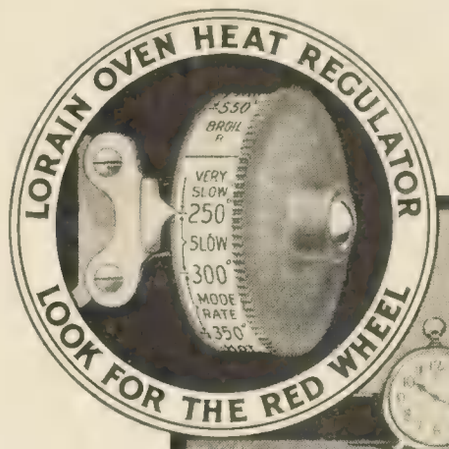
Sirup left from spiced pears, peaches or any fruit chilled and served with shaved ice.

CHERRY NECTAR

1 quart cherry-juice
1 pint simple sirup
Juice 1 lemon
Shaved ice
Vanilla ice-cream

Combine juices and sirup, strain and chill. Fill tall glasses one-fourth full of shaved ice and fill glasses almost full of mixture. Add a spoonful of ice-cream. Garnish with tiny bits of maraschino cherries.

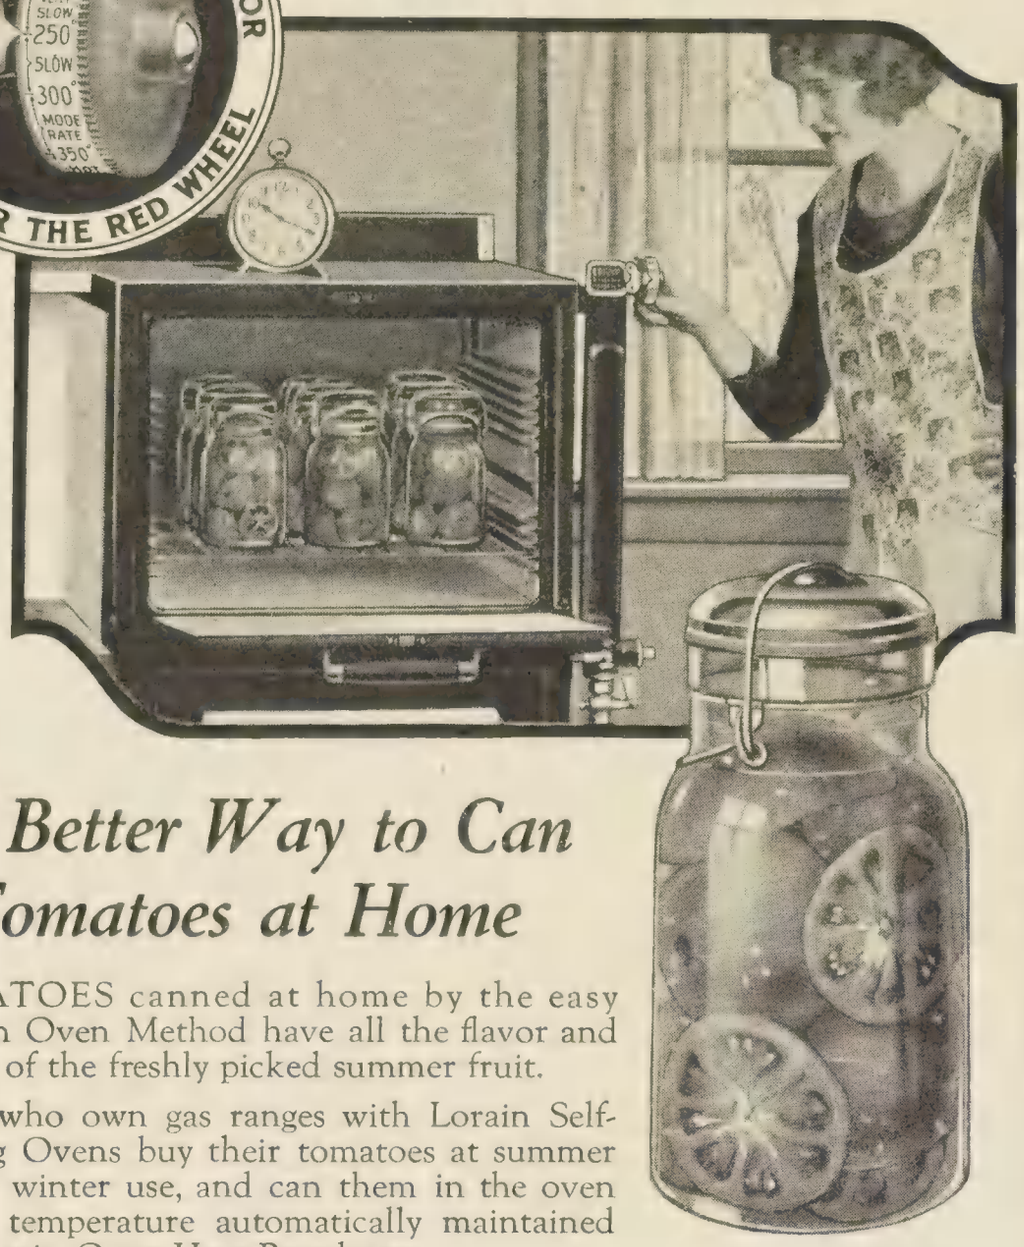
LOGANBERRY BLISS



1 quart loganberry-juice
1 cup elderberry-juice
Juice 3 lemons
1 cup sugar
1 bottle carbonated water

Mix thoroughly. Served with shaved ice.

CHOCOLATE-SIRUP



5 squares unsweetened chocolate
2 cups sugar
⅛ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon vanilla
2½ cups boiling water

Melt chocolate over hot water, add sugar, mix thoroughly, add boiling water and salt. Boil five minutes. Cool and add vanilla. This sirup keeps indefinitely and may be used in making either hot or cold drinks.

A Better Way to Can Tomatoes at Home

TOMATOES canned at home by the easy Lorain Oven Method have all the flavor and goodness of the freshly picked summer fruit.

Women who own gas ranges with Lorain Self-regulating Ovens buy their tomatoes at summer prices for winter use, and can them in the oven by exact temperature automatically maintained by the Lorain Oven Heat Regulator.

The picture of the big jar, made from an actual photograph, will give you an idea of the appearance of Lorain-canned tomatoes. But, neither pictures nor words can possibly describe the fresh-tasting deliciousness of fruits and tomatoes canned at home by this new method, which is so simple that school children enjoy using it.

With the Lorain Oven Method there is no standing, stirring, watching over a hot stove—no lifting of large, heavy, hot utensils. The Lorain Method keeps the stove-top clear for other cooking and the house is not filled with steam. Best of all, fruits canned by this method keep their color, form and flavor.

Thousands of happy housewives have learned the economy and convenience of the Lorain Oven Canning Method. There is no expensive canning equipment to buy. The tomatoes are canned right in the jars as shown in the picture above.

There is no waste of fruit on the kettles and ladles—and no waste of gas. Moreover, you don't have to watch the gas flame to maintain a certain steam pressure, or for fear that the water-bath will boil too rapidly. The Lorain Red Wheel regulates the fire for you.

Wherever gas is available you'll find a gas company, department store, hardware, furniture or stove dealer that sells gas ranges equipped with the Red Wheel Regulator, the original Oven Heat Regulator. These agents will gladly show you the many advantages of these stoves and explain the Lorain Oven Method of Canning, Baking without Failure, and Whole Meal Oven Cooking.

No matter what kind of a stove you use, you'll find our 1925 Oven Canning Chart interesting and instructive. Mail the coupon today for a free copy.

COOK ONLY THREE DAYS A WEEK

By Anne Madison

Edited and approved by the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

DOG-DAY DISHES

You can make them the day before and forget all about cooking until you're ready to serve. Delightfully chilly and refreshing—and satisfying too—are Jellied Vegetable Bouillon, Chilled Pimiento Consommé, Cold Roast Beef with Sharp Sauce, and several others for which we have recipes.

We'll be glad to send them to you for just a two-cent stamp to cover return postage. Send your request to the Home-Making Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

As part of the scheme to reduce cooking, enough salad dressing for all the week was prepared on Monday

IN ONE household of my acquaintance, in spite of the fact that an exacting family felt that cold-food days must of necessity mean thwarted pleasure in eating, a hot-weather cook-three-times-a-week program met with huge success after a week's trial. This is the way it was done: During the Summer months the laundry was sent out of the house to be rough dried. In that way Monday was freed for the task of getting the week's meals under way.

Monday was a busy day. Menus for a week were mapped out and were so planned that the major part not only of the cooking but of all food preparation could be confined to Monday, Thursday and Saturday. Monday itself was to bear the heaviest burden, for on that day such supplies as salad dressings, cookies, cocoa-sirup for hot or iced cocoa, and sugar-sirup for fruit drinks were prepared for the week.

The first thing decided upon was the meats to be prepared on the three main cooking days. These had to be of types which could be repeated without family criticism one or more times on successive days.

In the week's menus reported, the meats chosen were a roast of lamb, a baked ham and roasted chicken. The meat dishes for the week were limited to seven and the other meals were planned to include cheese or eggs. (1) Roast lamb, (2) cold lamb, (3) lamb and rice casserole, (4) hot baked ham, (5) cold ham, (6) chicken pie, (7) cold chicken with ham.

After the meals were planned, Monday's program of cooking was made to include:

1. Monday's lunch and dinner.
2. All foods which could be cooked or prepared ahead for the lunches and dinners for Tuesday and Wednesday.
3. A supply of foods such as salad dressings, cookies and sirups for iced or hot drinks for the entire week.

Breakfasts were not considered in this program, for in this household they were standardized, and their preparation independent of the other meals. They were made to make one contribution to the day's meals, however, for the iced coffee at dinner was foreseen in the hot breakfast beverage.

Lunches and Dinners for the First Three Days and Preparations that were made for Them

MONDAY

LUNCH

Welsh rabbit on toast, lettuce salad with French dressing, extra buttered toast, fresh fruit, wafers, iced tea, milk.

DINNER

Roast lamb, string-beans, buttered new potatoes, jelly, dressed cucumbers, bread and butter, milk and iced coffee, coconut-custard pie.

TUESDAY

LUNCH

Stuffed tomato salad with hard-boiled eggs, bread and butter, iced cocoa, fresh fruit and cookies.

DINNER

Cold lamb, potato and cucumber salad, dressed string-beans, young onions, bread and butter, iced coffee and milk, queen of puddings.

WEDNESDAY

LUNCH

Sliced tomato, cucumber and radish salad, toasted cheese sandwiches, iced tea, milk cookies, fresh-fruit sauce.

DINNER

Lamb en casserole with rice, green peas, lettuce salad, bread and butter, iced coffee, milk, French pastry.

Welsh rabbit was selected for Monday's lunch because it could be made quickly, and if an extra quantity were made it would furnish the best possible filling for toasted-cheese sandwiches on Wednesday.

Enough tea for iced tea was made to last through Wednesday; lettuce enough for three days was washed, drained, wrapped in a damp cloth and put on the ice to keep fresh and crisp. Cucumbers were pared, radishes cleaned and made ready for use and all wrapped in a damp cloth and put on the ice.

Eggs were boiled hard for Tuesday's lunch, and the water in which they were boiled was used for the momentary scalding which facilitated removing the skins from the tomatoes when they were being made ready for use on Tuesday and Wednesday. When eggs and unskinned tomatoes were cold, they were put into the ice-box. Enough flaky pastry was made to supply crusts for the custard pie and circles for the French pastry for Wednesday's dinner. These circles were baked along with the pie and needed only to be recrisped for Wednesday's French pastry.

A slightly sweetened custard mixture was made, and part of it, after more sugar had been added, was used for making the coconut-custard pie; the other part, combined with half its volume of soft, fine bread-crums, was baked, cooled and put away to serve as the foundation for Tuesday's queen of puddings.

Rice was boiled until thoroughly soft, then drained, put in a bowl, cooled, covered with waxed paper to keep it from drying on the surface and put away in a cool place.

In preparing Monday's dinner enough string-beans and potatoes were cooked for Tuesday's dinner as well. A quantity of brown gravy was made after the lamb was roasted. Enough was set aside in the ice-box to keep for Wednesday's casserole.

Tuesday's meals were practically ready except to mix the salad and to spread the pudding with tart jelly and meringue.

Wednesday's meals involved little more than the work of combining ingredients already cooked. It required only the small amount of heat to steam the casserole, cook the peas and recrisp the pastry. After recrisping, the pastry was covered with fruit and whipped cream.

Thursday saw activites resumed.

She receives more letters than a movie star!

"I am proud of the work I am doing, and it is through these letters that I know how much others appreciate it too."

IMAGINE a food demonstrator receiving more letters than a leading lady of the films! Yet this is the experience of Mrs. Carrie Blanchard of Battle Creek, Mich., whose work has made her the health adviser of millions.

They are very intimate, these letters, and very interesting. They are little pictures of everyday life in everyday homes—of the health problems which arise in raising a family, or keeping a wage-earner physically equal to his job, or a mother equal to her responsibilities. Particularly, they deal with the thirty-day test of Postum, and the tremendous influence it is having toward solving health problems in so many homes.

It has a very real appeal, this thirty-day test, in these "nervous" days when people are more and more realizing the harmfulness of caffein. During the test, people banish caffein from their diet. In its place, they enjoy the wholesomeness and fine flavor of Postum. They experience the benefits of changing from an artificial stimulant to a mealtime drink made of whole wheat and bran. They learn why Postum is the favorite drink in millions of homes!

At the end of the thirty days, they are free to go back to caffein, if they care to. They make the decision, comparing their feelings with the way they felt before the test. And four people out of five decide never to change back—decide that Postum shall be their regular mealtime drink, from that time on!

Perhaps you are one of those who wish to banish the nervousness, sleeplessness, headache, and indigestion which are so often the results of caffein. Perhaps you would like a drink, in its place, that every member of the family can enjoy together, secure in the knowledge that they are contributing to health and efficiency, instead of tearing down. Make the thirty-day test! Accept Carrie Blanchard's offer—now!

Carrie Blanchard's Offer

"I want you to make a thirty-day test of Postum. I will send you your first week's supply, free, and my personal directions for preparing it. I will tell you about Iced Postum, too—and how to make Postum with hot milk for children.

"If you would rather begin the test today, get Postum at your grocer's. It costs much less—only one-half cent a cup.

"For the week's free supply, send me your name and address. Please indicate whether you want Instant Postum, made instantly in the cup, or Postum Cereal, the kind you boil."

Postum is one of the Post Health Products, which include also Grape-Nuts, Post Toasties (Double-thick Corn Flakes), and Post's Bran Flakes. Your grocer sells Postum in two forms. Instant Postum, made in the cup by adding boiling water, is one of the easiest drinks in the world to prepare. Postum Cereal is also easy to make, but should be boiled 20 minutes.

Cold lamb, potatoes, cucumber salad, string beans and spring onions, iced coffee—practically all the cooking for this dinner can be done the day before

Lunches and Dinners for Thursday and Friday and the Preparations Made for Them

THURSDAY

LUNCH

Spanish omelet, lettuce salad with Roquefort dressing, bread and butter, iced cocoa, fruit cup, cookies.

DINNER

Hot baked ham, green corn, scalloped potatoes, baked tomatoes, bread and butter, iced coffee, milk, fruit sherbet, cake.

Rice will keep if covered with waxed paper and put in the refrigerator

FRIDAY

LUNCH

Sardines, stuffed eggs, lettuce-and-onion salad, bread and butter, iced cocoa, fresh fruit, wafers.

DINNER

Cold ham, scalloped potatoes, tomatoes stuffed with cucumbers and served on lettuce, bread and butter, iced coffee, milk, Bavarian cream, cake.

On Thursday all salad materials for two days were prepared and put on the ice to keep crisp. A large enough piece of ham was baked to serve hot on Thursday, to supply some choice slices for Sunday, and to serve cold on Friday, unless fish was to replace it on Friday. Enough potatoes were scalloped to be reheated for Friday's dinner.

An angel-food cake was made from the egg-whites left from making salad dressing on Monday, and in addition another simple cake, such as sponge-cake, was made. Both were covered with boiled frosting to protect them against drying. A quantity of fruit mixture was made, part of which was frozen for fruit sherbet and the rest combined with gelatin, whipped cream and beaten egg-white for Bavarian cream for Friday's dessert. Iced tea was made for the two days. Friday's task was chiefly one of salad making.

Saturday's most important business, in addition to its own lunch and dinner, was to insure Sunday's holiday feast—to see that it should provide a delicious meal for the family and at the same time give to the home-maker the final day of freedom which had been the goal of all this planning.

Preparations made for Lunch and Dinner for Saturday and Sunday

SATURDAY

LUNCH

Poached egg served on toast spread with sardine paste or anchovy paste, lettuce salad with Russian dressing, bread and butter, iced cocoa, fruit and cookies.

DINNER

Individual chicken pies, new potatoes, swiss chard, green corn, fruit macédoine with whipped cream, cake, iced coffee, milk.

SUNDAY

DINNER

Iced or hot bouillon, cold ham and chicken, combination salad, Saratoga chips, bread and butter, iced cocoa, fresh-fruit shortcake.

SUPPER

Sandwiches with peanut butter, mayonnaise dressing, thin slices of onion, leaf of lettuce and slices of tomatoes, iced tea or milk fresh fruit.

On Saturday chicken enough was cooked to furnish for Sunday a moderate-sized serving of a mixture of choice pieces of white and dark meat for each member of the family. Combined with a serving each of cold sliced ham, generous provision for the meat part of the Sunday's meal was ensured. The remainder of the chicken was freed from the bones and combined with diced hard-boiled eggs, one-half egg for each member of the family, and was made into chicken pie.

The stock which was made from the chicken bones, with the addition of some meat extract and gelatin, was used in part for the gravy for the chicken pie and in part for the jellied bouillon for Sunday.

The rich biscuit dough for crust of the chicken pie was made in amount sufficient to provide the crust for Sunday's shortcakes.

As pioneers in the field of oral hygiene, we believe that the makers of Listerine are logically qualified to introduce this new and drastic note into dentifrice advertising. And we believe that a very definite public benefit will result from this endeavor to make the nation properly conscious of the disease dangers that may result from tooth abscesses.
—Lambert Pharmacal Company.

"—what a pathetic figure he is today!"

Hidden wells of poison

Once a champion—now only a wistful onlooker! It was only a few years ago that he was one of the best golfers in the country. Today he limps over the course watching the players he once outmatched!

Shattered health due to tooth neglect! It all began innocently enough with several tooth cavities. Then like so many other people, he put off going to his dentist! As a result, several abscesses developed and seeped their deadly poison into his system.

Then came rheumatism and a heart disorder that made him practically a cripple. Neglected much longer, these hidden wells of poison might have caused his early death.

Do you realize this?

Do you know that, according to eminent dental authorities, 78 out of 100 adults today have tooth abscesses: that usually they do not know it themselves and that such abscesses may directly cause many dread diseases?

Among the diseases so caused are rheumatism and joint diseases; heart and kidney trouble; stomach and intestinal derangements; to say nothing of more minor disorders ranging from simple headaches to insomnia and nervous affections.

In spite of these grave dangers that lurk in tooth abscesses, relatively few people today ever think of visiting a dentist until pain drives them there. Whereas, only a good dentist can really place you on the safe side.

Protect yourself

You are probably like most other human beings; so while at this moment you realize all these dangers you, too, will very likely put off going to your dentist.

In the meanwhile, however, you owe it to yourself to take one simple precaution: There is a dentifrice that will do very much to keep your teeth and gums in a healthy condition. Consequently, more and more dentists are today recommending Listerine Tooth Paste.

Because Listerine Tooth Paste, and this tooth paste only, contains all of the antiseptic essential oils of Listerine, the safe antiseptic. These healing ingredients help keep the gums firm and healthy and discourage the breeding of disease bacteria in the mouth.

Quick results—and safe!

This is an age when people want quick results. Listerine Tooth Paste is so formulated that it cleans your teeth with a minimum of brushing, calling for much less effort than is ordinarily required.

Also, this paste cleans with absolute safety. The specially prepared cleanser it contains is just hard enough to discourage tartar formation, yet not hard enough to scratch or injure tooth enamel. And, of course, you know how precious tooth enamel is!

Finally, Listerine Tooth Paste is sold at a price that is fair—large tube 25 cents—the right price to pay for a good tooth paste. Try it. Enjoy really clean teeth. But don't forget the importance of seeing your dentist regularly.—Lambert Pharmacal Company, Saint Louis, U. S. A.

If your dentist has not already handed you our booklet on tooth abscesses and a sample of our dentifrice, you may have both of these by addressing a postal to Lambert Pharmacal Co., Saint Louis.

For a novel hot-weather salad—place drained DEL MONTE Crushed Pineapple in rings of green pepper on lettuce. Moisten pineapple with French dressing. Top each service with 3 balls cottage cheese. Sprinkle with paprika and serve.

Out of doors in Summer!

LET DEL MONTE DO THE HOT WORK for YOU

What is summer giving you this year?

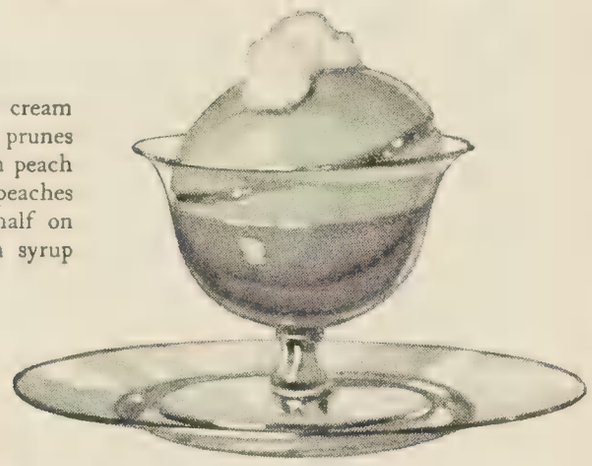
Is it bringing you rest and healthful recreation in the open air? Or only added kitchen hours?

Now—before it's too late—why not make up your mind really to take advantage of the opportunities this wonderful season offers?

You can do it so easily—and still serve the same tempting, economical meals—if you'll just let DEL MONTE do part of the hot work for you.



Under this well-known brand—for your instant convenience and enjoyment—are packed the world's finest fruits and vegetables—with all their natural, fresh flavor and delicacy.

You'll find a DEL MONTE variety for every summer menu need. Order from your grocer now. Only one suggestion. Just be sure you say DEL MONTE. Then you know in advance exactly what you're getting—the same uniform goodness in every variety—the same assurance of satisfaction, no matter where or when you buy.

The tempting summer dishes shown on this page are only suggestions of the many simple treats contained in our new recipe collection, "The DEL MONTE Fruit Book." For free copy, address Department 28C, California Packing Corporation, San Francisco, California.

Delicious Peach Dessert

Put 6 DEL MONTE Peach Halves in 6 ice cream glasses, cup-side up. To chopped meat of 6 prunes add ¼ cup finely chopped pecans and enough peach syrup to make a soft paste. Fill depressions in peaches with this mixture and place another peach half on top, cup-side down. Add spoonful of peach syrup and top with whipped cream.

Just be sure you say

DEL MONTE

Frozen Sliced Peaches

You'll have this tempting, simple dish often—if you try it once. Just pack a can of DEL MONTE Sliced Peaches (or Peach Halves, Crushed Pineapple, Apricots, Pears, Berries, Fruits for Salad—any variety you wish) in an ordinary bucket—between equal layers of chopped ice and coarse or ice cream salt. Let stand three hours. Take out the can; dip for an instant in hot water; punch hole in bottom; then open, cutting around side closely under top, and turn out a cylinder of frozen fruit—all ready for tempting, convenient service as a dessert or salad.

Just remember this is distinctly a DEL MONTE suggestion. It's the uniform high quality of DEL MONTE Fruits and the fact that each is packed in just the proper syrup that make this method so successful.

COOL SALADS FOR HOT DAYS

By Alice Blinn

Recipes have been tested and approved by the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University.—Martha Van Rensselaer

A salad that is both refreshing and satisfying is made of hollowed pears filled with celery, olives and nuts

There's a zest in salads—if you will vary the dressing once in a while. A piquant pot-pourri dressing glorifies a simple combination. Or top off a fruit salad with smooth, chilly meringue dressing and see how delectable the whole dish becomes.

Dressings to suit every taste have been prepared by our experts, who will be glad to mail you the recipes for them, together with additional fruit-salad recipes not given in this article. Send your request to THE DELINEATOR Home-Making Department, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. And please don't forget to enclose a two-cent stamp to cover return postage

A FRUIT salad does not necessarily have to be the all-too-familiar cold hash of somewhat squashy fruit mixed with a watery mayonnaise. It can and should be a charmingly colorful and delightfully appetizing dish. It offers an easy and attractive way of serving fruit as a light luncheon or supper dish for hot weather, or as a dessert followed perhaps by cheese and crackers; or it may follow the meat course at dinner to the great relief of digestion.

Fruit combinations should be chosen with an eye for color as well as a palate for flavor. Strawberries and bananas suggest such a combination. The cut strawberries may be used with the cut bananas, or the bananas may be marinated in a heavy sirup of strawberries and then used with the fresh fruit, or the cut strawberries or even a fresh strawberry jam may be used in the French dressing which is served with the banana salad. Incidentally the nicest strawberry salads are made by dipping the berries in orange-juice and rolling them in powdered sugar before they are used in the salad.

A fresh currant sirup, used to marinate a combination of fresh cherries, strawberries and pineapple, will add its share to the glory of the salad, particularly if a cream cheese is used for the dressing.

All fruit for salads should be carefully prepared. When oranges or grapefruit are used the thin separating membrane and all white skin should be removed from the sections. Nuts should never appear with their skins on.

Fruits set in jelly have additional flavor if the gelatin is well seasoned with orange or lemon-juice and plenty of paprika. The gelatin must be made very stiff so that the acid of the fruit can not soften it unduly. The fruit must be added just before the gelatin sets.

Oranges are of course an ever popular and always available salad material of the most refreshing kind. As a variation from the somewhat conventional orange and diced celery combination, chopped nuts, finely cut pears, shredded pineapple, cubes of cucumber, preserved ginger, cream cheese, cut dates or thin slices of sweet onion or pimiento may be used with oranges in salads.

These are some fruit salad recipes:

COCONUT FRUIT SALAD

1½ cups mixed sliced strawberries and shredded pineapple	4 tablespoons oil 4 tablespoons orange-juice
½ cup shredded coconut	Salt Paprika
1 tablespoon lemon-juice	Lettuce leaves Currant jelly

Mix the fruit, celery and coconut. Sprinkle with the lemon-juice. Add a French dressing made from the oil and orange-juice, with salt and paprika to taste. Line a salad bowl with lettuce leaves, and pile the chilled salad in the center. Dot with currant jelly.

TROPICAL SALAD

1 cup cantaloup balls	Any desired dressing
6 slices tomato	Lettuce leaves
Garnish of red pepper

With a vegetable cutter cut small balls from a cantaloup that is fairly firm in texture. Arrange several balls on a slice of tomato which has been placed on a nest of lettuce leaves. Garnish with pieces of red pepper or green pepper cut in diamond shapes. Serve with any desired dressing.

PEAR SALAD

6 pears	½ cup broken walnut meats and stoned olives, chopped
6 stalks celery
Mayonnaise
Salt and pepper	Lettuce leaves

Select well-formed pears and cut off a bit of the broad end so that the pear will stand steadily on the plate. With a potato-ball cutter remove the center, leaving enough of the pear to make a thick cup. Cut the celery into dice, add broken walnut-meats and chopped olives and mix all together with mayonnaise, adding a pinch of salt and pepper. Fill the pear cups and serve on lettuce leaves.

FROZEN FRUIT SALAD

Rub two tablespoons of cream cheese smooth, and blend slowly with one-fourth cup of stiff mayonnaise. Into this mixture fold one-half cup of heavy cream which has been beaten stiff. Then add three-fourths cup of white cherries stoned and sliced, or white grapes which have been skinned and seeded, and three-fourths cup of shredded pineapple; season with a pinch of salt and two tablespoons of lemon-juice. Pour into a pound baking-powder tin and pack in ice and salt for two hours. Slice and serve on lettuce leaves.

SAVE DOLLARS AND HOURS

Hints from successful housewives

If you have discovered some clever little way to save time or labor or fuel or food, or anything else connected with housekeeping, tell us about it—and if we can use it in these columns we will pay you five dollars for it. Write on only one side of the paper and address your letter to The "Savers" Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. (If you wish to have your suggestion returned in case we can not use it, please enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope)

SAVE WORK IN REMOVING CORN-SILK

From a farm woman who was preparing dinner for a harvest crew, I learned a quick and successful way of removing the silk from ears of corn. She used a whisk-broom. First she removed the husks, then brushed the ears toward the stem end, and all the silk was removed with but a minimum amount of work.—M. P., Ithaca, N. Y.

Whisk off that persistent corn-silk with a stiff little broom or narrow brush

SAVE BUYING FRESH GASOLINE

Gasoline may be washed very satisfactorily. After having cleaned an article with gasoline, add to it an equal amount of water, shake the mixture well and then allow it to settle. Siphon or pour off the clean gasoline, which will rise to the top. A small amount of soda may be added to the water before it is mixed with the gasoline.—MRS. C. A. R., Oklahoma City, Okla.

SAVE TOMATOES BY USING APPLES

Tomatoes are scarce in our community and I have found that equal parts of tomatoes and apple-pulp make an excellent combination for catchup. If the apple is substituted in one's favorite recipe, the substitution can scarcely be detected.—MRS. R. L., Westbrook, Minn.

SAVE YOUR FEET

Take an old inner tube, cut into strips one and a half inches wide and weave into a rug to stand on while in the kitchen. It rests the feet because of the softness and the spring of the rubber. Fasten the ends with brads, rivets or even use rubber glue or puncture mender. I use the felt rug weave, but the different braiding can be used and put together with heavy cord. When dirty, they can be cleaned by turning the hose on them and left outdoors to dry.—MRS. A. W. B., Hayden, Colo.

SAVE BUYING PORCH-LAMPS

At a country auction I bought an apparently worthless old surrey for twenty-five cents. It had a pair of carriage-lamps on it, rusty but otherwise good. These I rubbed down, painted black, had wired for electricity and had installed on each side of the entrance door. They look exactly like a pair I saw in a window marked fifty dollars.—MRS. J. H., New Rochelle, N. Y.

SAVE THE LEFT-OVER ICE-CREAM

Very often when we have ice-cream a little is left over. The work of repacking before it melts is considerable. I have hit upon the plan of putting the left-over ice-cream before it melts into a small container which has a tight cover, such as a fruit-jar, and, after drawing the water out of the freezer, submerging this small container in the remaining ice. A little salt should be added. The ice-cream will usually keep frozen until the next meal and may be used à la mode as a part of the dessert.—M. W., Brawley, Calif.

SAVE BUYING A BATHING-SUIT

I saved the price of a woolen bathing-suit for my three-year-old son by using two pairs of old woolen hose, cutting off the feet and shaping armholes for the front with one stocking leg and the back of the suit with the other. I cut the neck slightly lower in front, making the seams come on the sides. There was plenty of material in the other pair of stockings for the trunks. My friends thought I had bought an expensive woolen suit.—MRS. L. A. S., Sterling, Kans.

SAVE BY USING INEXPENSIVE FOODS

These are some of the ways I feed my family on a small amount of money. They enjoy fried mush for breakfast and this is very inexpensive. I make the mush very thick and mold it in a bread-pan. In the morning I turn it out and slice it and sauté it on both sides. We split the slices and butter them. I can serve four breakfasts for three people on ten cents' worth of corn-meal and a half pound of butter. Sometimes I add pork sausage to the mush and do not use butter. I fry the sausage, add a pint and a half of water and a cup of corn-meal. This is molded after it is cooked and is sautéd the same as plain mush. Left-over potatoes make excellent dumplings. I also make head-cheese. This is very inexpensive and delicious.—MRS. C. M., St. Louis, Mo.

SAVE DRESSES FROM WRINKLING IN THE TRUNK

Stiff cardboard is an indispensable part of one's equipment if dresses and waists are to be packed in the trunk without being badly wrinkled. Fold and wrap blouses and dresses in tissue-paper. Tie each to a piece of cardboard which is slightly smaller than the space available in the trunk or case.—MRS. M. M. I., North Pitcher, N. Y.

SAVE CLEANING CAMP UTENSILS

In order to prevent soot from accumulating on the bottoms of utensils used in cooking over the wood fire, rub the bottoms of the utensils with soap before setting them over the fire. You will find they will wash off easily without scouring.—MRS. H. N. E., Santa Maria, Calif.

SAVE SIRUP FROM BOILING OVER

Grease the inside of the cooking vessel near the top and you will have little difficulty from preserves or candies or any other sugar solution boiling over.—MRS. B., Memphis, Tenn.

SAVE TRACKING MUD INTO THE HOUSE

Three vegetable brushes, one large and two smaller, are very useful in keeping mud from being tracked into the house. Place the larger one with the bristles upon the porch step and nail it securely. Set the two smaller ones up on edge on either side and close to the larger one. This makes an ideal cleaner for muddy or dusty shoes.—MRS. P. F. S., Twin Falls, Idaho.

How the richness of maple is mellowed in this syrup

Maple! What memories the very word awakens! Fragrant pancakes steaming before you—then the pouring and spreading of the syrup. Who can watch that golden flood of syrup without a thrill of expectation? It's only the most wonderful flavor that can make the taste all you long for—only the flavor of maple at its best.

It is to bring you the joy of maple in full measure that the art of blending sugars has been developed. The greatest skill and experience are needed to make the most of that rare, natural goodness for which maple is famous.

Today it is recognized that the Towle Process of blending—known only to the makers of Log Cabin Syrup—brings you maple in its most delicious form. It is for this reason that Log Cabin has become the favorite in millions of American homes—the largest selling high grade syrup in the world. Choice maple sugar from Canada and Vermont is combined in Log Cabin with granulated cane sugar in a way that wonderfully enhances and mellows the richness of the maple.

Your family will find a new delight in pancakes or Fried Mush when served with Towle's Log Cabin Syrup. Use it for Waffles, Hot Breads and French Toast, too.

Have you ever tried Maple Puff, Log Cabin Sundae or Cake Frosting? These are some of the many tempting foods that can be made easily with this syrup. To get the free set of 24 recipe cards just fill out and mail the coupon below.

Natalie. The lucky one would leave on her breast a fraternity pin as potent as an engagement ring.

Chet's mother started up-stairs just as he stood in front of his mirror conversing with people who existed only below his epiglottis. Outside the door Mrs. Taylor halted so abruptly that her glasses on a black cord fell from her startled gray eyes and rattled back to the spring holder.

In Chet's room she heard voices.

"Natalie, do you love me?"

"I've always loved you, Chet."

"And you don't like that big bozo, Wilmer Humes?"

"No. He's a wet smack. I loathe him!"

Mrs. Taylor shuddered.

"Then you'll marry me, Natalie?"

"Of course, I will—as soon as you come back from school ready for the great battle of life."

"Natalie, you've made me the happiest man in the world. I'm going to steal a kiss."

"Let the crime wave begin!"

Mrs. Taylor gasped. She raised her hand indignantly as if about to knock on the door. Then she paused, biting her lip. Chet ought to know better than to let Natalie visit him up-stairs unchaperoned. It wasn't conventional. "Oh, this younger generation! They do things so differently!" She turned away, exasperated.

NATALIE'S mother showed a different sort of concern that evening when she watched her daughter and Chet and Wilmer starting for the country-club dance.

"I don't like to have you driving along the roads too late at night, dear," said Mrs. Blakesley, a slim, gray-haired woman, whose hands played nervously on the veranda railing. "You know there have been hold-ups lately."

"I've got Chet and Wilmer with me," replied Natalie.

"They wouldn't do much good against a man with a gun."

"Oh, now," cut in Wilmer protestingly, "nobody's going to get away with that while I'm around. They might with Chet—he's always in a fog—but not with me."

"I suppose you'd bore him to death before he could shoot," returned Chet. Natalie laughed and let the car roll down the drive.

At the country club she was confronted by Mrs. Taylor.

"Natalie, I can't keep still a minute longer. I know, my dear, about you and Chester. Trust a mother's intuition!"

"I don't understand." Her dark eyes were puzzled.

"You know what I mean, child! Chester proposed to you and you accepted him. Now, what do you say?"

Natalie didn't know, but she thought it would be an interesting thing to find out. So she found Chet and asked him if he had something to say to her. Her smile encouraged him.

"Yes," he replied. He started to take her by the arm and lead her out to the moonlit lawn, but at that moment, just when he felt that never had the occasion been more propitious for him, Wilmer Humes cut in.

"My dance, Nat! Let's go!"

She went away on Wilmer's arm. When Chet approached them again he had no intention of eavesdropping, but the first words he heard rooted him to the spot behind a row of palms.

"What's this I just heard Mrs. Taylor telling your mother?" Wilmer demanded of Natalie. "You haven't gone and made a fool of yourself by getting engaged to Chet, have you?" Chet listened, amazed, while Wilmer went on with considerable heat. "He's not the man for you. He'll never get anywhere. He can't do anything. He's——"

"He's a better man than you are, Gunga Din!"

It was a silly retort, of course, but it came from behind the palms where Chet stood hidden. It came in a voice sufficiently ventriloquized to deceive Wilmer into thinking it was Natalie's. Besides, Wilmer was distracted at that moment, and the veranda was dimly lit. Also, at that moment, Natalie bent over to pick up her shimmering sapphire necklace, which had come unclasped and slipped to the floor, so that her head was lowered as the words reached Wilmer's ears. A look of dismay flashed across Wilmer's face.

"A woman wants a man who can protect her," he went on, "a man who doesn't——"

"Hate himself!" finished the voice.

Wilmer rose and stalked away.

ANOTHER partner claimed Natalie, so that it wasn't until the dance ended that Chet could get a word from her, and then he found himself in the up-stairs smoking-room drinking coffee with her and Wilmer and Emily Mason and Jimmy Higgins. All of the servants had gone to bed, except old Niles, the caretaker, who was down-stairs locking up the larder. Suddenly the door from the outside stairway opened and the nondescript figure of a man entered.

As he stepped into the light he revealed a gaunt face under a cap, an automatic in his hand, a threat in his voice.

"Not a peep out of anybody!"

There was a horrified gasp.

Chet was as much surprized as anybody, but he didn't show it. He noticed the man's dusty shoes, his grease-stained coat, and the several days' growth of beard on his face.

"Hands up, everybody!" The man swept his gun in an arc from Chet to Wilmer and Jimmy. The latter two complied, especially Wilmer, who stood with his back flat against the wall, his arms high above his head, his eyes wide and staring. It was useless to deny that he seemed scared stiff.

"Get ready to hand me that necklace, young lady," continued the thief, looking at Natalie. "Nobody will get hurt if you all keep your shirts on!" His eyes and his gun rested, surprized, on Chet, who still sat on the edge of the divan. He hadn't budged since the man came into the room. "Aren't you going to stick up your hands, kid? Or have I got to pop you?"

"Still Chet declined to obey. He sat there apparently as calm as if he had gone through all the dangers in the world and the repetition of one couldn't disturb him. He merely turned his head slightly toward the door to the next room, as if listening to voices in there. And at once voices in there began to sound.

The thief looked in that direction, too, and never thought of watching Chet's lips. Even if he had, he might not have detected the movement. He listened, and his jaw dropped at what he heard:

"Quick! Grab a golf-club."

"I got it. What've you?"

"A baseball bat. Where's Dick?"

"In the locker-room looking for his pistol. Where's Tom?"

"He's getting an ax. How about Phil?"

"He's gone for a shotgun. Here he comes now!"

"All ready! Let's bust in!"

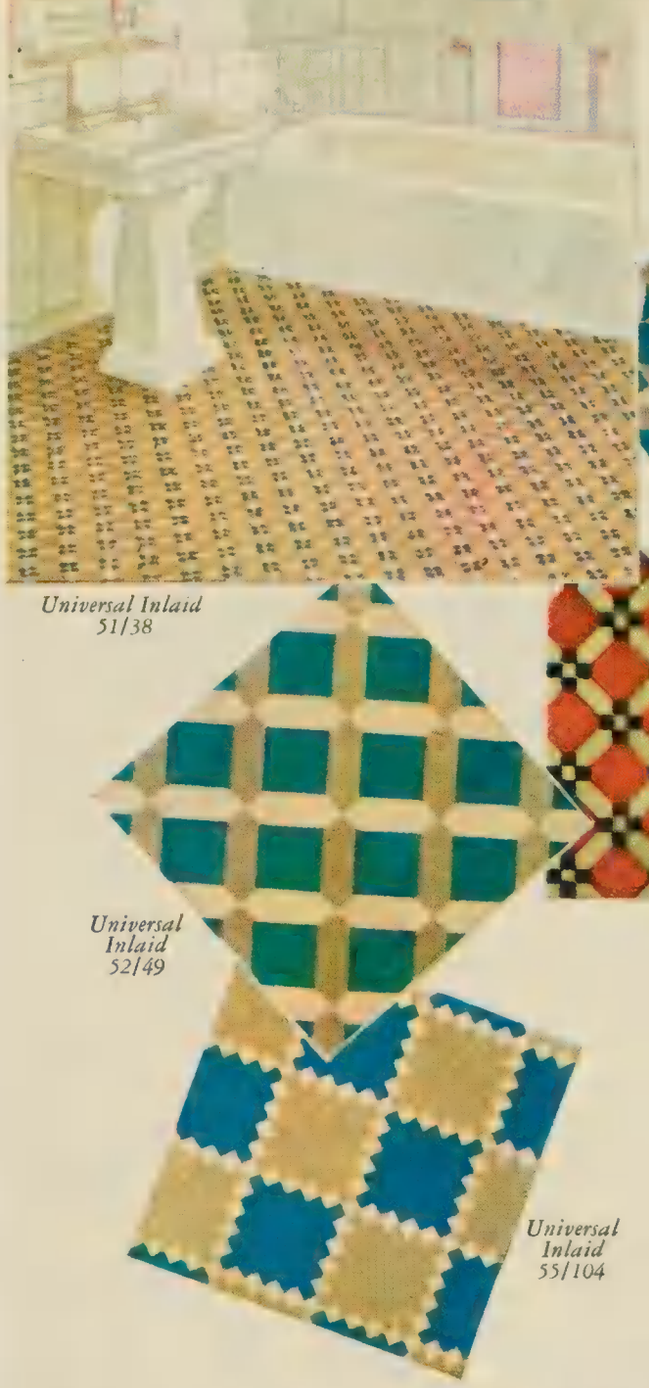
Before anybody came in, however, the thief decided to go out. Without plunder but with considerable panic, he backed to the outside door, wrenched it open, and darted out. The next moment his feet could be heard going down-stairs three steps at a time, taking the veranda in a jump, and running on the hard sod.

From the window, the occupants of the smoking-room saw the fleeing figure cross the golf-course and head for the railroad-tracks beyond, where freight-trains could be caught on short notice.

THE excitement stirred up by the visitor lasted for some time, chiefly because of the mystery of the rescue party, whose voices had been heard but whose presence never materialized. Even a search failed to find them, despite the fact that Wilmer Humes led the investigation. All he found, on coming back to the smoking-room, was Natalie kissing Chet. They had come to an understanding.

"Quick! Grab a golf-club," repeated Chet, and the others became aware of the rescue party's identity.

They surrounded Chet and demanded repeated performances of his new art. They made him know at last the elated feeling of occupying the center of the stage.



Wilmer tried to curtail Chet's triumph by coming forward with Natalie's coat, but Chet took it out of his surprized hands.

"Let me hold it for Natalie." And then he added meaningly, "Your arms must be tired!"

FIFTY YEARS AGO

WHEN HEINZ WAS JUST BEGINNING—

More than fifty years ago, when the house of Heinz was yet young, women were just as proud of their skill in cooking, and their well-kept kitchens, as are the women of today.

But today's housewife has advantages unknown fifty years ago. She is helped by devices that simplify her work. Foods all ready to serve are at her instant command. Services by outside organizations are always available.

These give her more time for other activities while enabling her to maintain the old-time standards of housekeeping.

In the realm of foods she knows how faithfully the highest of all standards are perpetuated in the Heinz kitchens.

Here foods are carried in glass and silver lined containers. Flowers bloom in every window. Sunlight floods every nook and corner. Competent girls in immaculate costumes, and with faultless hands, preside over every operation.

Knowing this, she serves Heinz 57 Varieties with the same confidence in their purity and flavor that her grandmother had in the foods prepared in her own kitchen.

A block or two from the library was a little delicatessen, where its owner, a wide-smiling old Frenchwoman, ministered in a back room to forlorn exiled countrymen with chicken cooked in rice and soup thick with mushrooms and certain pungent sauces.

Hi Smith, who relished French cooking as a doughboy, had discovered Madame Grevy.

"And I wouldn't bring any one but you, not if they were blindfolded," he told Claire over the red-cloth-covered table.

It was a perfect place in which to discuss the novel—Hi Smith's novel—for Claire easily sidetracked any mention of her own. They talked only of the novel that night.

"But you'll come again," he said eagerly as they parted in front of the library.

"I'd love to," said Claire.

"I'll be looking for you every night," he said.

A FEW evenings later, Claire had dinner with A. C. Jenkins. He had been regarding her thoughtfully of late, and, indeed, the change in her would have mystified a Buddha. Since the evening with Hi Smith, she had a pervasive glow, as though a candle were lighted in her depths. "Magnetism, that's what she has," old A. C. was heard to mutter.

They dined in the marble-and-onyx splendor of a big hotel with its orchestra and its splashing fountain. It was fun, but not so much fun as Madame Grevy's.

A. C. began by talking business—of the Chicago office shortly to be opened. When the talk became more personal, she had resource to Item 6.

"Oh, I've seen life—my schooling was fragmentary but quite complete—my views are not orthodox, but my ethics are sound, I trust—I'm more familiar with France than with America."

Her ethics were so sound that she was troubled by that last.

"You're pretty much a woman of the world," said A. C. at last, with a speculative expression.

"I trust I am," said Claire and laughed and twirled a cigaret. But she wasn't a woman of the world with Hi. She was a child, and he was another. "Mes enfants," Madame Grevy called them. How they chattered over her red-spread table, how they thrilled over the movies they attended, how they adventured on the country hikes which soon became established Sunday customs!

The snow-banks melted to gurgling streams; pussy-willows blurred in the hollows; the first shivering robin redbreast was discerned upon a twig. Spring came on, and as other girls have done before her, Claire grew prettier and prettier with the awakening and blooming of the earth.

A. C. Jenkins instituted luncheon conferences. One day over new peas in timbales he gave her a raise.

"You have changed, Miss Goodwin, and greatly to your advantage," he said in explanation.

Claire leaped for Item 6.

"Perhaps," she hinted darkly. "I had had a great sorrow. I may not have been quite myself when I came to your office."

A. C. digested that.

"I believe that's the case," he said.

Late one afternoon he came to her desk.

"Ross Gray from the Chicago territory is in town," he said. "It is important that you should learn conditions there, and his time is very limited. Would you take dinner with us? And perhaps we can get to the theater afterward."

"Of course. How delightful!" said Claire.

She was a little heady that night. It can not be denied. Here was a reward for endless gymnastics before a chilly window, for tedious hours in the shops.

She looked well. She talked well. She displayed poise, intelligence and charm. She could not avoid awareness of this, and she was not surprised when A. C. came to her next day at the early Saturday closing hour.

"Ross Gray says that you're a darned attractive girl."

She was pleased and might have stayed so if A. C. had told her just that and gone away, but he did not. He stood there looking at her. He looked so long and so intently that a chill seemed to strike her. There was a look in his eyes—why, she hadn't known that anything but business could give him that look. The chill settled fearfully about her heart.

"Miss Goodwin," he said at last.

"Yes," she answered.

"I have something to ask you."

"Yes."

Impatiently he jerked out his watch.

"Hang it, I have to go. Conference with Gray. Will you come to my private office the first thing Monday morning?" As he moved away he turned and added with ill-concealed excitement, "The conference may affect your whole future!"

THE conference may affect your whole future! That meant that her race was run. But none of the expected elation flowed in upon Claire with his words. She stared after his retreating figure as though she were seeing the future—the future with A. C.—the future without Hi.

The walls of the office seemed crowding upon her—nightmarishly, smotheringly close. She lifted her hands to push them away, a frightened protesting sob forcing itself from her throat. But abruptly her cheeks flushed and she dropped her hands into her lap.

For she had a gallant code, born of much reading, perhaps. Remember that her childhood companions had been King Arthur's knights. Some lofty conception of honor held her hands motionless now. Hadn't A. C. been quite indifferent to her? Hadn't she, with cold deliberation, set about to charm him? Hadn't she, quite consciously, awakened that gleam in his eyes?

She had, and she would take her medicine. She had, and she would renounce Hi Smith and joy and youth and love. Claire pressed her hot palms fiercely against her tear-wet eyes, then snatched her hat and coat and ran out into the Spring.

There would, of course, be Sunday—doubtless their last day together. She would enjoy it, she vowed, down to the last fraction of a second, down to that ever-tightening pressure of hands with which they parted.

When he met her, Sunday morning, on the steps of the rooming-house, she was gay as the puff-ball clouds in the wide, blue, windy sky. Her cap and scarf and sweater were vivid cowslip yellow. Her smile was like a blown kiss.

"I want a happy day for a very special reason," she hailed him, swinging her kit.

"So do I," he answered, his eyes fleetingly grave. "Do you mind my being such a tramp?"

"I—I like you in awful clothes," said Claire. She touched the old army sweater. She touched it with the lightest, most flippant of fingers, but he turned and looked at her. A frightened delicious faintness ran down her body.

A day in the country in Spring! And the small events which mark the progress of the day! How they transmute themselves, with lovers, into rare golden adventures!

Claire held her misery back with laughter. Hi too seemed to be strung to a tense pitch of happiness. It was only when the smoke of their camp fire met the blue smoke of early evening that melancholy descended on them.

"I didn't think it would end," said Claire on their homeward walk, breaking a silence which had lasted half an hour.

Hi did not answer. On the steps of the old lodging-house he took her hand in parting. And that touch was too much for them both. Swiftly as a star falls, she was caught into his arms—with pounding heart she was giving back his kisses.

"Claire!" he cried in triumph. "You do love me. I was so afraid to ask. You'll marry me, dear, and be mine forever."

"No, no, no!" said Claire. She pulled herself away.

Their eyes strained through the sweet May darkness. Claire groped for words to tell him what she must. She drew farther and farther away. If he put out his hand——

"I—I can't marry you," she said. "I must never see you again."

"What do you mean?" His voice hardened. "You can't say you don't love me, after this. You do love me, don't you?"

"Yes," said Claire.

"Then you'll marry me."

"I won't. I—can't."

She darted in at the door and up the stairs. After a long time thoughts began pricking

Bad Teeth May Bring Crippling Rheumatism

Health and Happiness, Authorities Say, Depend on Tooth Care

The importance of preventive dentistry can't be overstated. Perhaps it may seem absurd to attribute rheumatism or melancholia to poor teeth. But science has proved the connection.

If you doubt this, ask your dentist.

Use Colgate's

It removes causes of tooth decay

GOOD TEETH and good health are usually companions. Good looks, too, are dependent to a large extent on your teeth.

Preventive dentistry—preventing disease by combating tooth troubles—is the new health move. Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream has always been in the forefront of this move for better teeth and health.

"Washes",—does not Scour

Colgate's is a preventive dental cream. It removes causes of tooth decay by "washing" your teeth safely. Colgate's contains no harsh grit, no dangerous drugs.

Its function is not to cure, but to cleanse and protect. The taste of Colgate's is delicious. And its price is as pleasant as its taste—only 25c for the large tube.

WHAT DO CHARMING PEOPLE TALK ABOUT?

Almost everything in the world! Take Mrs. Jarvis, for instance, who is so tremendously sought after. Lots of women are better looking than she, in spite of her hair, but she is so amusing, so entertaining, so amazingly at ease in all conversational paths that people simply insist on being wherever she is.

"How does she do it?" her friends are apt to sigh. She does it by the wisest possible use of leisure hours—and half hours. That is, she candidly admits that the constant reading of HARPER'S MAGAZINE is the way she manages to keep in touch with the many and varied fields of modern thought.

Harper's Magazine is particularly suited to the intellectual needs of the educated woman of today—the kind of reader who has little time and less patience for second-rate reading. Each issue contains:—

THE BEST OF TODAY'S FICTION AND POETRY

Harvey O'Higgins — Aldous Huxley
Shiela Kaye-Smith — Wilbur D. Steele
Amy Lowell — G. K. Chesterton

EXHILARATING CRITICISM

G. Bernard Shaw — Rebecca West
Ernest Boyd — Heywood Broun
Hilaire Belloc — J. B. Priestly

INSPIRING EDUCATIONAL STUDIES

Dallas Lore Sharp — Burges Johnson
Bertrand Russell — Rollo Walter Brown

FEARLESS SOCIAL AND POLITICAL ARTICLES

Ludwig Lewisohn — Duncan Aikman
Walter Lippmann — Charles Merz
A. G. Gardiner — James H. Robinson

BRILLIANT HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY

Philip Guedalla — Gamaliel Bradford
Jerome K. Jerome — Jesse R. Grant

SPIRITED TALES OF TRAVEL AND EXPLORATION

William McFee — Katharine F. Gerould
H. M. Tomlinson — E. Alexander Powell

And, remember, the less free time you have—the greater the demands made by your family, your home, your profession, so much the more do you owe it to your own enjoyment and the pleasure of others in your company, to retain that intellectual curiosity which keeps you eternally ageless and infinitely varied.

LOVE'S DAILY DOZEN

through the opiate of her pain. Old A. C.—she had made him care when she didn't care back—that was what had been wrong—that was why she must suffer. Now, if it had been Hi, she might have used any art, for she could give back love for the love she had awakened. If it had been Hi—but she mustn't follow that. She must brace herself for to-morrow morning, for the conference which would affect her whole future. Claire rose and stood straight as an Indian.

She was still straight as an Indian, but very much a paleface, when she came into A. C. Jenkins's office on Monday morning.

"You're not feeling well," said A. C., inspecting her keenly.

"Oh, quite, thank you." Claire forced a stiff smile and sat down by his desk.

He leaned back in the swivel chair, crossing his stubby legs, and continued to regard her with intent green eyes.

"I have an offer to make you," he said. "I wouldn't have made it three months ago."

"I know that," Claire thought bitterly.

"I want you," he proceeded, "to appreciate the honor it implies. You are technically only a stenographer—" Interpreting as resentment her suddenly startled look, he added hastily, "—though you've been carrying full secretarial duty, I admit."

Claire fixed her eyes on a calendar on the wall. She would go through with it. She would! But she had not dreamed that he would be so condescending. A. C. cleared his throat and leaned toward her. "Well, well, I'll come to the point," he said.

Claire braced herself with tightly knotted hands. He had that exalted, concentrated look with which he put over business deals. It stabbed her through with guilt.

"I want you, my dear Miss Goodwin," he began. She closed her eyes the better to endure it. "—to take full charge of the Chicago office!"

A cold shower on a sweltering August noon! A long, long fall from some hideous dream! Claire cried out, looked about her and jumped up. Life and bright color flowed back into her cheeks, her curving lips.

"No, no!" she cried in a ringing, joyous voice. "Thank you, Mr. Jenkins. I can't."

"You can't!" His voice bellowed wrathful indignation.

"No. You see, I am going to be married."

"You are! When?"

"Oh, soon."

With the words came a fear that perhaps she would not be forgiven. But, ah, now she could try! With Hi Smith she could use all her arts and still have the Lord on her side.

She paused in her flight to say contritely: "I do thank you. It was kind of you to think of me. If it weren't for my other plans——"

And then she was out of the office. She would run away—run to Hi——

But Hi ran into her, in the passageway leading to her desk.

"You here? You?" she cried, her voice spilling gladness like the little waterfall they had found the day before.

"Of course," he answered, and he caught hold of her arm with a grip so hard that it hurt. "I got to thinking it over, and I decided I would be a mollycoddle all right if I let you get away after you admitted that you loved me. You did admit it, Claire. Now, you get this straight. You're my girl, and you're going to marry me."

Claire just gave herself into his enveloping arms.

" 'Course I am," she crooned.

OVER the chicken and rice at Madame Grevy's that noon Hi volunteered:

"It really began, I think, the night I told you to reread 'Vanity Fair.' "

"Yes, it did," said Claire, and suddenly she laughed. Why, Thackeray was right, after all. What had he said? A woman with fair opportunities and without an absolute hump may marry whom she likes.

"Whom she loves," said Claire aloud, to Hi Smith's mystification.

EMERGENCIES OF CHILDHOOD

emetics. Their action can be hastened by tickling the throat or pushing a finger down the throat. The next step is to neutralize the effect of the poison and to make its action harmless. The doctor will bring the chemical antidote, which differs with different poisons. After vomiting, the mouth and stomach can be soothed by milk, raw whites of eggs, flaxseed tea or thick barley water.

THE habit children have of placing things in the mouth often results in their swallowing all kinds of articles. If these happen to be marbles, buttons, beads, coins or anything small and without a sharp point or edge, there is no need for alarm, as they will pass through without damage if no cathartics be given. But the first thought of the mother when a foreign body has been swallowed is to rush for the castor-oil bottle. This is the one thing not to do. Sometimes open safety-pins, glass and sharp articles are swallowed, and a cathartic pushes the article through too quickly, and injures the delicate lining of the stomach and intestines.

The best treatment is to coat the article with food and allow it to pass slowly through the bowels. This is accomplished by feeding thick cereals, potato or bread. If a sharp object like a fish-bone or pin lodge in the throat, the child should be suspended with the head down, and the back should be slapped in an effort to dislodge the article. If it lodges high in the throat, an effort should be made to dislodge the object, and to pull it out with the finger and thumb.

If a child starts to cough or takes a quick deep breath while having some small article in his mouth the object may be drawn into the lungs. This is a very serious matter. A specialist should be called at once

Children seem to like to shove peas, beans, shoe-buttons and such things into their ears. If any of these objects enter the ear canal, its removal should be left to the physician. Syringing with warm water may help, but do not try to remove the article forcibly.

Children not infrequently push small objects up into the nose. They may have observed the mother cleanse the baby brother's nose, but it is hard to explain the psychology of or pleasure in this act. They are apt to forget the presence of the object, or be afraid to mention it. In a short time the nostril in which it has been placed will become inflamed and a copious and foul-smelling discharge result. A one-sided and persistent nasal discharge suggests always a foreign body, which only a physician should attempt to remove.

There are few things more irritating or more painful than a small cinder or foreign body in the eye. Rubbing the eye increases the irritation and aggravates the condition. Nature attempts to wash away the offending object by a copious flow of tears. If this be not successful, the under surface of the upper and lower lids must be examined, and the foreign body removed gently with a moistened camel's-hair brush or a corner of a clean handkerchief. If not removed by these simple measures, an oculist should be consulted at once. In the meantime the eye can be bathed with a solution of boric acid (one teaspoon to a pint of water). This should be freely used with a small glass eye-cup.

Earache in children is quite common and very painful. A child may go to bed with only a slight cold in his head, and wake up suddenly with an intense and acute pain. This pain is hard to relieve and is increased on pressing the front or back of the ear or pulling out the lobe. Older children will locate the source of the pain, but babies and young children are not able to do so, although occasionally they may place a hand over the seat of the pain. The pain may subside after a few hours and continue with intermissions for several days. Never neglect an earache, as there is always a possibility of a mastoid abscess developing. The best way to relieve the pain is by a hot-water douche made of boric acid—one teaspoon to one pint of hot water. If the pain persists, a physician should be called.

Nothing causes more alarm or requires prompter or more intelligent treatment than convulsions or spasms. They are comparatively common among children under two years of age, because the brain and nervous system are not fully developed. Very slight disturbances of the bowels and stomach may produce convulsions. High fever from any cause will often produce this trouble in young children. In the case of children under five years of age it is exceedingly difficult to diagnose convulsions as due to epilepsy. A convulsion may usher in an acute illness. It is well to remember that a child very rarely dies in a convulsion. The best treatment is to lay the child on the bed, loosen the clothing, put ice-water on the head and warmth to the feet. An enema should be given as soon as possible. One or two quarts of soapy water can be used in the fountain syringe. The child should not be moved. The expelled water can be run on a rubber sheet or on some newspapers.

These are some of the more frequent emergencies during childhood for which the mother should be prepared. When in doubt as to the extent of the accident or injury, she should immediately summon a doctor. Mothers who are able to meet these emergencies with clear head and ready hands will prevent suffering, and even save lives. Of such Solomon in his wisdom speaks:

"She looketh well to the ways of her household
Her children rise up and call her blessed."

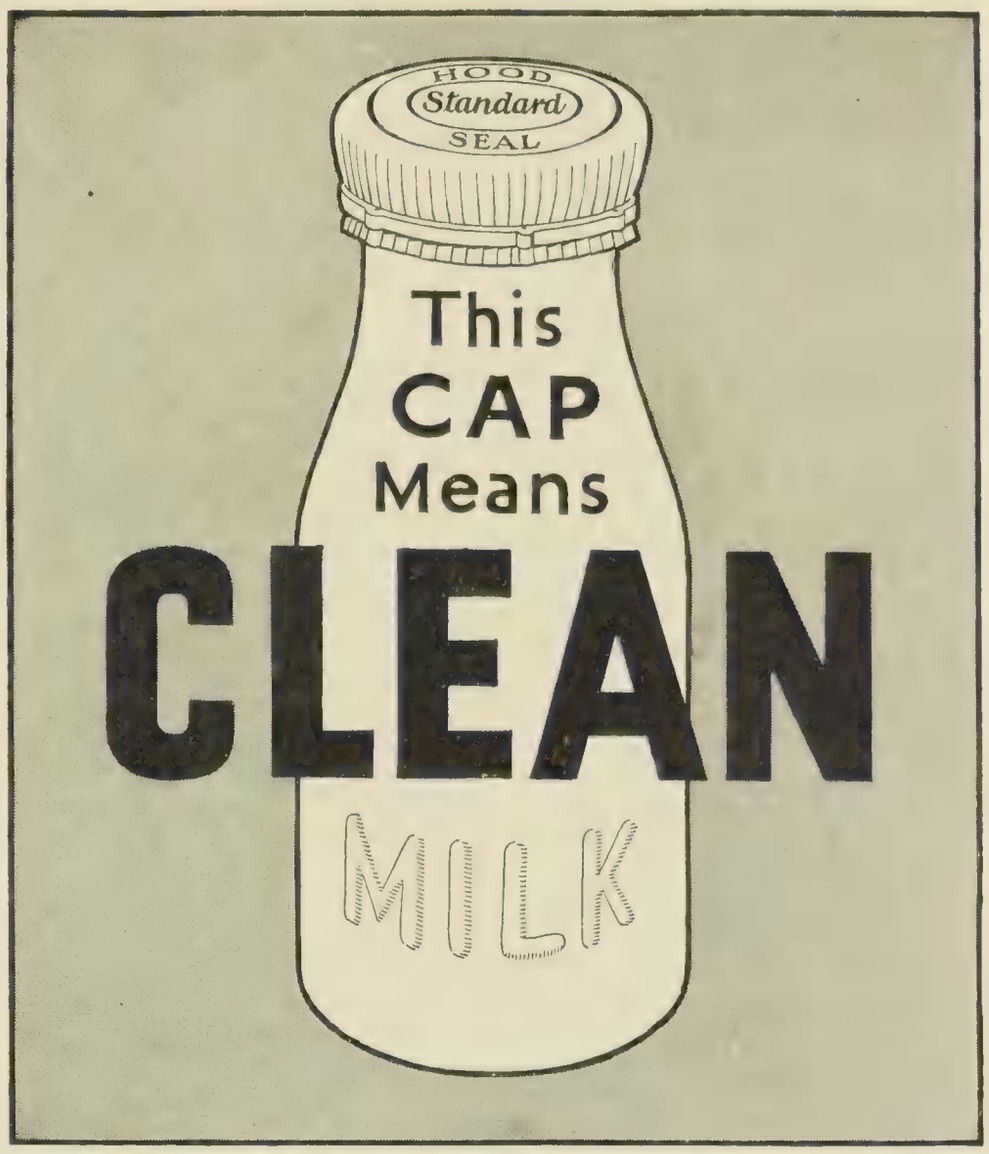
reckoning with this impulse, and that Marxism, with its loud outcry against individual wealth as an unsocial possession, will forever break itself in vain against the impregnable rock of this law of nature.

But father-love has its tragedies also. A son's ingratitude to his father, still more his deliberate hostility, is perhaps the cruelest stab the father-heart can suffer. It has been truly described as sharper than a serpent's tooth, and no human experience has ever found more penetrating expression. I have always thought the fragment of the German ballad of Hildebrand, in which the warrior father has to face the alternative of being killed by his son or of killing his son and thus cutting off his line, the most moving thing in literature except one—the story of the war between David and Absalom. I place that higher as tragedy than anything in Æschylus or Sophocles or Shakespeare. Deeper in human emotion it seems impossible to go than those closing scenes in which Absalom, having stolen the heart of the people from the king, takes up arms against him, and is killed, and then the news of his death is brought home to his father.

"And the King said to Gushi, Is the young man, Absalom, safe? And Gushi answered, The enemies of my lord the King, and all that rise against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man is.

"And the King was much moved; and went up to the chamber above the gate and wept; and as he went thus, he said, O, my son, Absalom, my son Absalom! Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!"

Such, then, is father-love. In the scheme of human things it is, like mother-love, a part of God's own way of carrying on His world and of holding His children together. But aside from ingratitude and open strife, there is a tragedy in father-love which enters into nearly every family. No son ever loves his father as his father loves his son. It is not in nature that he should do so. The love which his father bears to him he can bear only to his own children. The reason is clear: Nature must look forward, not backward, or the race would come to an end. We who are fathers have to reconcile ourselves to that. But we may console ourselves with the thought that without father-love, going before, asking nothing, only cheered and comforted if out of greatness of heart in our children something sometimes come back to us, the world itself could not go on.



LOOK, finally, at the love of man and woman. The world is full of the books that have been written on this subject, and of the writing of further books there is still no end. But the secret that lies at the heart of the master passion of humanity, the passion whereby humanity exists, seems to have eluded everybody. Where is it born? By what qualities is it created? Is it intended to be monogamous and life-long, or polygamous and temporary? Above all, how does it come to pass that a man should choose one woman out of all the world of women to be his wife and the mother of his children, and thereby, it may be, the mother of untold generations? Is it under the unconscious operation of divine selection, as Browning seemed to think, or by the mere freak of chance, the accident of class, race and environment, the unnoticed necessity which unites the creatures of the field when they are driven pell-mell into the same pen?

The prophets, the poets, the dramatists and the novelists of the ages give us little or no light on that great problem. "Love is heaven and heaven is love," says Walter Scott, meaning the love of man and woman. But that does not carry us far. "Loving goes by haps; some, Cupid kills by arrows, some by traps," says Shakespeare. But that does not carry us much farther. "We know a man is in love," says Balzac, "when the dropping of a woman's glove is more important to him than the fall of an empire." But that gives us a humorous picture of one of love's charming delusions—nothing more. "The true season of love," says Goethe. "is when we believe that we alone can love, that no one could ever have loved so before us, and that no one will ever love in the same way again." That is an amusing illustration of the delicious selfishness and folly of love, but nothing else, and the origin of the love passion still evades us.

"I wonder what he saw in her?" is a common expression. It is also a foolish one. In "the true season of love" it would be beyond the wisdom of Solomon for any man to see why any other man should have married any other woman than the woman he married himself. Merit has usually nothing to do with man's choice; virtue has nothing to do with it; and in the long run even beauty has nothing to do with it. "All true love," says Richter, "is founded on esteem." But love has been known to live where esteem has been absent. "Solid love," says Erasmus, "whose root is virtue, can no more die than love itself." But love and virtue have often parted company and died in separate beds. "Beauty," says Fielding, "may be the object of liking; great qualities of admiration; good ends of esteem; but love only is the object of love." Does it come to this, then, that in the making of the mighty passion which governs the world, which dominates the species, which decides the fate of nations, the touch of a hand and the glance of an eye are more potent than all the qualities of mind and heart put together?

I do not know that anything better has been said on the origin and nature of the passion of love than was said by Harriet Martineau, of all people: "Is love to be treated with levity as a mere illusion? Or with coarseness as a mere impulse? Or with fear as a mere disease? Or with shame as a mere weakness? Or is it to be looked upon as a great mystery which lies at the foundation of human existence, morality and happiness—necessary, universal, inevitable and certain as death?"

Love, the love of man for woman and of woman for man, is a mystery of natural law. Marriage, truly contracted and properly protected, is an institution based on a pure and lofty law of nature which God made at the beginning, when He created male and female, and which has since established the home, founded the family, built up the nation, been the chief agent in the progress of civilization, and become, perhaps, the strongest bulwark of religion.

The hood and seal that protects the entire top of the bottle is the modern and 100% safe method of keeping milk and bottle clean. Protection in this practical form was invented and developed by Mr. O. N. Tevander, head of the organization you are urged to write

A Nation-Wide Campaign to Keep Pure Milk Pure

NINE HUNDRED dairymen are sponsoring a movement which you should join—for it concerns you most of all. It's a measure of precaution that carries the chain of cleanliness and purity through to your table. A simple invention now hoods and seals the entire top of the bottle. You may have noticed its almost universal use in the case of extra grades of milk and cream—on certified milk—on milk for babies. But should any milk for human consumption be less carefully purveyed, less carefully poured? Nine hundred dairymen think not. Many dairies hood and seal every bottle. This prudence will soon be general practice—if not a law!

WHAT USE is scientific precaution at the source, if householders pour clean milk from a bottle whose mouth has become soiled? What of the dust and dirt and germs that settle on unprotected bottle tops? They mingle with the milk. But this danger is easily avoided. All your milk and cream may be protected absolutely from contaminating contacts. From human hands. From exposure to dirt. From all the things that should not touch milk.

A GLORIOUS STATE of health usually rewards those who drink plenty of pure milk daily. But be sure it is pure. Doubtful milk is a menace. Good milk is as good for adults as for babies and children. If people all knew this way of insuring purity, perhaps they would drink more milk. We would be a stronger and healthier nation if they did! Health authorities are all agreed on that.

LOOK at the picture. A milk bottle with entire top protected from harm. This seal goes on at the dairy. A sterile seal that stays sealed until you take it off—with a flip of the finger. You may replace the hood, but not the ring—so any previous removal or tampering would be instantly detected. Known as the Standard method of sealing, it is a method which is bound to become standard with everybody.

VOTE for this protection for your own household. The coupon will bring you a most interesting and valuable book about Milk and its uses. Dairymen will want the special information their coupon will bring them.

Mennen's for the Tiny Toddler

BABY has grown up! That chubby, winsome bit of loveliness which was fondled and nurtured and cherished so dearly has now slipped from mother's lap and learned to walk.

Very often, mother's attention is centered on a new little brother or sister and, from nursery to kindergarten days, the tiny toddler is neglected.

Yet a child's skin is almost as delicate as a baby's and must be cleansed and powdered just as carefully.

Bath-water, if left in the skin-folds, causes colds and painful chapping of the skin. Each fleck of Mennen Borated Talcum is as drying as a dainty fairy sponge. Swiftly, gently, it absorbs all dangerous moisture.

Active, frisky little bodies perspire freely and chafe easily. This soft, pure powder forms a cooling film over the body, preventing the rubbing of tight clothes against sensitive flesh and muscles.

Almost every day, cuts and bruises and scratches come into the lives of healthy, romping youngsters. Every break in the skin is a source of infection. So Mennen's is made not only mild and pure, but wonderfully healing and antiseptic as well.

Mothers! don't neglect the tiny toddler. You have Mennen's right in the nursery—in the familiar blue can. Just fluff it all over the little shaver after his morning dip and before you tuck him in for the night. He'll love it. He's just hankering for a little, old-time coddling.

For your own use, or for some other young mother, send the coupon below for The Mennen Baby Book. It is called the most helpful book on babies ever written. It costs only 25c postpaid in plain wrapper.

bread while it is warm. Cool it quickly, placing it on a rack or crosswise of the tin so the air can circulate freely. When it is cool and dry, wrap each loaf in clean new waxed paper. Do not put fresh bread in a container with old bread. Scald and sun the bread-box once a week and if any bread molds in it in the meantime always scald the box well before using it again. If the outside of a loaf has begun to mold, cut away and discard the moldy section and bake the remainder of the loaf in a moderately hot oven (350 degrees Fahrenheit) ten or fifteen minutes.

Bread and cake are sometimes spoiled for use by drying out. Dry bread may be used in many ways, but if it is needed just as bread it may be freshened. If the loaf has not been sliced, moisten it slightly, place it in a bread-tin and bake in a moderately hot oven (350 degrees Fahreheit) ten or fifteen minutes. Rolls or parts of loaves may be freshened by putting them into a paper bag after they are moistened and heating them in the oven.

If cookies or cake have become hard or dry, place them in a box with the bread and they will quickly soften.

As soon as a supply of fruit is brought into the house, look it over to see its condition. With fruits like peaches, pears, plums, oranges, apples, sort carefully and wrap each piece in paper and put in a cool, dry place.

If the supply of fresh fruits such as berries or cherries is larger than can be eaten raw before it spoils and if it is not large enough to can or preserve, the small quantity may be saved by being made into the fresh-fruit sauce so common in a fruit country like California. The fruit is cooked up quickly with a little sugar and sometimes a little water until the mixture just boils well.

Lemon-juice is an aid in keeping sliced apples, pears and peaches from the discoloring which makes the fruit unattractive and spoils its flavor.

Lettuce, spinach and other vegetables wilt and are wasted. Lettuce will keep well if a little of the stem is cut off and the stem end placed in water. The head may well be covered with a wet cloth. Uncovered lettuce should never be placed where there is a circulation of air as the leaves will quickly wilt from evaporation. After lettuce has been cleaned, it may be kept successfully in a cool or cold place if wrapped in a wet cheese-cloth bag or if placed in a bowl well covered with a plate.

Spinach keeps best if freshened in water and cleaned as soon as it comes from the market and if it is then treated in the same way as lettuce.

Roots and all other vegetables which have wilted and become soft can be restored by soaking them for some hours in water.

If egg-yolks are left over after making angel food and they are unbroken, they may be covered with water and will keep several days. Or a wet cloth may be placed over the bowl containing them. It should be kept wet.

If egg-yolks are broken, they should be beaten until slightly frothy and then the bowl containing them should be covered with a cloth kept wet.

Brown sugar or maple sugar which has become so hard as to be useless except for sirup may be softened by being placed in a crock with one or more apples, or even by being placed in with the bread in a bread-box.

Without doubt cleanliness is the greatest aid in preventing the spoilage of food. Carefully scalding all dishes, keeping the refrigerator clean and occasionally scalding it, scalding and sunning the bread-box and any other storage containers frequently must be the standard of the home-maker who would reduce the loss by food spoilage to a minimum. Cleanliness in these respects as well as personal cleanliness, the use of clean towels and dish-cloths, the generous use of soap and washing the hands before handling food are decided aids in delaying or preventing the spoilage of foods.

where the sun shone. And she had a canary, a gay gold little fellow who hung in the sunshine and sang all day long and was the only help Mrs. Becker ever had at Fitzgerald Mansion to keep herself still like a fresh little apple—still young, pink and smiling.

In the evenings it was a usual and always a very striking thing to see Mr. Fitzgerald, with his only pet, Mishmer the peacock, beside him, walking down the wide drive, the man's thin hands clasped behind his back, the bird's tail spread in gorgeous purple and green—each one as absorbed in his own aristocracy as the other. If ever of an evening Mr. Fitzgerald failed to come out, Mishmer would track with awkward feet through the dark library and drawing-room, dragging his tail after him, looking for Mr. Fitzgerald till he found him. It was an odd companionship—but a natural one—two creatures so selfish, so very alike.

There was seldom anything happening out of the every-day order in Fitzgerald Mansion, but one day something did happen that—though seeming at the time to amount to very little—proved to be one of those things which God in His wisdom brings about in His own way as simply as in His own way He brings oaks from tiny acorns falling.

The gay gold canary was too happy!

During the dinner-hour one evening the little creature suddenly burst into a trilling song. Mr. Fitzgerald heard it—and Mr. Fitzgerald was annoyed. The easiest mistake in the whole wide world is that of speaking too quickly.

"Becker," Mr. Fitzgerald had said, "I should prefer to have Mrs. Becker do without that bird. Please speak to her."

The next day, just after luncheon, Becker approached his employer respectfully.

"May I speak to you, sir, about the missus and me—leaving?" he began.

Mr. Fitzgerald stopped half-way to the door.

"Leaving!" he said shortly. "For what reason?"

Becker cleared his throat behind a nervous hand. "It's an idea of the missus, sir," he tried to explain. "Since you asked her to do without the canary, sir, begging your pardon, she says it is getting she and me too old where there isn't no youth, nor no life, sir, she says. So she's found a situation where there's children, sir, to be about and cook for, and where the canary'd be welcome, so we'd like to be leaving, sir."

"You may tell Mrs. Becker to keep the canary if she is better pleased," Mr. Fitzgerald replied.

"Thank you, sir," Becker answered, "but I think it's the children appealed to her most, after she missed the canary and considered her lonesomeness, sir."

"Send Mrs. Becker to the library," Mr. Fitzgerald said, and left Becker standing there.

IN THE library the tall old man stopped before an oil-painting of his handsome son. He heard Mrs. Becker come across the floor—with shoes trying respectfully not to squeak. Mrs. Becker was the only good cook he had ever had. She had brought him out of indigestion nine years before (when she and Becker had come to him) and had kept him out of it ever since. The entire system of Mr. Fitzgerald's day revolved around three meals cooked by Mrs. Becker.

"Mrs. Becker," he said briefly, "as to your leaving me. If the canary is returned, and I arranged to have—" he smiled a little stiffly—"to have a child in the house—you and Becker would be satisfied to remain, I suppose?"

Mrs. Becker stared at him.

"A child in the house, sir!" she repeated,

Why some women look ten years younger than others of the same age

You have met such women. You have wondered at their youthfulness . . . .

Now Science tells us that one outstanding cause of our looking older than we are —or younger—is diet.

Reasonable, isn't it? Reasonable that the food which nourishes our bodies—which creates our vitality—should influence, to a very great degree, our appearance?

And our food influences us rightly or wrongly, toward health or illness, toward youthfulness or age, in accordance with the value of the elements it contains.

This delightful food was planned, in every particular, to give you exactly what you need!

WE KNOW, now, that a deficiency of any one of the basic food elements affects us seriously.

If a food expert planned every meal, we could preserve the right balance in our diet. But we can't all be food experts. And we can no longer trust our appetites. They have been pampered. They have lost the instinct to choose the right food.

It was to overcome this fault that Grape-Nuts was originated—a food designed, deliberately, to give elements we need: dextrins, maltose and other carbohydrates for heat and energy, iron for the blood, phosphorus for the teeth and bones, protein for muscle and body-building, and the essential vitamin-B —a builder of the appetite! Eaten with milk or cream, Grape-Nuts is an admirably balanced ration.

Pour just a little into a bowl—two tablespoonfuls are enough—and fill the space beside it with cream. Chew it slowly. Enjoy to the utmost the rich, nut-like flavor of this wonderful food.

Grape-Nuts is rich in nourishment. If you prefer a small breakfast, it gives you the energy for a difficult morning. If you start the day with a heavier meal, eat Grape-Nuts for the essential elements. Then turn to other foods with a ready appetite.

A special baking process prepares Grape-Nuts for digestion—makes it possible for you to get the essential food elements with the least digestive effort.

And this a crisp food—a food you will like to chew. It gives your teeth and gums the exercise which every dentist so urgently recommends.

Grape-Nuts is one of the Post Health Products, which include also Instant Postum, Postum Cereal, Post Toasties (Double-thick Corn Flakes), and Post's Bran Flakes.

Colorful Cottage Furnishings

not believing her own words. "In this house! With you, sir!"

Mr. Fitzgerald was hardly able himself to sense what he was saying. But Mrs. Becker's amazement annoyed him.

"A child—with me—would not be impossible, Mrs. Becker," he said coldly.

"Why no, sir—of course not, sir," she stammered, her pink cheeks growing pinker. "I only was thinking—whoever would it be, sir? Would you take up an orphan?"

Despite Kingsley Fitzgerald's stern effort to do this thing quietly there suddenly came over him a feeling like a spring bursting out of bare rock.

"Mrs. Becker," he said, "I take this opportunity to tell you—my granddaughter will arrive—to-morrow."

WHEN Meg and Aunt Mary got back to the lot, parade was just turning in at the corner farthest from the main entrance. Some of the band boys straggling by called to Meg that the white and gold section had got in, and Meg, forgetting Aunt Mary, hurried to where she could see the Cinderella coach and six coming to the pad-room—Joe, in working clothes, entirely Cinderella's groom again, waiting for the ponies. Meg saw him take the lines from the little coachman, saw the ponies reach out to ruffle their noses against him. Then he held his arms for Texas.

Across the distance of the lot the little girl's mother heard her laugh as Joe threw her on his strong shoulder, her white chiffon veil blowing back in the wind.

"Boys," she heard him call out to the men in the horse tents, "here's your kid!"

Meg smiled and tears welled into her eyes as those dear roustabouts came gathering around her little girl, asking more eager questions than even Texas could answer. In the midst of it, she saw Meg.

"Oh," she cried, "mother's back! Joe, put me down quick!"

She slipped from his hold through the circle of men around her and, catching up her long satin dress, bounded across the grass straight into Meg's arms.

Then they forgot everything but each other for a minute—these two who never had been separated before.

"Mother, I'm here, I'm here!" the little girl tried to say, but words, kisses and tears were all tumbled together.

"It seems to me, darling," Meg faltered, "that I'll never let you go away again!"

Texas tucked her hand under her mother's arm as they went to the dressing-tent to put Cinderella back into gingham.

"And mother, I must tell you quick as I can," and her face wavered between trying to smile or trying to cry, "mother, we haven't one single relation but only each other! Mr. Zylder told Joe all about it. Nobody knows anything about where grandpa is, only just that he's dead, and we haven't any grandpa! And mother, I guess—as long as that's why I came back—I guess we're glad. Because I might not have come back from a grandpa, you know!"

But as she chattered on, Meg's mind could only think over and over what the doctor had said—that if Texas didn't have a grandfather to go to he wouldn't know how to advise them. And now she didn't have a grandfather—no one at all!

Just themselves alone—unless one would have counted Jim's monkey (who clung to Texas with sharp eyes, feet and fingers)—little Texas and Meg spent the afternoon together.

Texas, with swift fingers, helped Meg dress for the performance, and when the steel clang of the bear cage outside the canvas wall told them the trick bears were done and put away, and that Meg's act was next, Texas slipped her mother's feet into the big wooden slops, and hand in hand they went out of the dressing-tent, across to the big top.

Together they waited by the back door till the band struck up the music for the Butterfly—then Meg dropped her white shawl into Texas's hands and Texas put up her lips for a kiss as Meg ran into the ring.

With glowing eyes the little girl watched her mother in the swing at the top of the world—so intent, in fact, that she didn't even notice that her friend the doctor had slipped in the back door and was watching the Butterfly too. But Meg saw the doctor, and she knew why he was there. She knew he had come because he didn't dare let her go on without his being close to her—and even as she swung and dropped through the air she felt her strength weaken, and knew that he was right.

But Texas was conscious of nothing at all but that proudly, raptly, she was watching her mother again—whirling, dipping on silver wings—to come down at the finish in a sweep of applause.

Meg smiled at the doctor as she passed him on her way out—and tried not to let him see how hard she was fighting for breath.

EVERY evening, just at dusk, crooked little Torchy and Texas lit the lights for all the fifteen canvas tops, but, according to Texas, "the very most nicest and best and importantest" was the shiny ticket-wagon at the front door, where Papa Saunders and the tall men who sold tickets had their office. Texas only knew the ticket men to smile at as she passed them, but she knew Papa Saunders "best of anybody in the world," she said.

That evening, at sunset, Texas met her dear Torchy once more. Slipping along beside him, keeping up with his jerky steps, she asked a hundred times if he'd missed her, while he answered as many times as she asked.

Together they pulled down the long ribbon of flags, then started the trip for the lights. Papa Saunders wasn't in his ticket-wagon, but when the lights were being lit in front of the side-show he came across the midway—just as the man with the tan hat from the side-show was giving Texas a stick of candy.

"So the little girl's back again," he said. "How's the mama to-day? Feeling better?"

"Why, Mama Meg's all right," Texas answered brightly. "How could she feel better when she's all right to begin with?"

"Hm—yes," he said, "glad to hear it. Thought maybe she'd take it kind of hard that to-morrow's her last day. What are you two orphans going to do now?"

Texas looked at him blankly.

"I—I don't know what you mean!" she said. "What kind of a last day is to-morrow?"

Papa Saunders had just joined the little group. The man with the tan hat looked up at him.

"I say now, Saunders, hope I'm not spilling any beans," he said. "Doesn't Texas know about her mother?"

Suddenly the little girl's eyes grew wide and frightened. She caught at Papa Saunders's coat sleeve.

"What does he mean, Papa Saunders?" she quavered. "What does he mean about the last day? Did something happen to my mother? Did something——"

Torchy drew closer to the little girl and put one knotty hand on her shoulder.

"Don't be scared, Texas," he said, his grimy face against her curls. "I'll work for you and Meg! I'll give you every cent I've got!"

Texas looked from one to the other of the three standing close to her—her eyes wide—her face white.

"Papa Saunders," she said chokingly, "what do they mean!"

The big man picked her up in his arms.

"Go and do the lights, Torchy," he said. "I'll take Texas over to my office for a while. Come after her when you're through."

With hitching steps Torchy hurried from light to light, then back to wait until Texas should come out of Papa Saunders's tiny office; but the band had begun, people were crowding through the gates and the sky was speckled with stars before the faithful eyes saw her at Papa Saunders's door.

He pushed his way through the crowd and caught her hand. Texas looked up, her cheeks wet, her gray eyes brimming with tears.

"Torchy," she said, the words catching in her throat, "mother can't work any longer. We—we haven't anywhere to go. I don't know how it can be that my mother won't work any more—and where—can we go, Torchy?"

She looked helplessly at that poor little dwarf—as helpless a soul himself as there was in the world—and she clung to his hand as they found their way around the dark side of the big top to the back door.

Mother! Watch out for film on child's teeth

That's a danger signal. If the dentifrice you are using doesn't successfully remove it, do this —the new tooth care children's dentists advise.

FOREMOST dental authorities now advise a new way in caring for a child's teeth. A way different in formula, action and effect from any other method.

As a nation-wide hygienic movement, a 10-day test is offered mothers free.

You are urged to make it. To see what modern science is doing for the better protection of children's teeth and gums. Simply use the coupon.

What film indicates. Why it must be fought several times daily

Look at your child's teeth. If cloudy, dull, discolored, there's a film. And that film is often a danger sign. The child can feel it by running his tongue across his teeth.

Ordinary tooth pastes won't combat it successfully. Try the one you now use. See if the film does not still remain.

Film is a viscous coat that clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It makes pearly teeth ugly, discolored—dingy. Many a naturally pretty child is handicapped in this way.

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs by millions breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea and gum troubles.

New way removes it. And Firms the Gums

Now modern science has found a safe way to combat film. Super-gritty substances are judged dangerous to the teeth. Soap and chalk methods are inadequate.

This new method, embodied in the tooth paste called Pepsodent, provides the scientifically proved combatant that is being adopted by the people of some 50 nations. Its action is to curdle the film, then harmlessly to remove it.

Test Tube Free

Don't you think it worth while, in justice to your children, and in fairness to yourself, to try it for ten days? The test will cost you nothing. Use the coupon for a 10-day tube, free.

LITTLE TEXAS

"Papa Saunders says we haven't any money," she said with a helpless little note in her voice, which Torchy had never heard there before, "and it will take so much to make mother better!"

As they came past the band top they saw Meg all alone, waiting for her little girl. For the first time Texas saw how pale she was, how thin and white her hands were in the flaring gaslight.

With a sob she ran through the darkness to her mother, and the crooked dwarf hiding in the shadows watched them till, for his tears, he couldn't see them at all.

He crumpled a little white envelope and dropped it on the grass. Thursday—payday. Little white envelopes brought him every week all he had in the world—but this one he crumpled and dropped on the grass, because all that was in it had been slipped into a little girl's pinafore pocket.

THERE was a bustle and stir in Fitzgerald Mansion on the morning following its master's astonishing statement to Mrs. Becker. Even Mishmer, it seemed, went around with more flutter than usual, possibly because Mr. Fitzgerald had paid no attention whatever to His Royal Peacockship the night before.

Mr. Fitzgerald himself was brusk as always, eyes as cold and stern—but for the first time in twenty years his breakfast was not served in bed.

The difference that his announcement was creating in the household had been thrust upon Mr. Fitzgerald since early in the morning. Briggs had put out his master's clothes in a quick, eager way.

"It's a great occasion, sir!" he had said.

When Mr. Fitzgerald had entered the dining-room, John, the gardener, very conscious of being out of place in the house, had been going around with long awkward steps, placing fresh garden flowers.

"Top o' the morning," he had grinned, his hat rumpled under his arm—and Mr. Fitzgerald, to his own amazement as well as to John's, had answered.

Even Becker served with a quicker, lighter step, and out in the drive, where the limousine waited an hour too early, Mr. Fitzgerald heard the chauffeur whistling softly and saw him tucking a spray of pink flowers in his buttonhole.

Why, Mr. Fitzgerald argued crossly to himself over his solitary poached egg, must a man be treated like a hero if he is merely a grandfather?

After breakfast he sent for Mrs. Becker.

"Tell the housekeeper when she comes today," he ordered, "to open the south room over the rose-garden—the room with white walls. Tell her to have the rugs and mahogany furniture removed and be ready to arrange what I shall send in its stead. Tell her, also, that I wish to have a competent governess here when I return—which will be some time late in the afternoon. That is all, I believe."

MRS. BECKER caught at the corners of her apron. Her eyes were shining, her lips playing hide-and-seek with a smile.

"Mr. Fitzgerald, if you please, I'd like to ask if you think it would be appropriate to have a white frosted cake on the dinner-table, with the little one's initials in pink candy? What are her initials, sir?"

The initials of his grandchild? He didn't know her initials. Mr. Fitzgerald hastily became very busy adjusting the folded handkerchief in his upper pocket. He was not ready to admit—even to his cook—that he did not know the name of this grandchild of his.

"The cake will be entirely appropriate," he conceded, "but perhaps the age would be more fitting than the initials. Make a figure 12, Mrs. Becker, instead of the letters."

"Oh, quite right, indeed! Thank you, sir," Mrs. Becker hurried to reply, her face breaking openly into a smile. "A figure 12 will be handsome. Is she—may I ask—is she a beautiful child—like a Fitzgerald should be, sir?"

Mr. Fitzgerald brought his proud shoulders up a little more proudly.

"She is like a Fitzgerald—yes, certainly." Wide gray eyes came back to him, wild-rose cheeks, golden hair. "And yes," he went on, "she is beautiful."

Those wide gray eyes brought a picture to him also of a calico dress, a hat with a worn band of ribbon, stubby toes—these things for the little heiress of Fitzgerald Mansion!

"By the way, Mrs. Becker," he said, "I should like to have the housekeeper secure the child's nurse in sufficient time for the arranging of a complete wardrobe. Tell her to spare no expense."

"Now won't that be a pleasure, sir!" Mrs. Becker breathed rapturously. She hurried toward the kitchen, but Mr. Fitzgerald detained her still again, his lips twitching in an attempt either to smile or not to.

"And tell her," he said, "that perhaps there should be a—a doll, or something like that. A dog, perhaps—and—some bracelets—and strings of beads. The child's a girl, you know, Mrs. Becker—and—I trust you have got the canary back safely."

MR. KINGSLEY FITZGERALD, for the first time in seven years, entered Mr. Zylder's office two hours later. A check for several hundred dollars had been left at the largest department store in St. Louis in exchange for the most exquisite small set of white ivory furniture the city could offer—rugs in thick rose-warm velvet—filmy curtains of rose and white—and also a pair of soft, white bed-slippers and a white robe, insisted upon by the enthusiastic saleslady.

Mr. Fitzgerald determined grimly to say nothing of these things to Mr. Zylder. Mr. Fitzgerald, whose life had always been constructed upon one principle and one only—that of having his own way—intended that, above everything, Mr. Zylder should in no wise feel that his client was giving in to anything for anybody.

Mr. Zylder was waiting with a mixture of alarm and curiosity.

"Well," he said, offering one chair—whereupon Mr. Fitzgerald deliberately took another—"what has brought about my being honored thus?"

Mr. Fitzgerald placed his hat and gloves on Mr. Zylder's desk. It was characteristic of him that he came to the point without preliminary.

"In regard to the matter of my granddaughter, Zylder," he said stiffly, "I have reconsidered and have decided to take her."

"Really?" Zylder said—then smiled. "Now, that's fine, Kingsley! Fine!"

Neither man had ever before called the other by his first name.

Mr. Fitzgerald coughed slightly.

"If you will tell me where she can be located," he said, "I will see to it at once. You will come with me, of course."

"Yes—hm—yes." Mr. Zylder nodded. "Well, let's see."

He brought the slip of paper on which Joe had written from the top drawer of his desk and adjusted a pair of glasses on his nose.

"Came from the town of—let's see—Three Trees, Arkansas," he read. "Stopping here, at a Crandle Boarding-House—1837 West Dale Street. Yes—well—" he put the tips of his fingers together. "It may be, Kingsley—it may be that we won't be able to locate your grandchild for a day or two. It's barely possible that they may have left St. Louis immediately."

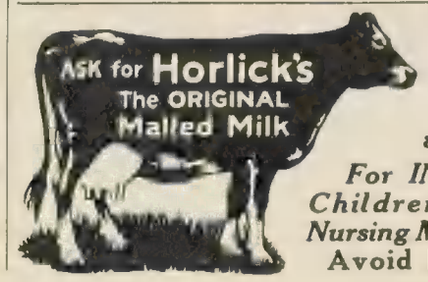
Mr. Fitzgerald rose.

"We will go to the boarding-house address at once," he said crisply. "A day or two is out of the question. Mrs. Becker is baking a cake with frosting and pink candy!"

EARLY Friday morning the long train of circus cars drew slowly into Fort Smith, Arkansas.

Meg had fallen into a fitful sleep, her brown hair in long braids across the coverlet, her face white on the pillow, one hand thrown across her eyes.

Sunlight filtered through the stateroom window. The white curtain blew gently in and out with the morning air.



In her own little bed, across the tiny room from Meg, Texas lay watching her mother. Texas wondered what time it was. The clock on the wall had stopped. She wondered what town it was. They had forgotten to look the night before. But, after all, what did time or town matter? What did anything matter but that to-day Meg would do her last show!

Papa Saunders had told her that rest and care would make Meg well, but who could think of a butterfly with wings that would never fly again? She wondered if perhaps she should make a little pot of tea for Meg. Somehow it seemed this morning that she was the mother, Meg the one to be cared for. Somehow she seemed a great deal more today than only twelve years old.

The train was pulling through the outskirts of town—little scraggly gray streets with little worn-out houses for people with no money. Would she and Meg be living somewhere in one of these—with no more blue sky, no more wild-flower meadows?

The train stopped with a jerk. Texas sat up and tossed the curls out of her eyes.

"Mother—we're in town," she said softly.

Meg stirred a little and turned on the pillow.

Texas slipped out of her bed and padded in bare feet to put good-morning kisses on her mother's two eyes.

"Mama Meg, we're almost at the station," she said. "Morning came too soon!"

Meg opened her eyes to the little girl smiling down at her. A swift thought of thanks swept through her heart that unconsciously her little daughter had learned how, when something hard came to be done, to do it without fear.

Texas ran to the window and looked ahead up the track.

"My goodness, mother," she said, "Bum's unloading the elephants already! It's late!"

Meg sat up and watched her little girl, so tall and slim in the long nightgown.

Texas smiled bravely at her mother. "Mother, we're not afraid of anything, are we?" she said—and caught her curls with a pin in bobbing ends on top of her head, plunging her face under the faucet in the corner. Then suddenly she turned to Meg, the fresh drops of water on her delicate skin.

"Mother," she said, "was it because you were trying to think what's going to become of us that you stayed awake last night?"

Meg brushed her hand across her eyes. This was the hardest day she had ever faced.

"Yes, darling, I did think about it," she said. "If we could get enough money to go back to France—would you like to go back where you were a little baby? Maybe you and mother could work in a shop somewhere. Would you like——"

A knock at the door interrupted her.

TEXAS was dressed, her last curl being wound around her mother's finger.

"Come in," Meg called—then, as a man's shadow fell across the floor, she looked up in quick surprise to see Papa Saunders smiling good morning.

Meg put a blue chair for him and gave Texas's curls a final pat as he came in and sat down. He looked from the slender mother to the little girl.

"Meg," Mr. Saunders said, "have you planned anything for yourself and the little one—after to-night?"

"No," Meg told him, trying hard to keep her voice quiet. "Of course we haven't money enough to help us very much."

Then suddenly she put both hands pleadingly out to him.

"Mr. Saunders—can't I keep on working?"

"Hm—" he said, "you lost all your money in that bank failure, didn't you? Too bad! But Meg, it's impossible for you to work any more. It might snuff you out any minute like a candle. Besides, we already have some one to take your place—to-morrow."

Meg grew white.

"Oh!" she said, catching her breath. "I didn't know any one could do the butterfly swing but me! Can some one else take my place as soon—as to-morrow?"

Texas didn't hear. She had gone outside to speak to Gipsy Jean a minute.

"Yes," Mr. Saunders said slowly, "I discovered some one about six weeks ago—as fast a little performer as I ever saw in the ring—with a speed and beauty in the tricks that astonished me. I watched her do toe swings, neck loops, and forward and back revolves—so perfectly, Meg, I could hardly believe it!"

Meg did not know what to say. Why should Papa Saunders tell her this?

"And she'll begin—to-morrow?" the Butterfly asked unsteadily, with an ache in her heart that, despite all her courage, made tears in her eyes.

Texas came into the doorway. Her mother reached for her hand.

"Yes, she'll go in to-morrow, I think," Mr. Saunders went on slowly, "and I think she'll be a whirlwind! She's been training three years with Captain Gordon for a surprise! She says she's waiting to be perfect before she told—her mother! She doesn't realize she's perfect enough to tell the whole world!"

A faint gasp came from M 's little girl as she sprang out of her mother's arms and faced them both.

"Papa Saunders!" she said, her voice only a startled whisper. "How did you know?"

Mr. Saunders stood up and put his hand on her shoulder.

"Meg," he said, "our little girl didn't dream such a thing could be possible—but you've been taking care of her—now she's going to take care of you—and to-morrow you will see for yourself the marvelous performance of little Texas Fitzgerald!"

MRS. CRANDLE always swept and dusted her entire house on Fridays. On Fridays she always tied her hair in a towel and pinned her skirt up at the waist behind and wore her largest shoes. Therefore it was more than ordinarily upsetting to have a long-nosed limousine purr down the length of Dale Street and stop at her door.

In a flurry of hastily unpinned skirts she nervously unhooked her screen door, showing the Honorable Mr. Zylder and Mr. Kingsley Fitzgerald into her usually methodical hair-cloth parlor—which now offered only a ghostly array of draped cleaning-sheets.

Mr. Zylder began the conversation, explaining briefly that he was an attorney at law and asking if a little girl and a young man were stopping there.

"Why, yes—yes, they was," Mrs. Crandle hastened to inform them. "It's the little girl who was expectin' to find her grandfather, I'm sure."

Mr. Zylder assured her that this was the child in question.

"A handsome thing she was, too," Mrs. Crandle went on chattily. "I said to my boarders, when the child and young man left, that I did wish——"

"When did they leave?" Mr. Zylder interrupted. "Where were they going?"

Mrs. Crandle slid forward on the edge of her chair.

"Now—they was only here one night and to breakfast," she told them. "It was—let me see—Tuesday night if I remember right—yes, they left Wednesday morning—but I can't tell you where to. Excuse me—but is it—you ain't the relation she was looking for?"

"I am her grandfather," Mr. Fitzgerald said shortly. "Who was the young man? Are you sure he didn't mention where they were going?"

This aristocrat—the grandfather!

"Oh, mercy me! Sakes alive!" Mrs. Crandle gasped. "Such a lamb as she was! I couldn't figure how such a cherub would be out huntin' for her own family!"

But after the meaningful silence of Mr. Fitzgerald, offering no explanation, Mrs. Crandle went on hastily: "Yes, they left day before yesterday, right after breakfast, and the last I heard she was going out after her grandpa—and, no—no, they didn't say where they was going—or even where they came from—and I don't know who the young man was. I didn't ask her name nor his—though I took an awful interest in her. But then, people come and go so quick every day here," she explained apologetically.

"You are positive you remember no remark about where they were going—or when?" Mr. Zylder tried again.

"No, indeed, not a word," Mrs. Crandle said, her eyes wide and positive.

Mr. Fitzgerald rose.

"Zylder," he said, "we will telephone this place in Arkansas."

Mrs. Crandle watched them out of the door (and tried to see how many neighbors were noticing).

MR. ZYLDER, it chanced, had a personal friend—Mr. Cavendish, a good old country lawyer—who lived in Three Trees, Arkansas, so it was decided that Mr. Zylder should telephone Cavendish—and find out what they could in that way.

It was perhaps forty minutes before the telephone connection went through from the St. Louis office to Three Trees.

Mr. Fitzgerald, sitting at Mr. Zylder's open window, said nothing at all when at last Mr. Zylder reached his friend on the wire. After perhaps twenty minutes Mr. Zylder closed the conversation and joined Mr. Fitzgerald at the window.

"Odd thing," he began, "Cavendish has lived there all his life—town only five thousand people—knows everybody in it—says he never heard of a Fitzgerald—is rather positive no such people live there—no child

Don't Let Sun and Wind Age Your Skin

A dry skin is the first to grow old and nothing dries and coarsens the skin as fast as sun and wind. The improperly protected skin soon loses its youthful firmness and the little lines and other signs of age creep in long before they should. A little Ingram's Milkweed Cream applied every day fortifies the skin against exposure and keeps it always soft, firm and smooth.

Protects Cleanses Corrects

Ingram's Milkweed Cream is more than a protection, more than a cleanser and powder base. It combines certain remedial properties which correct redness, roughness, tan, freckles, blackheads, blemishes and such imperfections. The purpose of these nourishing, beautifying properties is not to cover up defects but to remove them.

Understand Your Skin Then Give It Proper Care

There's a booklet, "Health Hints," wrapped around each jar of Ingram's Milkweed Cream which every woman should read. It tells you the most effective way to use Ingram's Milkweed Cream—tells you how to use it in treating the common troubles of your skin. Read this booklet carefully. It is written by specialists to make sure that you get from Ingram's Milkweed Cream the fullest possible benefit.

Go to your druggist today and buy a jar of Ingram's Milkweed Cream—in the fifty cent or the economical dollar size. Begin its use at once. The improvement that will come to your complexion in just a few days will surprise you.

How to Keep Cool

With millions to spend on luxury, the princes of India found no better way to keep the air cool, and to ward off gnats and flies, than the creaking, feeble "punkah" pulled by hand.

You can have a much better breeze for a tiny fraction of the cost. You can get a General Electric fan for a few dollars and you can keep it running all day for 5 cents.

The General Electric Company is working with the electric light and power companies of America to make all our homes, offices and factories, better and more healthful places in which to live.

If Cassim Had Opened a Cave Like This!

WHEN Cassim of the Arabian Nights cried "Open Sesame" to the rock that guarded the robbers' cave, it flew open to reveal priceless treasures of gold and silver and precious jewels.

But all that he could buy with them were the barbaric discomforts that passed as Arabian magnificence. What wouldn't Mrs. Cassim have given of his gold and jewels for one good American vacuum cleaner?

of that description in town that he knows of—but of course——"

Mr. Fitzgerald took a thin gold watch from his pocket. It was thirty minutes past one.

"A train going south leaves St. Louis at two," he said. "My chauffeur will drive you to the station."

ON FRIDAY—cleaning-day—Mrs. Crandle always served corned beef and cabbage for dinner. Mr. Fobes, expressive in his likes and dislikes, drew the line firmly at corned beef and cabbage—so on Friday nights Mr. Fobes regularly left a vacant place at the boarding-house table and took himself out to a restaurant.

Which was how Mr. Fobes (who without doubt would have been more interested than any other of the Crandle boarders) was not at the dinner-table when the story was told of Mrs. Crandle's boarders.

Peralee, the colored servant, began it when she shambled around with steaming dishes of cabbage.

"Mis' Pahsons," she remarked, addressing the only person at the table who ever replied to anything she said, " 'membah dis hyah yalla-haid lil' gal settin' down hyah by Mistah Fobes, a-lookin' foh huh gran' pappy? Well—he done come dis mawnin', and lawdy, he mus' hab all de money in town!"

The immediate interest of the entire table was such that Peralee promptly put down the cabbage.

"He done come in a cah, long as 'cross de entiah street, wid a sheefer a-drivin' an' a high sto' pipe hat—and he done come a walkin' up de front walk dis-away!"

With a stiffening of shoulders and a lifting of pigtails, she illustrated the dignity of Kingsley Fitzgerald.

"He done ask was she hyah—could we tell huh desinashun—and Mis' Cran'le and me set ent'tanin' dose millionaires mos' all de mawnin'!"

"Why, Peralee!" Mrs. Parsons exclaimed. "You don't mean it! Pass your dishes and ask Mrs. Crandle to hurry in and tell us!"

"Well, Ah tol' ya'," Peralee replied, much offended. "Ah tol' ya' all dey was!" and, drawing her mouth down with hurt pride, she continued her round with the cabbage.

When Mrs. Crandle brought in the bread, Mrs. Parsons managed to get her attention above the others who started talking excitedly.

"Was it really that lovely little thing's grandfather?" she shrilled. "Didn't she find him that day, or what, Mrs. Crandle?"

Mrs. Crandle could after all tell little more than Peralee, though of course at greater length. Evidently the child hadn't found him—and now he was trying to find her. But where the young one went, or who she was, or where she came from— "How should I know," the landlady said tartly. "I'm sure I can't expect to find out a life history of every five-minute guest I have! The child didn't offer to tell anything about herself—and far be it from me to ask anybody!"

"Didn't the grandfather mention anything about the circus?" Mrs. Parsons wanted to know.

"Circus?" Mrs. Crandle repeated, putting down the bread. "What circus?"

"Why, the circus the little girl and her mother perform with! Why don't he go there and get her! A circus ought to be easy to find!"

Mrs. Crandle stared at her.

"Who said she performed with any circus?" she wanted to know.

"Who said it!" put in the insurance agent. "For the love of Mike, where were you when she spent a whole hour talking about it at breakfast?"

Mrs. Crandle leaned over the back of Mr. Fobes's empty chair.

"If anybody spends any hours talking about anything at breakfast-time, Mr. Bruce, you may simply remind yourself that I tend to business in business hours. I'm sure this is the first I ever heard of such a thing as her being in a circus! During breakfast, I regularly prepare my luncheon vegetables. I remember her talking till I asked her to stop—and let the table be cleared, but I hope I don't waste any time listening to children rattle on! I just told that highfalutin' relative this morning that I didn't know where she went nor came from nor one blessed thing about her—and that's as true as gospel!"

Mrs. Parsons in her excitement grew fairly indignant.

"Why, my dear Mrs. Crandle!" she fluttered, "it was your duty to tell that rich old man what you knew of the child! If he had of understood where to go and get hold of her himself, he'd never have come here asking questions! We must write him—or one of us call on him, and tell him about it! We ought to! It's our Christian duty! Now I think of it, I remember hearing her say her grandfather didn't know anything about her at all! All anybody would have to tell him would be to hunt up some circus!"

In her growing enthusiasm she half rose from the table.

"Why, how could you say she told us nothing, Mrs. Crandle? She told us a great deal! Why, that poor little love of a thing may be cheated out of goodness knows what! She wasn't any millionaire, you could see that well enough! Why, come to think, she said they didn't even know who her grandfather was! Don't you remember, Mrs. Stevens, her remarking about thinking he probably only had apple-trees and chickens, when I mentioned he might be wealthy?"

Mrs. Parsons, very much flushed, turned to the milliner, who fluttered her handkerchief against her lips nervously.

"Yes, I believe—yes, I think I do remember something like that," she said uncertainly, "but of course Mrs. Crandle did the best she knew how!"

"But the grandfather should know!" fruffled Mrs. Parsons. "He must know! I shall go myself and tell him every word the child told us that day!"

Mrs. Crandle, dishing the sauce, whacked the spoon in and out with energy.

"Mrs. Parsons," she snapped, "I want one thing understood right now! My boarders pay me for the privilege of staying under my roof—not for the right to tell me what is and what ain't my Christian duty! I may miss my duty, but I'm still running my own house, and I'm telling everybody concerned that as long as they want to board at my table I've heard the last I'm going to about this whole business! I don't know, and I didn't know who that child was, and I don't care! Tain't up to me to match up people's families! And whoever refers to my Christian duty again, can make up their minds to leave my hospitality at the same time! I'm not having nobody pay me four dollars a week to tell me what I should do in my own house or shouldn't—and I hope you understand that right here's the end of the subject!"

Peaceful little Mrs. Parsons listened in utter astonishment.

"Why, dear Mrs. Crandle," she said, her voice very up hill, "you know I wouldn't hurt your feelings for the world! I only thought you'd be glad to be the means of bringing two lost sheep together! Would you mind if I merely call on him, and explain very nicely that the little girl's confidence was to me—that you hadn't heard it at all? I'm sure you wouldn't mind if I simply——"

"Peralee!" Mrs. Crandle interrupted shrilly, "come clear off the plates." Then she turned to the table again, directly to Mrs. Parsons.

"As to what I'd mind or not mind about your calling on anybody," she snapped, "I can save you worrying about that might quick—because I don't know any more about the old one than I did about the young one. I haven't the remotest idea who he is, nor where in the United States he came from—so if you feel it's your Christian duty, Mrs. Parsons, set right out and call on him! The only thing I've got to say is that I don't want to hear no more talkin'—now or no time!"

AFTER he had seen Mr. Zylder disappear through the train gate, Kingsley Fitzgerald drove back to Fitzgerald Mansion.

He wondered, as the car rolled along, how much explanation he would be expected to make to the servants. He remembered that he had neglected again to find out the child's name. He hoped Mrs. Becker wouldn't ask him. On the lawn, on the terrace nearest the house, John and the stable man were putting together a swing, shiny and new, with a gay striped awning.

"Miss Kent ordered it, sir," John grinned, looking up from his knees as his employer stopped in passing. "It'll look handsome on the lawn!"

"Miss Kent," Fitzgerald repeated. "Who is Miss Kent?"

"Why, the new nurse, sir," John explained. "She's all ready for the little girl—waiting, you might say. We're all waiting, God bless you, sir!"

Fitzgerald went on hastily. No one in all his life had ever said such a thing to him before. He couldn't understand why John and all the others should be making so much over this; yet he did understand, for even in his own mind he thought of coming days as different.

Mishmer with long strides came across the lawn to meet him, and rollicking beside the peacock came a fuzzy white poodle. Mr. Fitzgerald stopped short as the little thing romped against his feet. The peacock, watching sharply, suddenly screamed in some sort of unconscious sensing of the loss of his rulership in this dominion.

A TALL fair-haired person in white came hurrying down the veranda steps. She was a very pretty person, and fresh and cool to look at. "Mr. Fitzgerald," she smiled, "I'm Miss Kent from the agency. I'm to look after your granddaughter. Has the little girl arrived?"

Mr. Fitzgerald removed his hat and bowed stiffly.

"How do you do, Miss Kent?" he said. "I trust my housekeeper has made you comfortable. My granddaughter will not arrive as soon as we expected. Perhaps it will—" he looked down and shook the poodle away from his immaculate trousers leg—"perhaps it will give us more time to prepare for her."

Miss Kent took the white puppy in her arms and together they went toward the house.

"At your cook's suggestion, I sent for this playmate for your little girl," she explained. "I thought it would help her to forget her strangeness in her new home."

They went up the steps of the side veranda.

"It would be delightful," she remarked, "to enclose this porch and furnish it for an outdoor dining and play room."

The thought of his home as it always had been came into its owner's mind. So cooks and gardeners and nurses were to arrange the place now. Cooks, gardeners, nurses and grandchildren!

"By all means have anything you wish," he replied with a sarcasm of which Miss Kent chose to be unconscious.

"The furniture was delivered and is perfect, Mr. Fitzgerald," she said gaily. "What a fortunate happy little girl this is to be! I went for the wardrobe myself, and do hope you will approve! I selected what I thought most appropriate for a twelve-year-old child who is a little heiress! Won't you come and see?"

Mr. Fitzgerald followed up the stairs, down the long velvet hall to the south room which had been closed so long no one remembered when it ever had been used at all. The door was ajar, with a faint odor of some cool perfume coming out from it.

"The room was musty from closed windows," Miss Kent told him, "so I scattered a little fresh oil of lavender. It is—" she threw open the door and Mr. Fitzgerald stepped across the threshold—"it is a place for a little princess," she exclaimed.

The windows, long and wide, were flung open, with the sun flooding in. They were hung with the rose and white curtains he had selected. Shadows from the tree-tops outside danced across velvet rugs, and in a perfection of rose and white the bed, chairs and tiny desk—even a miniature ivory toilet-set on the dressing-table—were ready for this child who was coming. In the tiniest chair was as lovely a doll as ever came from a toy shop! A violet-eyed, curly-haired, dimpled thing with tiny teeth and square little feet thrust out babylike in new pink shoes! The robe and slippers Mr. Fitzgerald had been responsible for were on the foot of the bed with a white lacy nightgown. Miss Kent tucked the poodle under her arm and opened the closet where an array of soft pink and blue chiffon and pale rosebuds left Mr. Fitzgerald even less able to speak the words he had felt were expected of him upon seeing the place.

"It is exactly right, I'm sure," he said, when the display was at an end. There was a sharpness in his voice that might have meant either complete satisfaction—or none. "Make yourself entirely comfortable. I will let you know when the child will be here. It will not be—to-day."

Miss Kent opened the dresser drawer where was a dainty pile of embroidered socks and underclothes, but when she looked up Mr Fitzgerald had gone.

Mr. Fitzgerald refused to consider that the feelings of his cook meant anything to him. Nevertheless he somehow felt personally responsible for an explanation to Mrs. Becker of his grandchild's delay. He went first to his own room.

In the den, Mr. Cuffly, his secretary, was busy with mail, and on the table the morning newspapers and stock bulletins lay unopened.

"There are four business letters," Mr. Cuffly began, "which——"

"You may go for to-day," Mr. Fitzgerald said. "I shall not wish to consider anything till to-morrow."

This was so unusual that Mr. Cuffly did not even endeavor to reply.

Mr. Fitzgerald went into his bedroom, where Briggs was hurriedly turning back the counterpane.

"I will not take my nap to-day, Briggs," the master of the house informed him. "I should like a bath and linen. Then I have business down-stairs with Mrs. Becker."

Kingsley Fitzgerald wondered what all his servants were thinking of him, who had all day kept deliberately out of his accustomed routine. It came over him what a servant he had been to them—never presuming in twenty years to come to the table for breakfast, or go without his nap, or overlook his morning mail! Even Mishmer demanded a walk every evening!

In tailored white flannels he started to the kitchen.

He found Mrs. Becker alone in the kitchen. Mr. Fitzgerald coughed behind his hand. Mrs. Becker looked up with a little gasp—her cheeks, already pink, grew pinker.

"Why—why, Mr. Fitzgerald!" she said, startled completely. Then she leaned toward him with an excited little whisper. "Has she come? Is she here?"

Mr. Fitzgerald smiled. He hadn't intended to—but somehow he did.

"She will not be here to-day, Mrs. Becker," he said. "Probably to-morrow. I expect word late to-night, and I shall let you know when it comes."

He hadn't intended to say that either. He left abruptly.

IT WAS ten o'clock, and Mr. Fitzgerald was alone in his room when his telephone rang. Briggs hurried in from the hall, but Mr. Fitzgerald answered before him.

Mr. Zylder was calling from Three Trees, Arkansas. The lawyer's sentences were long and explanatory. His client's replies were short and crisp. No Fitzgerald family had ever lived in Three Trees. The town was a place where everybody knew every one. The postmaster, the minister, the schoolmaster had been conferred with, the census books and the directory, an old lady and her husband who had lived there since the first store had been open—and there wasn't one child in the town to answer Zylder's description.

"It seems as though nothing can be done any further," he said. "There must be some mistake. I can't understand. But Three Trees, Arkansas, is absolutely the only reference they gave me."

Mr. Fitzgerald made only one sentence in reply. "I will join you in Three Trees tomorrow," he said. Then he was suddenly reminded of something.

"By the way, Zylder," he appended, "what did you say the child's name was?"

"I don't think I ever told you," came Zylder's voice. "Her name is Kingsley Fitzgerald."

The old multimillionaire had lived sixty-seven years—and yet never in all his methodical life had he been so utterly confused as when he put down his telephone and was left alone with himself and what Richard Zylder had told him! Out of the confusion somehow Mrs. Becker came to his mind and the fact that she was waiting in the kitchen for news. He might have sent it by Briggs, he might have called through the speaking-tube, he might have rung for her to come to him—but instead he went down through all his great rooms to the kitchen where his cook sat by the kitchen table pouring out little toy jars of fresh strawberry jam.

"Mrs. Becker," he said, "I have just received a telephone call from my lawyer in Arkansas, and I find it will be necessary for me to go after the child myself."

"Oh, now, isn't that too bad," she said sympathetically, "when we're all so expectant like! Well, I'll cover the cake real good!"

"Yes, by all means," he agreed, "and perhaps, Mrs. Becker, you were right, after all, about using the initials. Perhaps you can put them under the age."

From any fruit Perfect Jams and Jellies every time!

OH, it's so easy now to be sure of perfect jam and jelly! Even the most difficult fruits jell perfectly when Certo is added. For Certo is the very substance in fruit that makes it jell.

This jelly-making element is completely lacking in some fruits, others have only a little, and even in the fruits that naturally contain most of it, it gradually diminishes as they ripen.

But now Certo itself supplies this all-important jelly-making substance. You can use your fruits at their ripest—when color and flavor are best; you can even use the delicious fruits that have themselves no jellying property.

And with Certo just one minute's active boil is needed. No loss, now, in steam of flavor, color and juice. Certo's short boil gives you half again as many glasses from your fruit.

Your grocer has Certo; order a bottle today. Send for free booklet telling all about successful jam and jelly making. Douglas-Pectin Corp., Granite Bldg., Rochester, N. Y. Canadian address: Douglas Packing Co., Ltd., Coburg, Ont.

LITTLE TEXAS

"Now that would be lovely in pink candy," Mrs. Becker cooed, "but I don't think you told me her name, did you?"

Mr. Fitzgerald turned to her, his hand on the door.

"Mrs. Becker, she is Kingsley Fitzgerald the third," he said huskily.

GOLDEN Summer Saturday afternoon—a wide, green meadow at the edge of a busy town—the white tops of a circus with flags against the sky—brass band stirring a surging crowd—where the jungle smell filled the nostrils—and eyes were bewildered with a glitter of color! An ocean of faces—forty thousand applauding hands! Three rings with scarlet ring-banks—and spot-lights playing in brilliant rays on a cobweb of trapeze ropes and bars fifty feet above the sawdust!

A round of clowns tumbling over the track, a troupe of Eskimo strong men, a burst of calliope music, ten lumbering elephants having tea, a kaleidoscope of cheers, hand-clapping and laughter from the crowd—then a silence as the rings and tracks were cleared and a tall man in gray stepped into the center.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he began, as heads bent forward to hear him, "appearing in this ring, I call your attention to the world's record performance of its kind! The youngest aerial artist who has ever come before the public, now presented to you in her sensational madcap feats of grace and skill! For the first time before any audience—the child marvel of the air—Little Texas!"

There was a ripple of eagerness, of curious attention, as the gentleman stood aside, as the band broke into a waltz melody—and then like an iridescent bubble came a dancing some one into the ring—long, slender legs in pale silk tights—a cobweb dress of ethereal pink, blue and silver—round, dimpled, childish arms, a mass of golden curls, and, loveliest of all, a smile that was caught up and given back to her by everybody in the great crowd!

There was a hush like the sudden dying down of a wind as the child with one foot in the loop of her rope was carried up—up—swaying gently—to the top of the great tent. Then that one little girl held twenty thousand people breathless as suddenly—light and frail as a flower tossed in the air—she swung out, fearlessly, fifty feet above their heads! With a drop and a whirl—and a sun-gold halo of curls—her slender body swung in the air so lightly that her tiny hands and feet seemed scarcely to touch the white rope that held them!

A wonder and apprehension kept the great crowd so silent they seemed almost to hear the swish of the air as the slim little body swirled over them—one minute down, with curls flying—then, with a sudden turn, back safe and sure in the swing—like a little girl playing in a garden—laughing down at them—her toes caught together, her hands outstretched for their approval.

It was a wonderful thing! A beautiful thing! The fairy skirts—the sure little hands and feet—curls flying—and that glowing eager smile! It made it just a happy game she was playing! Such a beautiful thing that they had only begun to realize it was real when with a sudden head-over spin—just a whirling pale rainbow of color—she caught her hand in the loop that hung near her and, dropping like an arrow out of a bow, she was down on her feet in the sawdust ring again.

They heard her laugh out loud, her head thrown back as she flung her arms wide to them—her first performance done!

The applause that swept over her head was a sound like a storm breaking! The little girl—a tiny fluttering thing—blew kisses from her fingers, caught her skirts in a sly curtsy. Such a child—after all—to have forty thousand hands acclaiming her! She seemed sweetly bewildered, there in the playing spot-lights, her hands held out to the crowd. She seemed, after all, just a child in some great place—lost and frightened at being all alone!

Then a big man with a big smile (though tears were in his eyes, could any one have seen them) crossed the hippodrome track to the center ring—caught up that little golden-haired child and kissed her—swung her to his shoulder—and, in a fresh storm of cheers, a burst of music from the band, little Texas Fitzgerald rode out of the ring—on Papa Saunders's shoulders—a star!

But at that moment the darndog appeared around the corner of the house contentedly munching a long white kid glove. I heard a faint moan of despair which impelled my unexpectedly vicious leap upon the pup. For once he was taken unaware and I managed to wrest the little glove from him without much ado. I waved it exultantly as I sprang into my car.

"Account settled. We thank you for your patronage," I laughed. "We are at your service for further orders."

Without one backward glance—so that I really never knew how she took it—I sped down Marbury Road.

DAYS passed. Frightfully empty, inconsequent days. I began to realize that with the advantage left upon my score, I should not be likely to hear that dear voice asking a further favor, while at the same time I had closed every avenue of excuse for calling upon her.

From this I let myself imagine things. You know how one's imagination can be a curse. Perhaps she was ill. Probably Hel had developed hydrophobia. I endured this new aspect of my madness for two days, and then decided that it was only decent to call her up on the telephone and find out if the work had proved satisfactory. Anybody would do that—the merest workman. Anyhow, I must find out if everything was all right with her. I did. It wasn't. This was the way it was:

"Oh, Mr. Sayre, I'm really tremendously glad you called. It's the dog again——"

"I'll come to you to beat Hel if you say the word," I offered, trying to be jovial without evincing my exuberance.

"You can't. That is just the trouble. He has disappeared again. This time, I am afraid, for good."

"I feel that way about it," I observed sweetly.

"But I mean that he will not be returned this time. He broke away when one of the maids and I were giving him his bath. He was untied and without collar."

"As I was, when you first beheld me," I rejoined.

"Oh, I understand that perfectly. But—to return to Hel——"

"I would any time—for you." (I knew it was madness.)

"He has been gone since morning." Her voice was formal indeed. "Eight hours, you see. If Alan comes home and finds——"

(How I did dislike that name! I rushed in quickly.)

"There's only one thing to do: If you can trust yourself to my driving, Mrs. Burton, I am sure we can round him up before nightfall."

"Oh, do you think so?" What silly ecstasy over a mere canine. "If I could be sure."

"You can. I'll be at your door at—er—the usual time."

"The back door?" she inquired innocently.

"I stop wherever signaled," I thrust at her savagely.

Then we both laughed like children.

HOURS later—which seemed like days in their laggardly passing—the soft, fragrant little gipsy person was sitting beside me in the car, pouring out her difficulties into my sympathetic ears.

"If it were not for Alan's blind devotion to him" (why was it her wifely duty to lug in that name every once in so often?), "I should not make a scrap of effort to find him again—not a scrap. Alan doesn't regard him as a nuisance."

"Men are selfish brutes in their blind devotions," I vouchsafed, keeping my eyes straight to the road ahead and trying to be extremely impersonal.

She quietly fingered the plain gold wedding-band on her little bare hand before she spoke.

"Oh, Alan is never selfish," she asserted loyally. "He has been perfectly wonderful to me always. You can't imagine——"

"I can't imagine any sane man's being anything else," I blurted out roughly. I sounded the siren at the cross-roads so suddenly that she flung a startled little hand on my arm. The flash of the gold ring alone steadied my hands upon the wheel—and kept them there.

At once the hand whisked away and we became very conventional in our discussion of the probable whereabouts of Hel.

We pumped down rough roads and sought out by-paths. We inquired at every villa and farmhouse.

Sunset grew dusk, and then dusk grew dark. The landscape was entirely new to me, and I was not in the mood to enjoy novelty.

Every road I tried was a cul-de-sac or a private approach to a farmhouse. No longer could I make a pretense of hunting for a dog. Finally I blurted out the truth.

"Mrs. Burton, I'm—lost. I thought I knew this country perfectly—and I'll swear there is a short cut back to East Cliffe around here somewhere, but——"

Suddenly, upon the sound of my voice, clear in the stilly night came a joyous raucous yelp.

"Hel!" ejaculated eager tones beside me.

"Precisely," I tried to imitate her delight.

The barking came from a near-by barn that suddenly loomed out of the darkness.

It is a fact well known to motorists that a farmer's slumbers can not be disturbed with impunity. A voice from a dark farmhouse (unluckily nearer us than the barn) roared at us, and a light followed hard upon it. A grotesquely garbed figure appeared upon the threshold of the open door.

Most unreasonably he sought an explanation of our presence upon his preserve at that time of night.

I attempted to soothe his feelings by telling him of our search for the puppy. We had heard sounds in the barn that resembled——

The grotesque figure exploded. Nothing can be conceivably more picturesque than American profanity in a Scandinavian accent. My companion covered her ears. We must not only take the dog at once off his hands, but must reimburse him immediately for a valuable second crop which had been utterly ruined by Helvetius. It was worth a large sum. I had never realized before the value of second crops. I felt anxiously through my pockets for my check-book. Why the devil had I changed my clothes? I had not a fraction of the amount necessary to appease him and my card was thrust back in my face.

A GASP at my side hurled me into starting my engine, and I had backed for the turn when I caught the purposeful gleam of an object in the farmer's hand. Its barrel was turned full upon us. An excellent aim and close range. I considered—my engine whirring. This was really not the ideal place to turn around.

"Oh, how awful!" the girl beside me was murmuring half hysterically—though it seemed to me more with mirth than fright. "How perfectly awful of me to have put you in such a hole!"

"I live on excitement," I assured her, "but I'm sorry you have had to sit through it. It really looks as if we should have to stay until I can rout out somebody in the morning to come and ransom us. He is quite beside himself."

"Oh, I can't," she wailed softly. "Don't you see I can't? The maids would know—they saw us drive away—and they are so suspicious about you since—since the gardening affair—they would notify the police and Alan. Oh, Alan would never let me under his roof again. He is a veritable fiend for propriety."

I honestly have no theory as to what would have happened next, if Hel had not solved the difficulty by leaping out of the barn—I have never known how. He made a dash for the chicken yard. Our host, shouting unmentionable epithets, raced after him. I faced the imminent danger of an overturn and rushed in some sort of a semicircular direction into a stretch of unfenced meadow. I don't know where I came out upon the road, but it was some distance from the farmhouse, and I suddenly discovered that I was upon the long-sought short-cut to Marbury Road. I slowed down with an exultant laugh as I told her the joyous news. Her attention, I discovered, was upon a black speck far down the now moonlit stretch we had just covered. She was looking back over the shoulder nearest me.

"Stop," she whispered imperiously. "Hel will overtake us."

"Let it," I dared—obeying her as any gentleman should. I too looked back at the increasing black speck racing after us.

NOW any one who has ever had seated next him in his car a delicious little creature who chanced to be looking back over the shoulder nearest him at the exact moment he was looking back over the shoulder nearest her will realize that I could not help myself. Her eyes were wet with excited tears. (That last half-hour atop a day of nervous suspense.) She turned to me suddenly and the fragrance of her lips almost brushed mine. Well—I lost my head. I not only admit it, but I shall never forget it. For one long delicious moment I held her throbbing against a wildly beating heart, my lips crushed down upon hers. And then in the insanity of the instant I imagined that hers clung just a wisp of time and that she was as relaxed as a sleepy child. The impression left me before I could grasp it—and I found myself stammering apologies to a haughtily silent little creature who admitted a frantically joyous puppy as if she turned to him for comfort and protection. It was too much. I drove in complete wordlessness to 7 Marbury Road.

She disdained the hand I offered to help her out and was delayed in her swift retreat only by Hel's decision to remain in the car. I took advantage of his alliance by a coldly formal observation:

"I am sure that your interested and disapproving maids will consider your return with the puppy sufficient excuse for this unconventional hour. As for the rest, you may tell your husband that I am any sort of a cad you choose."

With that I lifted the puppy out of the car and urged him up the walk by the scruff of the neck until her key opened the door to the darkness into which I thrust him. Then I ran—literally ran—back to the car and leaped in.

THE following week was the most utterly miserable length of days I have ever put in. Vainly I tried to convince myself that my mood was sheer repentance at my unforgivable lapses. I knew in my heart that the memory of it was my only torturing comfort.

The wretchedness of the days was broken by a joyous event on Friday. I was arrested upon the complaint of a farmer named Swenson. He had caught the number of my car and with a painstaking efficiency had run me down. My first reaction was a noble desire to sacrifice myself, but for only a moment did I overlook my heaven-sent opportunity.

Then I indignantly explained the whole matter to the officer. It was not my dog. Undoubtedly Burton had returned. I would take him out to East Cliffe at once in my car. Craftily I fancied that Burton would not be there in the morning. But we should see Hel—and Heaven.

I was wrong about Burton. Once again I had not counted upon the dog. His master was out upon the terrace busy with a badly snarled fishing-line. Hel had got into his fishing kit, he explained to us proudly and affectionately.

I introduced myself and our errand briefly. Upon the mention of my name he overwhelmed me with a lot of unnecessary gratitude. I disliked the fellow's palaver—but could not silence him.

"Rosamund can not say enough in your praise, Mr. Sayre," he insisted, with a gusto that I put down at once to a subtle method of concealing jealousy. "Really—we shall have to adopt you." He called to a passing maid. "Ask Mrs. Burton to come out upon the terrace. Speak the magic name of Sayre."

The maid grinned. I looked about nervously for means of escape. After all, I could not face those inscrutable eyes.

A fluting voice at my side turned me about quickly. A fluffy little blonde in delicate blue was holding out her hand ever so graciously.

"This is the marvelously kind Mr. Sayre, Blanche," Burton was reporting to her. "Ask him to dinner to-night so that he may see our kodak pictures of the trip and eat of the fish you caught."

I accepted frantically. I liked Burton at once. The very prince of a fellow to take me right into the family heart that way. The sun had suddenly sent a sheaf of brilliant rays upon the terrace and had turned me dizzy. I dutifully tried to make sense of what Mrs. Burton was saying, but it came to me only in fragments—like this:

"Wonderfully kind—can never thank you enough. Rosamund didn't know a soul—had only just arrived—that awful dog, but cunning, isn't he?—simply insisted on our not changing our plans—she needed a rest and wanted to be alone—but the dog. She's almost a wreck—really. Down in the garden now."

I DASHED to the garden. She was there—my gipsy, brilliant, laughing, holding out both hands to me, ringless hands that I caught to my breast. I choked as the words tumbled out of my heart:

"Then you are not his wife? Oh my dearest dear——"

The red lips lifted distractingly near. The dusky head shook dolefully:

"Only the old-maid sister," she whispered. "You gave me the other notion yourself, silly. The ring was mother's. I have always worn it until—now." The last word was smothered in coat lapels. "I want a new one—of platinum."

There was a sound behind me and her lifting face froze with horror. Then I remembered I had forgotten to close the gate of the garden—Hel had broken loose again.

THE INCREASING PURPOSE

"In saying just 'Poor Sim' like that—in understanding, in sympathizing. Elizabeth, there were things that simply would not come to me with Andrew. They come with you."

She said: "Tell me."

He had said that they came with her, yet he was not able at once to respond to her. When he spoke, he spoke suddenly, as a man entangled in a thicket suddenly will bring away an arm from the entangling brambles.

"Why, that they should come with you who sympathize, and not with Andrew who doesn't, somehow seems to be part of it. I don't see the connection—" Entangled, he halted, then made a sudden breakaway. "Yes, I do see it. It's what I tried to say to Andrew, the human standpoint, the seeing with the other person's eyes, the sharing of the other person's—" he stopped for the word, then said—"burden. Yes, it's that. What I couldn't say to Andrew, what I don't believe I knew—but what comes to me now, holding your hands——"

She pressed his hands! "Dear Sim!"

He gave her back her pressure; faintly smiled; but she could see more deeply the intensity of his face, struggling in that thicket.

"What comes to me now is that it isn't when they are at their desks that the employers are judged by the workers, and it isn't the—and it isn't when he's in his surplice that a clergyman is judged by his son—Elizabeth, it is when they are out about their common ways that people are judged."

He turned to her more closely.

"Elizabeth, it's not the fact of the contrast that is wrong—it's the way of the contrast. It is the taking their hearts with them when they leave their desks that makes the trouble. If those spenders, in their cars, from their restaurant tables and all that, could, as it were, look up and give a smile and a nod to the workers outside, the workers wouldn't mind a bit being outside. Mind you, the workers are helped by the employers—charities and new social laws and wider social ideas come from them and help the laborers a lot. But, Elizabeth, the employees are helped as a class. They are helped in office hours only. There is no human help, no heart help, and there never will be until the whole idea of help is not to help class solely, but to help humanity largely, mankind as one—the one that we all are, richest and poorest, ablest and dullest, best and worst, strongest and weakest."

He stopped, then said: "Elizabeth, when I say help, human help, heart help, I mean my hand, clean, trimmed, in my neighbor's hand, grimed, broken—your hand, white, soft, in the next woman's hand. worn, rough."

Inspired by his earnestness, "Oh, Sim!" she breathed.

He said after a moment: "I told Andrew that's where I am. But, Elizabeth, I don't know where I am going."

She said: "Sim, I think you are going to be true to yourself."

He muttered: "It's vague, that."

She said: "It isn't vague, Sim. Truth to oneself is not an indefinite going. It is a going very high. I think truth to oneself is about as high as a man can get."

He had gone over to the fireplace and stood, back to her, his chin on his hand. He seemed to shake his head.

She said: "Sim, I believe that if a man can get as high as truth to himself he is high enough for heaven to reach down and help him."

His shoulders made a movement of shaking off a touch. His voice came: "I don't think about that."

She said: "Sim, that was an astonishing expression you wrote to me. 'I believe that God is after me,' you said."

He put his arms on the mantelpiece before him and his forehead down on them. He raised his right foot and drubbed with his toe on the carpet.

Suddenly his hands pushed him from his pose and upright. He turned and came quickly to her where she sat on the couch.

"Elizabeth, I am frightfully perplexed," he said.

She gave him her hands. "Dear Sim!"

WHEN he was in the train, his ticket to Barton Magna in his pocket, his trunk in the baggage-van—for "I am clearing right out, Niggs," he had told Andrew, "I'm goose-chasing, but I'm going to catch that goose"—he was thinking during much of the journey of Linda and of Alice. Linda surprisingly had come to see him off and at the door of his carriage before the train moved had spoken surprizingly. Alice, as surprizingly encountered on the previous evening, also had spoken strangely. The odd thing was that both Linda and Alice in taking leave of him had used the same phrase and had broken it off precisely at the same place.

Alice had been met at Stupendity's, London's mammoth department store. He had gone there after leaving Elizabeth for some purchases before he left town and he had got himself wedged, as every visitor to Stupendity's got wedged, in the mob that stood about the lifts. Eight lifts, side by side, shot up and down ceaselessly all day at Stupendity's—but it was Sim's experience that, with all the Stupendity organization, the lifts invariably appeared all to be shooting either in the direction the mob did not wish to go or, without stopping, at great speed in the direction the mob did wish to go. He was standing, wedged, with the thought that he must speak to Stupendity's assistant, Lardy Quinnet, about this when he heard a voice immediately behind him say, "Alice, I think we had better not wait."

He turned quickly. Immediately behind him were Alice and Conrad Bryne. It seemed certain that it must have been Conrad Bryne who had spoken—but it could not, Sim told himself, for Bryne could not have called Charles's wife Alice. But the faces of both displayed an amazing confusion on seeing him. Sim when he left them, and now in the train, pondered that confusion. Now that he thought of it, he remembered during his stay with Charles—but that was ridiculous—but was it? It persisted——

Alice was up for some shopping, she explained, and right in this very crowd had run into Doctor Bryne. Wasn't it curious? And now, the two of them into him. Wasn't it curious? Her manner was extraordinarily perturbed. They both were catching the six-ten home, she said, and simply must fly for it. No use whatever waiting for this

Their splendid health started many babies on Eagle Brand

They are Patty Virginia, aged 3½ years, and Billie Ben Payne, 14 months old. Their parents are Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Payne of Appleton City, Mo.

"My two babies were raised from birth on Eagle Brand, and are such healthy, sturdy children," writes their mother. "Neither baby has ever had a touch of colic or summer complaint." They had no trouble cutting their teeth either

"Because of their unusually good health and development they have caused a number of mothers in this community to change the food of their babies to Borden's Eagle Brand."

Mrs. Payne gave her babies Eagle Brand on her nurse's recommendation.

Better evidence than words

Eagle Brand has started a million such babies on the road to sturdy, vigorous health. They are the best evidence in the world of why Eagle Brand Condensed Milk has been the accepted baby food for 68 years.

For milk is the natural food for babies, and Eagle Brand is pure, full-cream milk, combined with sugar in a special way that makes it extremely digestible. When properly diluted Eagle Brand more nearly resembles mother's milk than any other infant food.

If you have a feeding problem with your baby, put him on Eagle Brand. Give him the healthy start he has a right to have.

If you wish more evidence like the Payne children above, send the coupon for the new Borden booklet, What Other Mothers Say. Also Baby's Welfare, an authoritative book on the care of babies. Both books are free. Use the coupon below. The Borden Company, 512 Borden Building, 350 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y.

wretched lift. Down the stairs would be quicker, she thought.

"Me too," Sim said. "We'll never get in when a lift does come," and together they withdrew.

A convulsion of the mob had staggered Conrad Bryne from them while Alice was speaking. He rejoined them on the outskirts of the crowd and walked down the stairs with Sim, Alice in front. "Extraordinary, these meetings," he said. "I had run into Mrs. Paris not ten minutes before, in the entrance, just as I was coming in."

Alice was descending just in front of them. Sim saw the contour of her face turn crimson. Her story had been different.

He stood with the two on the pavement outside while they waited for their bus. Conrad Bryne went to the curb and looked along the road for the one they wanted. He made a considerable show of his occupation, getting on tiptoe, going out a few steps, peering around other advancing buses. His manner was not easy.

"I'm off to-morrow," Sim told Alice.

She put a quick hand on his arm. "Oh, Sim, where?"

He told her.

She had left her hand where she touched him. In the lamplight her face looked astonishingly pale, appealing. He felt her fingers press.

"Oh, I am sorry you are going," she said.

He smiled. "But we never see one another, Alice."

"But you have been, I had hoped you always would be, here, in reach."

She looked away, as if embarrassed. She looked at Conrad Bryne, bus-watching, as though she was very interested in what he was doing and was not interested in what she was saying. But she was interested in what she was saying. She gave Sim her eyes again. "You will be sure to send me your address, Sim?"

"Rather, Alice."

He felt the fingers on his arm close. "At once, Sim. The minute you know it."

"At once, rather." He laughed. "It's nice to be wanted like this."

She gave no responding smile. "Oh, you are wanted," she said, "more than you think, Sim. You——"

"Here's our bus," came Conrad Bryne's voice. "We had better hustle, Mrs. Paris."

Alice said: "Sim, I wish you were not going. There is a—a strength about you, Sim, you can't know, and I——"

She broke her sentence and turned and was helped by Bryne to struggle to a place into the bus.

THEN Linda.

Linda, who normally never appeared before midday, presented herself at breakfast that morning and told why. "Going to see you off, Sim. If I hadn't come down, ten to one you'd have changed your mind and not gone. When a good riddance to bad rubbish does come into my life, I like to make sure of it."

"You can make sure on your own wretched doorstep," Sim said. "You needn't come crying all over me in the cab."

"Ah, you don't slip me that way, young man," said Linda. "Don't think it. When a good riddance to bad rubbish does come into my life, I take mighty good care to be there for the last possible push. Wipe your mouth after you've drunk your tea, and let me get on with my letters."

She was in particularly rattling spirits as the cab took them to the station. She was even gayer as she stoob looking up at him while he leaned from the window of his compartment in the train. She looked at her wrist-watch and at the clock. "It's after the time. Just my luck if the engine's stuck and you don't go after all."

"Oh, heaven forbid!" Sim said. The train moved. "Ah, saved! We're off."

The laughter went from her eyes, the rattle from her tongue, as though in a room of mirth light and jolly music suddenly had been cut off. She said in an extraordinary voice, "Sim, I wish to God you weren't going."

"Linda!"

She had bitten on her lower lip. "Sim, what do you think of me?"

"The jolliest and the loveliest ever."

She was walking with the train, holding his hand.

"You think me all fun, all rattle. Sim, sometimes Andrew looks at me and I've a feeling—" she now had to release his hand. She squeezed it. "I wish to God you weren't going."

And then she used the very words that Alice had used. "Sim, there's a strength about you you can't know, and——"

She dropped his hand and stood away.

He waved to her. She was touching her eyes with her handkerchief.

He sat back and thought of her and of Alice.

HIS mind went to Elizabeth, and with Elizabeth, to this extraordinary step he now was taking. He was coming with all his worldly possessions to a place of which he had never previously heard; and he was coming because he could settle down to nothing and had the feeling that here, anywhere, so long as alone and quiet somewhere, he could think out things a bit, get toward this Purpose that mysteriously was influencing him.

He was taking no thought of the passage of time or countryside. He was startled, as a slowing up aroused his attention, to see on the name-board of a station Barton Magna.

"Getting out here, sir?" asked a porter through the window.

"You may well ask," said Sim, hurriedly collecting. "I jolly nearly missed it. You can shove these things in the cloak-room, will you, and I've a trunk in the baggage-van."

Barton Magna, as he came out of the station, presented itself to him as a picturesque old town standing, length without breadth, on either side of a turnpike highway, and giving somehow the suggestion of having deposited itself, house by house, on each flank of two notable inns, the Crown and the Bull, which faced one another at the street's center.

It had been a swift two-hour run from London. The hour was twelve. It was a March day, sun and a clear sky overhead. He pressed along, stick in hand, glad in the freedom of road after constraint of train. And as he came to cross-roads and glanced along them early Spring, bold beneath the rule of a mild Winter, peeped at him from the hedgerows. He looked up at the sign-post by which he stood. Leftward were indicated Barton Monkhouse, Barton Mill, and Longfield; to the right Barton Abbas, Shifney, and Stowhurst.

"They're fond of Barton hereabouts," was his comment. "But it's me for Longfield."

Air, sun, the road, feel of the stick in his hand, shook off from him the confinement of his thoughts on the train. He set up his shoulders, swung his stick and blithely went at it. His by-road, like a child leaving stern elders, kept straight while under the severe eye of the turnpike, ducked round a sudden corner, twisted quickly again, and thereafter, free, pranked here and there, this way and that, in jolly bends that were altogether delightful to him. He was walking, as he saw, along the slopes of a wide valley. Westward the downland climbed away in gentle contours; eastward, across the vale, a chain of hills upheld the sky. Along the valley he caught glimpses of a river. Church spires stood here and there, their settlements about them. Away on his right he saw the towered outline of what seemed to be a considerable residence, parked, wooded. To his left there seemed, in its straight line, to partner it, another stately mansion.

The road with more capricious wriggle yet went almost S-shaped through a pleasant village. A water-mill ran here, and the hood of a wagon standing outside a granary showed him "George Ullyett, Barton Mill." Longfield, that hiding-place of B. C. D.'s "to bunk to," still lay ahead.

BUT he did not reach Longfield. There stopped him on his road, as he went farther on, a cottage that he thought had dropped with its surroundings from the sketch-book of some artist. Sim knew nothing about period cottages nor, stopping to look at this, desired to be told. He saw only a roof of mellowed thatch, walls of brick of deepest red, two massive doors framed in great timbers yet more massive, wide, low windows ranged to show two floors, some outbuildings, a bricked path, mossy between its stones, coming down the garden toward him. His mind received a picture of an exquisite tranquillity.

He thought: "Now that's where I would like to——"

It came into his mind that B. C. D., experienced tramper, would make nothing of inquiring if a bed might be had here. So he opened the gate, went to the nearer door, and tried, as he said to himself, his luck.

His luck was in. He took an immediate fancy to the face of the woman who opened the door to him, a woman of about sixty, of a countenance worn yet singularly mild. But with the action of opening to him she looked him swiftly up and down, and he was astonished to see an expression of fear stand within her eyes.

"Have you come from Mr. Hignett, sir?"

"I haven't," Sim said, and saw immense relief upon her face.

"I thought you must have, sir, looking at you," she said. "But even though you've not, it is my duty to tell to all the like of you that this cottage"—her voice faltered a note—"is for sale, sir."

Sim gave the friendly Sim laugh. "By Jove, I wish I could buy it," he said. "No, I only wanted to ask you——"

She had seemed to hold her breath while she awaited his reply. When she had it, further relief came into her face, and she said very warmly, "Ah, won't you step inside, sir?"

HE ACCEPTED her welcome, entering a kitchen, equipped and shining—pewter, brass, black oak, a fire of logs—just as it might have been equipped and have shone two centuries ago. He knew perfectly well now the cause of her agitation. She was in dread that her house was to be sold. Looking about him, Sim well could understand her dread.

She went to a door standing on his left as he had entered and opened it. "You better had come in here, sir. It's but my kitchen, this. And 'tis my duty the like of you should see the best."

Sim followed her. "I say, that's a room!" was his exclamation.

It was beamed above, paneled about. An immense fireplace, twin to the one he had seen in the kitchen, stood in the great thickness of the wall through which he had entered. A range of latticed windows was on his left. Against the right-hand window a stairway climbed. Taking all in, "This is a room!" he said again.

The woman was pleased. " 'Tis pleasant," she said. " 'Tis visitors' room, as we call it, my Yeoman and me, though sad fear we have—" she smiled at him—"of visitors coming to it."

Her smile won his. "If I were you, I'd not let a soul see it, nor your kitchen either, for that matter. You're worrying some one will buy the place, I can tell that——"

She sighed. "We surely are, my Yeoman and me."

Yeoman, he thought, must be her dog. "But showing it all like this," he said, "why ask me in? You throw it at people."

"Why, 'tis my duty, sir," she said. "That is the 'greement that we may bide, my Yeoman and me, that we keep all this—" she gestured a hand about the room—"to rights and do our level utmost for to show and to attract all of the likes of you." A bowl of flowers from which two leaves had fallen stood on a central table whose surface gleamed in deep black pool. She picked up the leaves, touched the flowers here and there to their better display and with a cloth she held in her hand polished the pool whereon the leaves had floated.

" 'Tis duty," she said simply.

An ennobled sense of duty, Sim thought, match to the simple beauty of her face. "What I ventured in for," he said, and hesitated a little over his words, "was to ask whether I could get a bed here for a night—in fact, seeing that you have these rooms, for a bit longer—a lodging for a little time?"

Her answer delighted him: "Why, we never have done it, sir, my Yeoman and me—but that's for that we've never had no offer for to do it. These surely are anxious days for us, not knowing when our roof must change, nor where to find another, and welcome the few shillings we might ask would be." She smiled at him. "And if 'tis not bold, sir," she added, "there is this more to it, that I like thy face."

"Why, I like yours," said Sim.

She smiled again delightfully. "Would you best first see the room above?"

"I'd like to," Sim told her; "not that I mind tuppence what it's like after what I've seen down here." But when he saw the bedroom he was further enchanted.

He spoke of terms and these were easy; of returning to Barton Magna for his things, and found it as easy to agree to her suggestion that first she should give him a bite of lunch. While she set out cold sundries on the table in her kitchen—"more cozy here with fire and I'll put light in other hearth while you be gone—" he walked in an extraordinary sense of happiness about the room that was to be his. This place, everything about it, every aspect of it, caused in him that sense of high content, a mingling of satisfaction and of elation, that comes solely with some task well achieved, a day well spent, a duty well performed. He best could liken it to the glorious feeling, mental and physical, with the first pipe and stretch before the fire after a tremendous match in his old football days.

" 'Tis ready now, sir," he heard the voice from the kitchen, and he went to it very happily.

THE woman was leaving the kitchen by a farther door as he entered it. "I'll draw thee pot of ale, sir," she said (he noticed and liked the occasional thee's and thou's): and in a moment she was back with it, its foaming head pressing up from the pewter.

He remembered that his address must be sent to Elizabeth, to Alice, to Andrew. "The cottage has a name?" he questioned.

"Old Ballard's, 'tis called," she told him.

"I like the sound of that," he said, "and the thought of it. Old Ballard's is the cottage, then, but I don't know your name yet. Mine is Paris."

"Same like the town in France, sir?"

"Same like that little town," Sim said gravely.

"Yeoman is mine, sir," she told him.

Again the sound of a name rejoiced him. How all things here seemed to maintain the atmosphere and the content he had out of that atmosphere! Old Ballard's, this abode of rural, ancient peace; Yeoman, this type of gentle, courteous country stock. But Yeoman? "Me and my Yeoman," as she had frequently spoken? Clearly no dog, as he had thought, but kin. He wanted to discover this identity, sought in his mind for a way to put the question, and unwittingly received the answer without doing so.

The cloth she had set for him covered only half the table. Beside it stood a lamp and beside the lamp a very large and extraordinarily thick and clumsily leaved book. Debating the form of his question, he put out a hand and twisted the back of the volume toward him: "Gospel According to St. Matthew: Braille," he read. Braille? The type the blind read? Some one here was blind? He looked up. Her eyes had followed his, and he said questioningly, "Braille?"

"Ay, that's my Yeoman's," she said. "My Yeoman's blind," she added softly.

The caress of her voice, its implication of a very great tenderness, made the right comment a little difficult to find.

"That's sad," Sim said.

"But he surely is wonderful," she told him. "You never would know it, not to see him." Her voice in these proud affirmations had been strong again. "He is my brother, Yeoman," she said—and again her voice was dropped to that uncommon tenderness which made the fitting comment hard to find.

"Ah, yes," said Sim, "and just you two here, just your brother and you?"

"And has been twenty year," she said. "Daily since ever this lightness came over him."

She meant of course, darkness, Sim thought. "Lightness?" he questioned with a smile.

She smiled in return. " 'Tis custom of saying it," she said. "Affliction he will not have it called, nor darkness neither, my Yeoman. His eyes were opened when his eyes were closed, he says." She touched the Braille Gospel. "Of God, sir," she said.

He had nothing to say to that. Associations disturbing to him were in the phrase 'of God', and he was in mood too content to invite disturbance. Taking advantage of his silence, "I'll go tell my Yeoman of thee," she said; "I've had no minute yet." She went to the farther door; and as she left him, "You will think that strange, the calling of my brother by our name of family." She smiled to him. " 'Tis of hearing him ever so called, same as I am Margaret to all, when we worked, him and me, him in the fields, me within, for the great house in the Barton time. 'Tis custom did it; but 'tis odd to strangers."

Sim smiled at her. "I like it very much as you say it—'my Yeoman'—it sounds good to me."

She was pleased. "Well, I will go tell him of thee. Name of Paris, sir?"

"Name of Paris," smiled Sim, and she was gone.

ALMOST immediately, his meal finished, he too went out. He saw, from the small lawn and kitchen garden in the rear, gates opening to small orchard and to paddock; he saw and entered a roomy, disused stable—"only wants a horse," was his thought. Then he heard voices in the coach-house that adjoined and went to them.

The door stood open. Margaret Yeoman was here and here was a carpenter's workshop, bench, tools, and at the back a wide and low rustic seat, newly stained.

From this seat, as Sim advanced, there turned toward him, chisel in hand, an old man, Margaret Yeoman standing beside him.

"Ah, here is the gentleman!" Margaret Yeoman exclaimed, and to Sim, "My Yeoman, sir."

An inscription, a line of lettering, ran along the top of the rustic seat. The old man, who seemed to have been working on the letters, now crossed directly to the carpenter's bench, laid down his chisel, took up a piece of cloth, wiped his hands, stepped carefully around a trestle which stood between him and the entrance and, approaching Sim, took without groping or fumble the hand which Sim extended.

Could he indeed be blind? Sim thought. His eyes, very blue, were open and moved while the three spoke from one to the other precisely as if he saw them. He was clearly much older than his sister, a man of eighty, as Sim was to learn. He was middle-height, bent with that ponderous stoop of massive shoulders above a powerful chest, so different from the city desk-man's feeble stoop. He was clean-shaven. His face had, as his sister's had, but in degree more marked, that smooth and placid look, gleaming and suggestive of transparency that is presented at the base of cliffs by rocks submerged at every tide—not fretted, scarred, abrased as are those others higher placed that still resent and spurn the stress of the persistent sea. He had the look of a man who stands at evening in his doorway, the day's work done, wide space before him; within, his house in order.

Sim took the conversation at once to his delight in their cottage. "Ay, 'tis our home," old Yeoman said. Sim now further heard that it was of the Barton estate, all the Barton villages comprising the property. They had lived in it, the pair, ever since by an accident the old man's blindness had come to him. Twelve years they solely had occupied it; then had died the last of the Bartons of the great house who had kept them there; the estate had been sold; its purchaser had restored the two cottages, making them one, to their present condition and in it had installed his agent, a bachelor, the Yeomans attending his wants. Now the agent had married, was away these weeks on his honeymoon, was returning to a larger residence and this, no longer required by him, was to be sold.

Sim thought the case hard. Using the term used by them, "Why should the great house sell the place?" he asked. He was told in explanation that all Barton Mill was being cut away from the estate and put on the market.

Chafing must not mar his precious sleepy time

Why each year over 1,000,000 mothers of new babies choose this Baby Powder

OF all the ills that beset the young baby going through his first summer, the most common are chafing and skin rash.

Scrupulous cleansing, careful drying and "the free use of toilet powder" are time-tried means of keeping down rashes and lessening the chances of those dreaded skin eruptions that so often precede more serious disorders.

It was at the request of doctors, and from a formula they themselves prescribed, that this perfect baby powder was made by Johnson and Johnson, in the laboratories where already over four hundred of the finest antiseptic articles had long been prepared. A baby powder that is unexcelled for antiseptic purity and fineness.

Just dust it on after baby's bath, to absorb the last little trace of moisture and to keep perspiration down. And use it every time you "change" him, too, to prevent chafing.

Half the mothers of new babies in America are already using this safe and authorized powder for their little ones!

If you are not yet using Johnson's baby powder write this very day for the little can of powder and the book offered free, below.

"THE SKIN OF THE YOUNG BABY is very delicate, and chafing and other eruptions easily occur unless special care is exercised. The main things to be secured are cleanliness and the free use of toilet powder.

THE INCREASING PURPOSE

"And the great house," he questioned, "that's out that way, I suppose?" and pointed in the direction in which on his walk he had seen a towered residence across the valley. "That castle-looking sort of place, eh?"

As if he could see the extended arm, "Nay, Chesney Towers that way," old Yeoman said; "yonder is the great house," and he indicated with his head the quarter behind him.

Chesney Towers, Sim was told, formerly in ruins, had been lavishly converted into a residence by one who had sought to restore to it the splendors that it had had aforetime. "Drawbridge and all, and all the old customs done there now, so they do say," Margaret Yeoman said. When he asked who owned it, he was told: "A great London gentleman and with that great shop that is in the papers so frequent, Mr. Stupendity."

Sim carefully indicated no more than polite interest, and inquired as to the great house. "Ah, that's Longfield way. 'Tis Staverton Park," old Yeoman said. And Sim exclaimed, "Staverton Park! What, Lord Staverton's place? Lord Staverton lives there?"

"Ay, Lord Staverton, be sure."

It was extraordinary.

"If you are going to Barton Magna, sir—" Margaret Yeoman was saying to him.

"I very much am," said Sim. With the coincidence of Andrew's chief having here his country seat—frequently Andrew had written to him from it—owning this very cottage on which he had so happily chanced, had come to him an idea wildly audacious, wildly tempting. "I very much am," he repeated.

"Why, then," continued Margaret, "here is one would run you there quick."

SIM looked to her pointing and saw at the gate a baker's motor delivery-van, its driver coming with his basket up the path. The arrangement was made for him, and he soon was speeding back to town over the road he had walked.

"Do you know a man in Barton Magna called Hignett?" he had asked the baker as they drove, remembering Miss Yeoman's words, "Are you from Mr. Hignett?" when she had opened her door to him.

"Ay, 'twould be Mr. Hignett, the house agent."

"That's the man," said Sim and almost quivered.

He was set down at a tiny office, the half of a divided shop—opposite the post-office, as he noticed. Within was a rather affected-looking young man engaged in attending to his hands by paring his nails and to his feet by warming them at an oil-stove. The reek of the stove caused Sim to give a "woof" of disfavor as he entered—and the woof of disfavor caused the young man to assume a superior indifference.

"I've been looking at a place of yours, of Lord Staverton's," Sim said, "a cottage, Old Ballard's, at Barton Mill. What would Lord Staverton take for it?"

The significant words, "take for it" (significant of a purse ill-prepared), caused the house agent to fit himself more firmly into his professional robe. "The price of that property," said he, delivering the word with acid rebuke, "is seven hundred pounds."

Sim made again the mental balancing of his ledgers which he had made a dozen times coming along the road. Active service throughout the whole of the war had kept him from spending money; his bonus had added to his savings; almost seven hundred pounds stood, he estimated, to his credit.

"Yes, but what would he take, I'm asking?" he said.

The house agent bent to adjust the wick of the stove. "He would take," he said, bent, "the price—seven hundred pounds."

"Would he take five hundred?"

"He certainly would not" said the house agent, "nor yet six hundred." He drew a catalog toward him and indifferently turned the leaves. "The Staverton estates," he said, "do not entertain offers."

Sim smiled cheerfully. "Well, you don't seem to entertain fresh air," he said, "but it doesn't follow you won't get it. I'll leave the door open."

He went out briskly across the road, heard the door slammed violently behind him, and entered the post-office. This was Andrew's day and hour to be in the Fenchurch Street offices. He looked at the clock—just after three. He could get a reply in two hours. He wrote a telegram.

"Get Staverton to sell me Old Ballard's cottage here for five hundred pounds. I want it. Reply immediately, Barton Magna Post-Office."

He went to the station and arranged for a cab to take him and his belongings to Barton Mill. He passed the best part of an hour about the town, in the ancient Guild Hall and elsewhere. There was a fine church, but he would not enter it. The best part of another hour he spent over tea in the Crown. Time did not drag—he was keenly excited and it went swiftly. Shortly before five he went to the post-office. Yes, there was a telegram for him. Andrew's imperturbable nature was in the two words which it contained:

"It's yours."

Sim gave a short laugh.

"Well, I have done a mad thing."

BUT mad nor wild, reckless nor foolish, he had not room to feel it, when, returned, he paced about the apartment that now was his own habitation. An extraordinary fullness of completion, of tranquillity, of settlement possessed him.

In the evening he wrote to Elizabeth. There was immense amount to tell and he was long and intimate in the telling. When he had described the emotion with which the Yeomans had received his news, he continued:

"The old man is a quite wonderful carpenter—no, much higher grade than carpenter, woodworker is more the word. Do you know that from something he is doing I have suddenly—almost as I write—the glimmer of an idea of something that I shall do down here—design for him and help him make (I've a turn for carpentry, you know) bits of furniture. He is himself making something that does absolutely express what he means it to be—and you know that is what the great periods of furniture did. Elizabeth, I believe I could express this present-day period of ours in furniture design—this period of England as she rose to the war, in hell to her waist, her brow to the stars. (A joke, though, if my Purpose turned out to be that I became a Sheraton or a Chippendale or one of those chaps.)

"Old Yeoman has been making wayside seats to put on the hilly roads about here. One is finished and he is working on another. There are five 'main toiling' hills about here and five seats he intends to do. 'My work for the weary ones', he told me; 'and then maybe I shall climb my hill,' he said. Elizabeth, don't you think there is something rather beautiful in the idea? And listen: along the back of each seat he is carving, 'Rest, Passer-by; then cheerily on. Peace on thy habitation, Passer-by.' "

Sim finished his writing there. He sat a long time looking at the inscription he had copied.

There came to him at intervals through the dividing door the murmur of old Yeoman's voice—from the sister, curiously, no response that he could hear. He got up and went into the kitchen and discovered the reason. Margaret Yeoman sat by the fire, knitting. At the table was old Yeoman, his Braile Gospel before him, his fingers working upon it. He spent every evening thus, the two told him. He read to himself until their bedtime. When that arrived, he took pleasure in "finding messages" three for his sister, three for himself. He found them by closing the volume, inserting in it a paper knife he had, and the "message" was the text his fingers read at the point of the knife.

Sim, wishing to show an interest, said lightly:

"You'd better find me a message, Yeoman."

The old man was very glad to. He closed the volume, inserted his knife, opened at the place, and put his fingers to the blade's point. The shock of his first word caused Sim to lose the two immediately following. Old Yeoman's deep voice read:

"Simon . . . him they compelled to bear His cross."

He added to his letter: "Elizabeth, I believe that God is after me."

NOW in a habitation of his own, Sim Paris began to gather about him pursuits and occupations. He developed, surprizing himself by his facility, that idea of furniture design of which he had written to Elizabeth; he got a horse; he came to know families round about the Barton villages. And to Staverton Park and to Chesney Towers came at intervals older friends.

Lord Staverton made week-end visits to his country seat, Andrew with him, and, when he entertained there, Linda with Andrew. He gave Sim, for Sim's riding, the run of Staverton Park.

Over at Chesney Towers, Mr. Stupendity's visits (almost a week-end certainty) were gatherings of great distinction. Here the giant of merchandise, cut off by his drawbridge, served in his baronial hall, and here with him were always his shadow, Miss Marr, and the shadow's shadow, Lardy Quinnet.

And here also, very often, was Elizabeth, who was engaged in cataloging the Stupendity (Chesney Towers) library.

On one occasion of a Stupendity visit to the Towers, Sim rather diffidently had shown Lardy and Miss Marr, calling on him at old Ballard's, sketches of that furniture designing, "expressive of something," to which he had been turning his attention. He had shown them also a light armchair, the first actual product of his idea, and an octagonal table, the second—this still in process of construction. The chair had been made in the village by an unemployed disabled soldier, formerly a cabinet-maker; the table was being done by old Yeoman. Increasingly interested as he proceeded on his notion, Sim had advanced from rough, idle sketches to studied designs, painstakingly drawn presented (with the aid of a small box of paints) in color. The work had fascinated him.

It fascinated his callers.

"Why, Major Paris, these are exquisite!" cried Miss Marr.

"Sim, old man," declared Lardy, "you've rushed in where idiots fail to tread—or whatever the thing is. This is something new, you know. The chap who made that chair was a bit of a genius."

Miss Marr turned to look as if with new eyes at Sim. "I would say," she answered slowly, "that it is Major Paris who is the genius."

"I say, Sim," Lardy burst forth, "this stuff of yours hits me hard in my capacity as Brain. I've got an idea. I'm going to collar those designs and the chair. I'm going to show them to old Stupendity."

"Oh, come and have some tea," said Sim.

LARDY, however, abetted by Miss Marr, had collared designs and chair and a fortnight later the table. He had very greatly interested Mr. Stupendity in them and he had very greatly interested Mr. Bevis, the head of the Stupendity furniture department. "This is a discovery, sir," he had said, speaking with that earnestness which, when he displayed it, caused even Miss Marr to suspect that he was indeed a Brain—and Mr. Stupendity and Mr. Bevis had agreed with him that a discovery indeed it was.

"If we are going to run this furniture, sir, and of course we are," said Mr. Bevis, a man who from long association with furniture appeared to have a polished face, "the first thing for it is——"

"A distinctive name," said Mr. Stupendity, part of whose wonder in the eyes of all departments was the unerring swiftness with which he took unspoken words out of their mouths. "Have you a name for it, Quinnet?"

Lardy put his hand to the back of his head as if possibly a name might be there. "Not slick off, sir."

"Bevis?"

Mr. Bevis put a finger down the polish of his cheek and looked at it as if possibly the name might there be reflected. "Not at the moment, sir."

"Come, come," said Mr. Stupendity sharply. "Surely it is known by now that when a scheme is brought to me I expect it to be a completed scheme and that the first essential in a scheme of this description is a name."

" 'Stupendity Furniture,' " exclaimed Mr. Bevis, who now had drawn finger and thumb down the polish of his face and, with a start, appeared to find this written between them.

"Stuff-and-nonsense furniture," said Mr.

Stupendity. "There are immense possibilities in these designs. This is something new, and furniture design has had nothing new (and has cried out for something new) ever since we fell back on copying the old. 'Stupendity Furniture' would be to localize this furniture, to shop it. The idea of a distinctive, appealing, national furniture is here. The name must be a distinctive, appealing name. Miss Marr——"

"Simparis furniture," said Miss Marr.

"Gosh!" said Lardy, stunned.

"The name is found," said Mr. Stupendity, not stunned, he was so accustomed to have spring from his shadow anything he desired immediately he desired it that he took it always as if it had sprung from himself. "The name is Simparis Furniture. Get busy on that, Bevis, Quinnet. Miss Marr, arrange for me to see this Major Paris when we next go to Chesney Towers."

LARDY QUINNET spied Sim soon afterward at a large afternoon reception at the Towers, and hastened over to acquaint him with these developments. But Sim, as Lardy edged his way toward him, was seen by him to be leaving by a farther door. And Lardy, for a reason, decided that he would go over and talk with him on the morrow, not follow him now. He had come to know Sim very intimately by this proximity of the Towers and Old Ballard's, and he had come to adjust himself to periods of abstraction in his friend when company clearly was not desired. Profound abstraction of that sort was on Sim's face now as he was leaving. "There's something up with that chap," was Lardy's thought, watching him.

It was the echo of a comment made by Charles many months before. It now was deeper justified.

Sim had ridden over. Elizabeth, on her cataloging occupation, was not due that week; but there always was the chance (Mr. Stupendity being Mr. Stupendity) that she might have been snapped into the Stupendity entourage at the last moment, and it was to take that chance that Sim had come. It failed him. A word with a servant in the entrance informed him of the fact; but just to make sure he had glanced in on the party dispersed about the dais in the baronial hall. He stood a moment and then withdrew, observed only by Lardy.

Sim's horse—he had said he might not be long—was being walked by a groom in the courtyard. He mounted, not with his usual careless ease, but slowly, as though his thoughts weighed upon him; and he rode away toward Old Ballard's with mien of one much occupied, the pace and the direction left to his horse's choosing.

After a while the horse stopped. Sim saw himself to be at the foot of a long rise of field that led to Barton Mill. He raised his eyes. Their direction was westward. The sun was setting. Clear and flushed rose and gold above, the sky below was deeply black. Upon the blackness, midway to the horizon, trailed a long thin cloud of gray. The sun, just gone beneath the black, gave the trailing cloud a faintest gleam.

There rose to Sim's thought, as spectral figures merging in a mist, words spoken to him which, ever since their speaking, had stood within the circle of his mind as bleak sign-posts stand on a moor. Always his daily thoughts were turning to these posts. One was Elizabeth's words, "of God"—that sudden and astonishing conception come out of her like a cry upon the night of their reunion. Another was an astounding thing dropped from old Yeoman when, setting him to work upon the table, he had essayed to explain to him the theory of his designs in furniture. "Trying to express myself, to express an idea," he had said to that blind old man, "in wood, Yeoman. Artists express themselves in colors, in words, in stone. Well, I don't see why a man can't express himself in wood." Old Yeoman's reply, "In wood? It hath been done, sir. Aye, mightiest expression of a man ever the world knew hath been in wood." "What, Yeoman?" Sim had asked. And the astounding answer: "Sir, the Cross of Christ."

SIGN-POSTS! Those were two; and joining them, most potent and disturbing of them, stood also that strange appearance of his name in the text that old Yeoman with his paper-knife and with his Braille Gospel had found for him. "Message!" that old man had called it. Message! Urgently, since first these perplexities had come upon him, Sim had desired some message, some help, some guide that might deliver him out of his perplexities. "Him they compelled—compelled—to bear His Cross." This was not message; this was doom.

His horse, now slowly walking, had brought him to the brow of a long rise. He stopped it. He was desperately troubled in his mind. He drew rein and the eyes that now he raised were heavy with his great unhappiness. The sky had changed. The colors that the sun had left above the dark bank of clouds were almost gone. It was within these clouds which in a black wall stood upon the margin of the earth that light was coming now. While he looked, the gray trail that ran along them, and that had faintly gleamed, now by the sun's descent was seen as a fissure dividing an upper and a lower bank. While Sim looked, the fissure (the sun descending to it) was filled with a great light.

Memory stirred.

Where was it, and on whom, that suddenly a light shone—a light shined—a light shined from the sky—what were these stirring, buried words? Ah—that suddenly a light shined round about from heaven.

Memory, encouraged, sprang.

It was Saul.

Fragmentarily, not to the verse, but certainly in half-caught phrases, it all returned to him. "Saul, Saul, it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks, and Saul said, Lord, what wilt thou have me do?"

SIM got off his horse. He was shaking with a very great trembling. He put his arms on the saddle before him and leaned his weight against it. Men do not utter to themselves their thoughts aloud; but beneath Sim's great trembling, his jaws, as of a man shivering, were shaking, and in shaking words his thoughts came out.

"That was Paul," he said, "in conversion. Conversion does not come like that. It comes of something actual. Nothing is here."

A little afterward he said: "I do not want conversion. It is nothing to me. I do not want it. It is nothing."

And after a little again: "It comes of desire of it. I have not desired it. It comes of a something definite, something actual. Nothing is here."

He raised his eyes across the saddle-bow and now was something. Where in the fissure of the clouds had been a bright light in a single place now was a path of light. It ran from the extreme brightness of the sun southward and downward; and by the formation of the river bank it presented the aspect of a road of light, broad and gently rising to where the strong light burned, running along a dark and enormous cliff, bounded by a cliff as dark, as huge, towering above it. He began to say:

"Mother, I am your Sim, and I am frightfully unhappy. I am talking to you now, looking at that road, because I have the vision that it is down a road like that, gloriously gleaming, that you will come one day to meet me. Mother, I would to God it might be now, here at this moment, because I am frightfully unhappy, mother. You have told me—one of your beloved messages to me—that you want me to be happy. Mother, in these last months I have tried to be. I can not be. I only want to come to you as I used to come home to you, and you waiting for me. Beloved, I can see you, see you in your every line, treading down that path to take me up. 'Sim!' I can hear your voice. And I shall answer, 'Mother!' And I shall take again those soft dear hands of yours, touch that dear face, look into those dear and loving eyes, kiss those beloved lips. Oh, mother——"

He said to her after a little while:

"Your face? Your voice? Your hands, eyes, lips? It may not be so. Earthbound, I have no other terms in which to think of you. Earthbound, I can not know the form that you will have. Mother, I only know that when I cross and see that path and you upon it coming to me, I only know that you, whom I remember worn, sick with much suffering, bowed with many griefs, desirous of my hand at every feeble step to help you, then will be exquisite in strength, sublime in knowledge. I only know that I, who, when we were together, was prop and guidance, then will be faint with great dismay—only that then it will be I shall be the weak and helpless, much afraid, you the strong, the guide, to——"

He bit upon his lower lip and kept it bitten.

He released at last his lip and said:

"The guide to God."

A sense of a very great comfort came over him. He had refused himself that last word, and while he refused it the eyes with which he had envisaged his mother coming to him had envisaged himself flung in pose not possible to living limbs—as is a body found at daybreak flung and abandoned by the tide upon the shore. He had said the word which he refused to say—and the eyes of his vision had seen his mother stoop to touch him.

IT WAS gone. His mind gave up the images it had conceived. It left him only that sense of a great quiet which instantly, with his speaking of that word, had come to him. He seemed to have no thoughts—peace only.

He put his arm through his horse's bridle and with no declared intention went down the track that brought him to the road where stood the church of Barton Mill. He never yet—often wishing to—had entered it. He had withstood giving himself to influences which there might come upon him.

He tethered his horse outside the gate, went up the path and entered. He was alone in the church and he seated himself, then knelt.

He had no voice for this. First for a long time he knelt in consciousness alone of that great stillness that had filled him. His thoughts, no voice, then said:

"If I am shown herein my purpose and know the purpose Thine; if, as with Saul, I have had summons, not by desire, not by prayer, not by constraint of sorrow, but unsought of Thee; if, as with Simon, it is mine to bear Thy cross; if these, O God, then suffer me some truth that I can understand."

No more; and remained thus.

ASK US

Ask us anything you want to know about housekeeping and we will answer it personally. From our recent correspondence we publish the following questions and answers as being of general interest to all home-makers

QUESTION—Will you please tell me how to remove fruit-stains?

Answer—Use boiling water for white or fast-colored washable materials. Stretch the stained material over a bowl or other vessel, holding it in place by a string or an elastic band and pour boiling water upon it from a teakettle, holding it at a height of three or four feet so that the water may strike the stain with force. In stains in which fruit-pulp is present a little rubbing alternated with applications of boiling water is helpful.

A stain remaining after this treatment frequently can be bleached by hanging the wet material in the sun to dry.

QUESTION—I have a matting rug which is badly faded and dingy-looking, but it is otherwise in good condition. Is there any way I can improve it?

Answer—Yes. Matting rugs may be painted successfully. First clean the matting, then scrub it with soap and water and let it dry. It will take several days to dry and may need to be hung where the air will reach it. After it is dry stretch it flat on the floor and fasten at the four corners. Paint it the desired color, using a good floor-paint. When the first coat of paint is dry, apply a second coat. When dry, the rug should be ready for use and will probably last much longer than new matting, particularly if it receives a new coat of paint each year.

QUESTION—Will you please give me a recipe for a sirup which can be used in making iced or hot cocoa?

Answer—

¼ pound cocoa	1 quart boiling water
½ pound sugar	⅛ teaspoon salt
⅛ cup flour	1 teaspoon vanilla

Mix the dry ingredients. Pour boiling water on gradually, stir until smooth and cook over hot water from two to four hours. Add to hot milk to make hot cocoa, or to cold milk in making iced cocoa, allowing one tablespoon of sirup to each cup of milk.

Irresistible is the charm of a smooth clear skin

NO OTHER element of beauty has the alluring appeal of a fresh, velvety skin, glowing with health and color. Every man admires it and nature intended every woman to possess it.

But no skin, however lovely, will retain its beauty unaided and thousands of women have found the solution of their problem in the daily use of Resinol Soap. There are three excellent reasons why this soap appeals so strongly to the woman who wishes to preserve or restore the fresh, youthful charm of her complexion.

First, it is a decidedly pleasing toilet soap giving a quantity of creamy, pore-searching lather that invigorates while it cleanses.

Then its ingredients are absolutely pure and wholesome. There is no trace of free alkali—that harsh, drying chemical which makes so many ordinary soaps injurious to the skin and hair.

But best of all it contains the soothing Resinol properties which give it that distinctive, refreshing fragrance and rich color, and cause it to keep the skin clear and velvety. It leaves nothing to be desired for a toilet soap.

For special irritations, apply a little Resinol Ointment and see how quickly it clears them away. This healing ointment has also been used successfully for years for the relief of itching, burning skin troubles. Your druggist sells the Resinol products.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

6148—Bordered wide silks such as crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe or crêpe satin with plain to match make this one-piece frock that slips on over the head and has a straight lower edge. It may have a trimming band on the skirt when made of flat crêpe, etc.

34 bust or 17 years requires 1⅝ yards 54-inch bordered silk. Lower edge 44 inches.

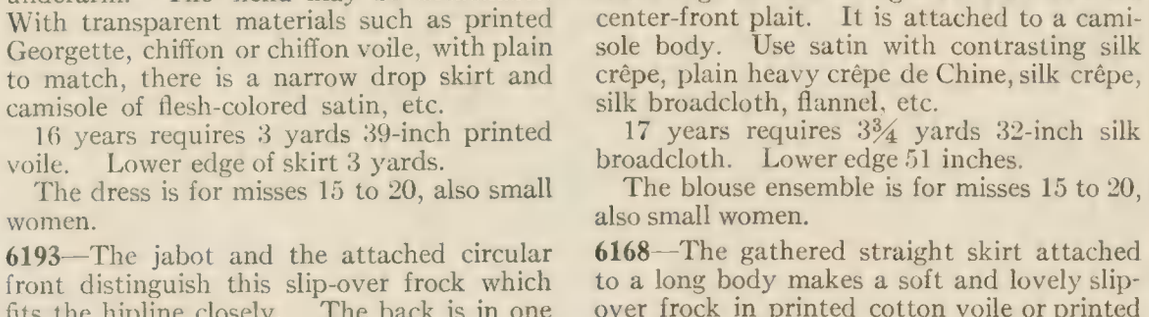
The dress is for misses 16 to 18 years, or 33 to 35 bust, also ladies.

6211—The collar of this blouse ensemble or jumper dress may be buttoned up into a high neck. The slip-over blouse has a straight lower edge and the straight skirt an inverted center-front plait. It is attached to a camisole body. Use satin with contrasting silk crêpe, plain heavy crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, silk broadcloth, flannel, etc.

17 years requires 3¾ yards 32-inch silk broadcloth. Lower edge 51 inches.

The blouse ensemble is for misses 15 to 20, also small women.

6168—The gathered straight skirt attached to a long body makes a soft and lovely slip-over frock in printed cotton voile or printed fine cotton crêpe with harmonizing organdy; or crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma, Georgette or crêpe satin, plain or printed with plain, etc. The collar and cuffs may be detachable.



16 years requires 2⅞ yards 39-inch printed cotton voile. Lower edge 1⅞ yard.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years.

6161—Opportunities for a play on stripes are suggested by this slip-over frock with its straight band lengthening the one-piece upper part. Use crêpe de Chine, silk broadcloth, cotton broadcloth or light-weight cotton crêpe, striped with plain to match, etc.

33 bust or 16 years requires 3 yards 32 or 35 inch striped silk. Lower edge 51 inches.

It is for misses 16 to 18 years or 33 to 35 bust, also ladies.

it is so easy

No SCRUBBING. No hard work. Simply sprinkle Sani-Flush into the toilet bowl—follow directions on the can—and flush. Watch every mark, stain and incrustation disappear. See how beautifully white and shining it leaves the porcelain.

Sani-Flush is made for just one purpose. It cleans and sanitizes the toilet bowl and hidden, unhealthful trap. It destroys all foul odors. There is nothing else that will do the same work.

Sani-Flush will not harm plumbing connections. Always keep a can handy in the bathroom.

Buy Sani-Flush at your grocery, drug or hardware store, or send 25c for a full-size can.

6157—A soft type of frock has a straight gathered flounce attached across the front. This is a one-piece dress and it slips on over the head. Make it of printed crêpe de Chine, printed Georgette or foulards with matching Georgette; or use printed cotton voile, printed fine cotton crêpe with plain to match; crêpe Roma, crêpe de Chine, Georgette, etc.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 40-inch printed Georgette. Lower edge 1⅝ yards.

The dress is attractive for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6185—The vogue of front fulness finds a new way to present itself. A box-plaited section is inserted across the front of a one-piece frock that slips on over the head and fits closely at the hipline. The dress may have a body lining. Use flannel; or heavy silk crêpe with satin, or satin with silk crêpe in self or harmonizing color; wool crêpe with contrasting or with silk crêpe, etc. Lower edge with plaits drawn out 1⅞ yards.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch flannel.

The dress is attractive for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6154—One unbroken length of 40-inch material without underarm seams makes the dress part of this slip-over one-piece frock, for certain figures, when a contrasting material makes the vest front and jabot. The lower edge is straight. Use printed crêpe de Chine, printed silk crêpe, printed crêpe faille or crosswise designs with plain to match; foulards, etc. Lower edge 46 inches.

36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 35-inch printed silk and 1½ yard 35-inch plain silk.

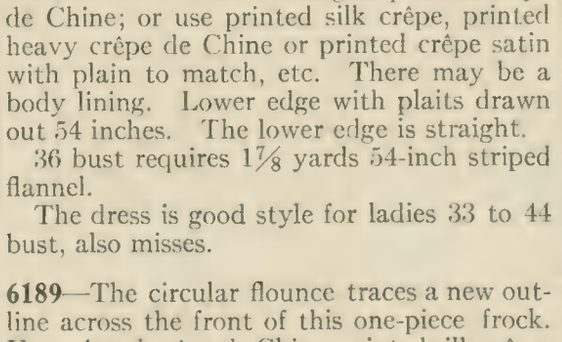
The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6181—Buttoning all the way down the front, this one-piece dress may also button all the way up the neck. It fits the hipline closely. Make this dress with its convertible collar of heavy silk crêpe, heavy satin or ribbed silks with printed or harmonizing Georgette or crêpe de Chine, or with a jabot of lace edging. For early Autumn use twills, worsteds, cashmere, etc. The lower edge is straight.

36 bust requires 2¾ yards 39-inch silk crêpe. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is becoming to ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6179—When a straight-line frock inserts an inverted plait at each side it also inserts freedom in the slender silhouette. Make this slip-over, one-piece dress of flannel, heavy silk crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine or crêpe satin with tie of contrasting or printed crêpe de Chine; or use printed silk crêpe, printed heavy crêpe de Chine or printed crêpe satin with plain to match, etc. There may be a body lining. Lower edge with plaits drawn out 54 inches. The lower edge is straight.



36 bust requires 1⅞ yards 54-inch striped flannel.

The dress is good style for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6189—The circular flounce traces a new outline across the front of this one-piece frock. Use printed crêpe de Chine, printed silk crêpe, printed crêpe satin, printed Georgette, foulards, printed cotton voile or printed fine cotton crêpe, etc., with plain to match; or use crêpe satin with reverse side, etc. The dress slips on over the head and may have a body lining. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 35-inch printed silk and ½ yard 39-inch plain silk.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

Be Yourself—thrill all with the amazing hair-free beauty of your skin—simply rinse away unwanted hair from arms, underarms, and legs with Neet, the ready to use hair-removing cream.

See just why hundreds of thousands of girls and women all around you depend upon Neet for thrilling beauty of skin where unwanted hair had been. With this easy to use cream you not only remove unwanted hair but bring to your skin unexpected loveliness and charm—the faultless beauty that others envy. It brings in a new day of happiness and freedom to wear the things you'd love most to wear. You use Neet just as you press it from the tube, merely spread it over the surfaces to be treated then rinse away the offending hair. No other method is so convenient and so rapid and satisfactory, especially for the larger surfaces of legs and arms—to remove hair from the entire forearm takes but a few minutes. Try it now.

Learn what Neet means to you—Buy Neet at your drug or department store. Accept no substitutes. Test it critically if you wish. You will agree that no other method, regardless of cost, equals this quick, simple, hair-removing cream. Neet is really quicker than shaving and you use it with absolute assurance that hair will not come back thicker and coarser than before—as it does after shaving. . . . Following its use, note the whiteness of underarm in contrast to darkened skin where the razor has been used. Should your favorite store for the moment be out of Neet, send fifty cents with name and address for full sized tube by mail. Hannibal Phar. Co., 661 Olive, St. Louis, Mo.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yds. 39-inch crêpe de Chine. Lower edge with plaits out 1⅞ yard.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6175—The sectional flounce attached in a fancy outline has only to be placed on this slip-over one-piece frock, so the making of it is very simple. It fits closely at the hip. Use Georgette; or use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin or crêpe Roma, with lace edging frills or with lace flouncing and edging; or printed crêpe de Chine, printed radium, etc.

36 bust requires 3¾ yards 39-inch Georgette. Lower edge 44½ inches.

The dress is attractive for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6173—The flowers on this one-piece slip-over frock are hand-made. The becoming yoke and apron have straight lower edges. Use Georgette, crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma or crêpe satin, with lace, etc.; or use printed cotton voile, printed fine cotton crêpe or printed Georgette, with plain to match.

36 bust requires 3 yards 40-inch Georgette, 1⅝ yard 9-inch lace insertion and 1⅛ yard 6-inch lace edging. Lower edge 44 inches.

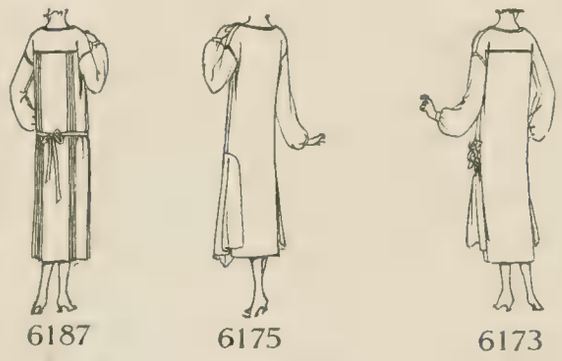
The dress is charming for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6122—The swinging movement now in vogue is obtained by inserted godets on this slip-over one-piece dress which fits closely at the hipline. The collar and cuffs may be detachable. Use printed silk crêpe or printed crêpe faille with white organdy, or with plain to match the lightest shade; or printed heavy crêpe de Chine, printed crêpe satin, printed Georgette, novelty crêpe satin, etc.

36 bust requires 3¾ yards 39-inch printed silk. Lower edge 46½ inches.

The dress is becoming to ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6156—A charming deceiver is the trimming band which poses as a Russian closing on this slip-over dress. A straight band lengthens the one-piece upper part. Make the dress of cotton crêpe of good weight, linen, linen-finished cottons, cotton shantung, heavy crêpe de Chine, silk broadcloth, shantung, flannel, etc., striped with plain to match or plain with contrasting, etc.



36 bust requires 3¼ yards 32-inch striped cotton broadcloth. Lower edge 46 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6159—Bordered wide silks, such as silk crêpe, crêpe satin or heavy crêpe de Chine, with plain to match, make this one-piece slip-over dress with an underarm seam on one side only. Other wide materials need only one seam for certain figures, but narrow materials require both seams. Use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe satin, etc. The lower edge is straight.

36 bust requires 1¼ yard 54-inch bordered silk. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is good style for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

Something NEW for BOBBED HAIR

There is a tremendous difference in bobs. Some are wonderfully attractive and becoming, while others, well—which kind is yours?

I wish you could picture the becoming kind I have in mind—the sort that makes men turn to admire. I can't tell you what the color is, but it's full of those tiny dancing lights that somehow suggest auburn, yet which are really no more actual color than sunlight is. It's only when the head is moved that you catch the auburn suggestion—the fleeting glint of gold.

You have no idea how much your bob can be improved with the "tiny tint" Golden Glint Shampoo will give it. If you want a bob like that I have in mind, buy a package and see for yourself. At all drug stores, or send 25c direct to J. W. KOBI CO., 670 Rainier Ave., Seattle, Wn.

For Lady Go-Getters

As recently as April of this year a prominent lecturer held a Boston audience in Ford Hall Forum with variations on the theme that getting a man is still the main object in a woman's life. "And," he said, among other things, "the tricks employed are the same to-day as they were when Eve caught Adam." Whether the women present were bored, distressed or pleased, the newspapers failed to report. The assumption is that they found the subject interesting enough to pay their money to hear a serious lecture about it. For our own part, we like better the practical application of what might be called "rules for the hunt" in the story by Maud Hart Lovelace in this issue. A young woman who takes to heart Thackeray's statement that "A woman with fair opportunities and without an absolute hump may marry whom she likes" at once becomes a threat to the peace of mind of every eligible man in her vicinity. For the benefit of readers who missed it, we append the "Love's Daily Dozen" of Claire (once Clara) Goodwin, and refer you back to the story on page five for an entertaining account of their application:

1. Give yourself an alluring name.
2. Make your hair a "crowning glory."
3. Let your motto be "Flattery, flattery, flattery."
4. Be dainty—use a subtle perfume, cobwebby handkerchiefs, silk stockings.
5. Acquire a low laugh.
6. Shroud your past in mystery.
7. Keep your hands exquisitely manicured.
8. Learn some French phrases.
9. Go to the library and get books on "How to Be Beautiful," "Correct Speech for all Occasions."
10. Read up on Helen of Troy, Cleopatra, Salome and George Sand.
11. Exploit your personality.
12. Persist.

A Gentle Art Indeed

Mindful of Hall Caine's admonition to avoid one-sided levity in discussing the noblest sentiment of which man is capable, we are inevitably reminded of another article, "The Secret of Being Happily Married," which will be printed in THE DELINEATOR for September. Mr. Irving Bacheller, novelist, essayist, humorist and philosopher, discusses the subject from the point of view of a man who has enjoyed a singularly happy and contented married life. His contribution is in the form of a letter to his son, an actual letter, by the way, which THE DELINEATOR was fortunately able to persuade Mr. Bacheller to make public. In an intimate, fatherly way, the author offers suggestions growing out of his own experience and makes some illuminating deductions about love and friendship. The letter has a great deal of the story quality that makes Mr. Bacheller's novels popular, and anecdotes of his own early married life illustrate his points.

TEN RULES for SUMMER HEALTH

By "Hurry-Up" Yost

Nature is an accurate bookkeeper. If you violate her laws, you will pay in ill-health; and if you follow her laws, you will always be rewarded. These are her rules for keeping fit in Summer:

1. Don't worry. Fear and doubt interfere with the normal processes of the body. Summer is a season to be enjoyed, not endured.
2. Get eight hours of regular sleep each day, on a sleeping-porch when possible.
3. Live out-of-doors as much as possible in the pure, healing rays of the sun.
4. Use water inside and out. Drink at least eight glasses daily. Do not drink cold drinks when overheated.
5. Exercise regularly, out-of-doors when possible. Do not sit in a draft when body is heated from exercise.
6. Don't wear too much clothing. Avoid tight shoes and belts and garters.
7. Eat prudently. Avoid eating too much meat and fats. Eat some bulky and some fresh and raw foods daily.
8. Watch your posture. Don't slump and slouch. Sit, stand and walk erectly.
9. Create healthful surroundings in the home. Screen against flies and mosquitoes, and remember the ice-box must be in a sanitary condition at all times.
10. Stay young. Mix laughter with your play and work. Play with your youngsters—live in the spirit of youth, for play is youth.

ASK THE DELINEATOR

We are glad to offer our readers the following services; and we hope they will have no hesitation in consulting our department experts on any personal or household problem. Be sure (1) to address your inquiry to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.; (2) to give us your return address; (3) to enclose the cost of the pamphlet or other literature (in each case a minimum amount fixed to cover cost of printing and postage)

Babies and Children—Join one or more of THE DELINEATOR Happy Child Clubs. Every month Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw, Director of The Happy Child Department, writes you a timely letter. He takes your child step by step through the year, tells you what to do each month.

There are four clubs, one for expectant mothers, one for the "new baby," a third for little runabouts, and one for the school child.

Membership in any one is only fifty cents a year. Or you can join all four for one dollar.

Send for one or all of the important Child Health pamphlets. They cost only ten cents each and treat the following subjects: "The Expectant Mother and the New Baby," "The General Care of the Baby," "Maternal Nursing," "Artificial Feeding," "Diet Problems of Childhood," "Early Childhood," "The Child's Teeth," "The School Child," "The Mental Health of the Child," "Three Dread Diseases of Childhood," "Play, Eyes and Movies," "Correct Posture," "The Development of Personality," "Widespread and Dangerous Diseases," and "Weight, Growth and Health."

Are you getting ready for the new baby? Our Pattern Department has just issued an up-to-date collection of layette patterns. These have been prepared under the direction and with the endorsement of several State and municipal maternity and nursing organizations.

The whole group of patterns—a complete outfit for the baby, with the Deltor, containing full directions—can be procured for thirty-five cents from any Butterick pattern dealer or by writing to the Pattern Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

Home-Making—This department has a score of leaflets that will help you to systematize, simplify and improve your housekeeping. Write for a list of them, enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage.

Building and Decoration—If you want to build, write for pictures of all Donn Barber's model houses, costing you only two cents for return postage. Then for one dollar you may order a print of floor-plans and elevations of the house you decide upon.

Ask Mrs. Sanders, the editor of this department, about furnishing and decorating (not more than five questions at one time, please). Be sure to give dimensions, exposure and full description of rooms—and a two-cent stamp for reply.

Special bulletins, "Good Floors," "Curtains and Draperies," "Walls, Woodwork and Ceilings," "Furnishing the Home," "How to Choose, Frame and Hang Your Pictures," "How to Know Good Furniture" and "Methods of Painting Furniture," may be had for twenty-five cents each.

Beauty — The beauty editor will answer personal questions and send complimentary folders on the care of skin, hands and hair, or lotions and cosmetics. Enclose postage at rate of two cents for two folders.

Etiquette—A new booklet called "Table Hospitality" gives explicit directions for setting the table for formal and informal meals and for entertaining with and without a maid. This is ten cents, and Mrs. John Cabot Kimberley will answer any personal quandary or send instructive leaflets on the various phases of etiquette, such as "Courtesies of To-day between Men and Women," "Introductions, Invitations and Replies," and several others. These cost nothing but the postage, which is estimated at two cents for two folders.

Entertainment—When the lure of fresh air and sunshine calls you out-of-doors these August days, try one of the new affairs Miss Campion has ready to send you. There are leaflets on "Party Ways for Picnic Days," a "Sherwood Forest Hike," "A Tramp Picnic," and summery dances and garden parties. Any two will be sent to you free, on request, for two cents postage.

MIX and SERVE

Edited with Willing Hands and a Mean Pencil by a Mere Man

WE HAVE always maintained that men are born gentlemen and would remain so if the very qualities that raise them above the common level were not used so often to their undoing by the devious devices of the never-sufficiently-praised sex ◈◈◈ Now comes scientific verification of the first half of our contention from no less an authority than the Institute of Child Research, Teachers College, Columbia University. One of the research workers there corralled fifty-three boy babies and penned each of them in a small enclosure with a girl baby. Toys were distributed to the girl babies only, and watchers stood about with notebooks to report results. Only one of the fifty-three boys took the toy away from his girl companion! ◈◈◈ An Ogden, Utah, man, sixty years old, sought refuge in the county jail from a nagging wife. His health and spirits improved in no time, and now he refuses to leave ◈◈◈ Another husband, a Paterson, New Jersey, man, went to police headquarters and asked to be arrested "to prevent my killing my wife and her lawyer." The police took him seriously when he exhibited a pound ball of lead attached to a wire ◈◈◈ In Berlin, children riding in street-cars are compelled by the traction companies' regulations to give up their seats to "ladies" and all older persons. This brought up the necessity for a ruling as to when a child becomes a lady, and the companies have set the dividing age at twelve ◈◈◈ Our special correspondent is now on the way to Texarkana, Texas, to verify the report that a woman resident of that city has been constantly wagging her tongue since she was vaccinated, by mistake, with a phonograph needle ◈◈◈ The only important improvement in the art of bread-making announced for years is, as might be expected, the contribution of a man, a resident of Pully, Switzerland. One Jean Matti, of that village, has perfected a process for keeping bread fresh for two years and in due time will probably share honors in the advertising pages with his countryman who invented milk chocolate ◈◈◈ An English innovation that should be welcomed over here is the establishment of special "gossip rates" for telephone users who take up time discussing their pains and aches, the neighbor's new hat, the details of tea fights, bargain sales, motion-picture programs and the general run of the day's chatter. The idea is cleverly designed to appeal to the bargain instinct of the perpetrators by offering them lower rates at hours when telephone communication usually lags ◈◈◈ Our thanks are due to an anonymous rural correspondent who writes that farm women can easily double production in the hay fields if they will learn not to be hampered by the care of small children at home. Youngsters, according to this authority, are exceedingly fond of raw bacon. You simply take a good-sized chunk and tie it firmly to the baby's great toe; then deposit the owner of the toe on the floor and depart for the hay fields. The child, it is said, will suck the bacon contentedly for hours. Should the little dear manage to get the bacon into her throat and choke upon it, she will instinctively kick, thereby withdrawing the bacon and permitting the resumption of regular breathing. The alternate sucking and kicking procedure will then be repeated indefinitely or until the child goes to sleep. Parents who wish to try the experiment are urged to use a soft tape that will not sever the toe when tied securely and to select any fairly good brand of bacon. One mother is reported to have "raised fourteen on 'em" by this method ◈◈◈ A Broadway theatrical celebrity who has achieved fame for his ability to select eye-stimulating chorus girls says that the surest indication of a woman's age is the skin on the backs of her hands. We predict that gloves will be freely worn on the porches of vacation resort hotels during the Summer vacation season ◈◈◈ An example, much to our taste, of the uplifting and ennobling influence of a good woman was staged recently on Fifth Avenue in New York. A mother and daughter started to pull each other's hair in front of the Waldorf. A stalwart traffic cop who tried to separate them was knocked sprawling by a wallop between the eyes from the daughter. A brother officer managed to break the clinching pair, but not until he had been severely bitten and scratched. The moral of this tale is: Always mention THE DELINEATOR when writing to advertisers.

Five Hundred and Twenty Girls at Smith and Bryn Mawr tell why they are using this soap for their skin

More than half of the 927 girls who replied to our questions are Woodbury users

WE wanted to know how the American college girl takes care of that clear, fresh skin of hers. What soap does she use? Why does she choose it? And what are the qualities about it that especially appeal to her?

It was to learn the answers to these questions that we selected two of the most representative groups of American college girls for a special investigation.

927 girls at Smith and Bryn Mawr answer the questions

Nine hundred and twenty-seven girls replied to our inquiries, giving detailed information about the brand of toilet soap they use and why they use it.

The results were extremely interesting.

Fifty-seven different brands of soap were used. But while 407 girls scattered their choice over 56 different kinds of soap—an average of a different soap to every 7 girls—the remaining 520 girls all used Woodbury's.

Three hundred and fifty girls gave the purity of Woodbury's Facial Soap as their reason for using it, or spoke of its mild, non-irritating effect on the skin. Fifty-two girls told of specific ways in which Woodbury's had helped them to overcome faults in their complexion, and to gain a clear, smooth skin The remainder said, for the most part, that Woodbury's simply agreed with their skin better than other soaps.

The following are characteristic phrases used in describing the effect of Woodbury's in ordinary cleansing:

"The only soap that really agrees with my skin and does not dry it up."

"Keeps my skin soft and clear and leaves a feeling of freshness."

"Doesn't seem to irritate my skin as some soaps do."

"Seems to give me good color in my cheeks as no other soap can."

"Found that it made my skin clearer, my color brighter."

"Has worked wonders with my skin."

"My mother uses it," or "Mother suggested it," were answers commonly given in telling how the girls had come to use Woodbury's.

Seven girls reported that their physician had recommended Woodbury's Facial Soap.

Why Woodbury's is unique in its effect on the skin

The investigation among college girls is interesting because of the high quality of evidence it represents. One point is noticeably brought out by it: the constantly recurring testimony to the purity and fineness of Woodbury's, expressed in such phrases as "the only soap that really agrees with my skin," "doesn't seem to irritate my skin as some soaps do."

College girls, with their fresh, rosy faces—how do they take care of that clear, youthful skin of theirs? Of 927 girls at Smith and Bryn Mawr, over 56% are using Woodbury's

A skin specialist worked out the formula by which Woodbury's is made. This formula not only calls for absolutely pure ingredients. It also demands greater refinement in the manufacturing process than is commercially possible with ordinary toilet soap. In merely handling a cake of Woodbury's one notices this extreme fineness.

Around each cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap is wrapped a booklet containing special cleansing treatments for overcoming common skin defects. Get a cake of Woodbury's today, and begin tonight the treatment your skin needs!

A 25-cent cake of Woodbury's lasts a month or six weeks for regular toilet use, including any of the special Woodbury treatments.

How to Rouse a Sluggish Skin

Just before retiring, wash your face and neck with plenty of Woodbury's Facial Soap and warm water. If your skin has been badly neglected, rub a generous lather thoroughly into the pores, using an upward and outward motion. Do this until the skin feels somewhat sensitive. Rinse well in warm water, then in cold. If possible, rub your skin for thirty seconds with a piece of ice and dry carefully.

DONN BARBER GOES HOME

THE world has lost one of its great dreamers and master builders. Donn Barber is dead!

The readers of THE DELINEATOR have had the privilege for nearly three years of reading the brilliant articles prepared by Donn Barber in the interest of the small-home owner. They have had an opportunity to obtain plans and designs of his making with the best of his great genius given to the problems of a five, six or seven room house.

Architectural societies, universities, scientific publications and artists of world fame were shocked at the untimely death of the great architect. But probably the world's great loss will be most felt by the plain and simple folk who, loving their homes and desiring beauty in them, have been so brilliantly served by this artist.

The New York Times in its leading editorial the day of Donn Barber's burial made this comment:

> Not often does a famous architect devote much of his time to the problem of the small house. To this rule the late Donn Barber was an exception. Although distinguished for the large buildings which he designed—including the Department of Justice in Washington, the National Park Bank Building and the New York Cotton Exchange—he yet was willing to employ his gifts in working out plans for small houses and took a notable part in the Better Homes movement. He realized the need of encouraging good taste in small houses and saw the immense stimulus that well-planned attractive little homes could be in a community. The problem was not an easy one, for a model was needed that could be cheaply constructed by a local contractor and yet that would not have the hideous defects of so many of the frame houses still being erected wholesale by real-estate developers. To be successful it was necessary that the Better Homes campaign should enlist the cooperation and not the antagonism of local builders. All of these points he had in mind when he designed the Home Sweet Home house that was erected in Washington to serve as a model and inspiration to home builders.

A week before Mr. Barber's death there was a meeting of DELINEATOR officials and representatives from various parts of the world. Mr. Barber planned to address them, but mortal illness had prevented his leaving his home. The morning of that meeting, he sent a letter to the editor of THE DELINEATOR which so genuinely interprets his interest in the owners of small homes that we feel we should share this last message with you whom he has served so well.

DEAR MRS. MELONEY:

I very deeply regret the indisposition which prevents my being with you to-day.

My connection with THE DELINEATOR during the past three years has been so pleasant that I would appreciate an opportunity to address you briefly concerning the small-house plans and schemes which have been published in the magazine.

It may be that one of the reasons for the definite growth of the Home Building Department has been the shortage of homes throughout the country due to an interruption of building during the war and to the cost of labor and building materials since the war.

The small house as a department of design has had far too little architectural attention throughout the country. It has become the habit of the person who builds a small house to practise his initial economy by eliminating architects' fees.

The plans which are shown in THE DELINEATOR are primarily service material giving fully detailed arrangement of floor-plans and elevations, but they do not specify the kind of building materials to be used. This is a deliberate omission, as conditions and individual choices vary, and it would hardly be possible for a nationally distributed magazine to give specifications narrowed to one or two choices with each plan.

I feel that THE DELINEATOR is rendering a distinct service, and one the nature of which no other magazine or architectural medium has so far attempted. Some few architects and architectural associations have criticized this method of wholesale distribution of plans at a nominal price, but I feel sure, however, that the architect's prerogatives have not been usurped in any way whatever.

It is thoroughly in keeping with the program of THE DELINEATOR (which inaugurated the Better Homes in America movement) that the public should turn to it for expert advice and guidance for the small-home builder of limited means. I might add that it was through my work for THE DELINEATOR that I became interested in the Better Homes movement, and finally became one of the directors of the organization when it was incorporated a year or two ago.

America is surely building better houses. Materials to go into these houses are being chosen more and more by the architect or individual rather than by the contractor, and good design in a small house has now become virtually a necessity.

Again regretting my inability to be with you to-day, and with warm personal regards, I am, faithfully,

DONN BARBER.

To carry on his work Mr. Barber fittingly chose the one who best understood his great aims. When his last wishes were announced, the world heard that he desired Mrs. Barber to continue his architectural practise. With his two associates in this practise Elsie Barber courageously takes up her labor of love. We may be confident that Donn Barber's ideals will live.

APPRECIATION FOR HUTCHINSON

There is a great and increasing purpose to be seen in the work of Harry Emerson Fosdick, America's mighty preacher whose congregation numbers countless millions. He is especially well known to all DELINEATOR readers, who remember his stirring Fourth of July article, challenging the entire nation to the building up of character. He is constantly speaking to our country through the medium of magazines, books, the pulpit—from which thousands must be turned away each Sunday for want of space in which to hear him. Yet Doctor Fosdick has found time in his crowded life to read A. S. M. Hutchinson's new novel now running in THE DELINEATOR. He considers it a story so vivid in the telling and important in the problems presented that he herewith expresses his appreciation of "One Increasing Purpose."

DOCTOR FOSDICK

A new novel by A. S. M. Hutchinson would in any case attract interest and arouse animated discussion. The religious motif of "One Increasing Purpose" adds certainty that it will be one of the most eagerly read and warmly debated stories of the year.

The fumbling search of this generation for spiritual meaning in life, the sheer futility of existence with the old religion gone and no new religion yet discovered, the homesickness of the mind and heart for a sustaining sense of purpose in creation, are admirably portrayed in Simon Paris. His name will be a staple of dinner-table conversation on every Main Street in America before the year is over. In him multitudes will discover their own baffled bewilderment, and in the other members of his family (portrayed in this story with extraordinary skill) they will find either themselves or other people whom they know.

There will be many opinions about the solution of Simon Paris's problem, many opinions about the story's ending. But about the reality and vividness of the problem itself there can be no doubt.

HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK

AN IMPORTANT CONTEST FOR PARENTS AND TEACHERS

ONE hundred and ten thousand school-teachers left the teaching profession last year. This is one of the most serious internal problems now confronting America. THE DELINEATOR feels the obligation to open its pages to the discussion of this subject which, even if you have no children, is of importance to you if you love America. As more and more teachers are attracted by glittering opportunities in the commercial world, the shortage of teachers seriously endangers the future of our country.

THE DELINEATOR is offering prizes of one thousand dollars to parents and one thousand dollars to teachers for the best letters answering the question: "What Is the Matter with the Teaching Profession and How May the Evils be Cured?" The conditions of the contest will appear in next month's DELINEATOR, at which time we will publish the first of a series of articles on this subject by Dr. John Dewey, Professor of Philosophy at Columbia University. Doctor Dewey is one of the best-known educators in this country. He has an international reputation. You may not like what he has to say about us, but his message will make sincere people think.

TRAINING FOR ROCKEFELLER MILLIONS

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Senior, has already turned over the responsibility of millions of dollars to his son. In summing up the younger Rockefeller's heritage recently, an historian said: "John D. Rockefeller, Junior, was given a strong body, an excellent mind, a good education and millions of dollars. He has combined these and made a useful life."

Few of us appreciate the significance of such an achievement. To resist the temptations that surround a rich man's son and to assume the responsibility of millions of dollars require careful training and a strong character. And when a rich man's son worthily assumes the responsibility and approaches, as so few sons do, the heights attained by a genius father, it is just another evidence of the importance of early training.

Whether we fit our sons for one sphere or another—whether we give them millions or hundreds—we can not evade responsibility for their spiritual and moral training. The character we help them build in childhood and youth means their success or failure in all the worth-while efforts of their lives.

The greatest gift the senior Rockefeller made to his son was a spiritual training. Another priceless contribution to his upbringing was the responsibility which he gave him for the education of two poor boys—one a white boy and the other a negro. The father took his son to Tuskegee when he was twelve years old. He showed him the poor negro boys there getting an education under difficulties; he made him look over the list of students who were working for an education and selected one for whom the twelve-year-old boy was to assume responsibility. This he did also in a school for white boys.

From the time America's richest young man came to his teens he has corresponded once a month with these two poor boys. As they grew to manhood, they came to years of usefulness. What Mr. Rockefeller did for them, however, was not comparable with the service these young men contributed to the life of John D. Rockefeller, Junior. They gave him a wealth of understanding of the lives of boys less rich than he. The responsibility he assumed for them was one of the chief elements in giving him the stable and generous character that has furthered so many constructive movements for the betterment of home life, education and health.

Shall you Punish your Child ?

By ANGELO PATRI

Principal of New York's Model School

ALL of us want to help our children grow into fine, strong characters. We want them to profit by our experiences and so be saved many a bitter lesson of their own. But no eager intelligent child is willing to accept our knowledge unquestioningly. We have to search for some plan, usually a scheme of punishment or reward, to force our instruction upon him. Anxiety rides us hard.

Michael, the most persistent truant that was ever pushed, dragged and hauled through a school, entered the principal's office a couple of years after he had graduated and earnestly demanded about his younger friend, "Is Tony here? Is he on the job? I'm not going to have him wasting his time. I know too much about that. If he doesn't stick to school I'll punish him. I've promised him a radio if he gets a good card this time."

We want to save the child from his own ignorance and make him a gift of that priceless discipline and maturity of intelligence which is character. How shall we do it when he sets himself against us? It is a vexing question. Shall we punish him or give him a radio? Shall we take him on a personally conducted tour through life or shall we let him ramble along picking his own steps? Or are we to find ourselves in that too familiar plight, "One foot on land and one on sea, to one thing constant never."

EXPERIENCES of generations of parents and teachers with children make us doubt the efficacy of the system of punishments and rewards commonly administered, but the method has the sanction of custom, which scores heavily in its favor. We try it and see no great benefit. We try another way, and seeing no greater progress, dash back in fear and trembling to find a good sharp punishment or a fat reward to set things right.

"But whatever you do you can not do away with the law of reward and punishment. It is the law of God. When a child touches fire it will burn him; when he stands out in the rain it will wet him; should he take liberties with the sea it will drown him. Break the law and you suffer; obey it and you are safe. It is doing a child no kindness to soften the facts." These are your thoughts.

Quite true: but have you examined the facts? How scant they are and how limited in their power to shed light on the growth of the soul of a child? The laws for the preservation of the body are clear. They are severe and immediately effective. No difficulty surrounds our teaching in that direction. It is keeping the child alive in spirit that staggers us.

For the spirit of man is a subtle thing and its laws are not plain. Cause and effect are not linked in immediately here, nor are they manifested by unfailing signs.

Peter burns himself and you reach for the cooling bandage. Peter errs in the spirit of him and not all the wisdom of the ages shows you a cure. You can always admonish and punish and reward, but can you heal?

The value of punishment lies in its power to educate truly, to awaken in the spirit of the transgressor a responsive thrill which makes him long with a great longing to change something with himself. The test for it is very simple. Will the decree when carried out make the child happier and more unselfish? If it won't, then in all likelihood it is a form of revenge masquerading under the guise of righteous ministration.

Peter was entering his heedless teens when he took on the habit of losing things. One day it was his cap, another, something else—his fountain pen, his books, his sweater, the letter he was given to mail. His mother scolded and punished and promised rewards but Peter could not seem to reform. He came home the first day he used his new skates and reported tearfully that he had lost them.

"Do without," said his mother grimly. For a few days there was no skating and the hardship of doing without the skates was not pressing. Then came a hard, cold snap that made the lake a sheet of polished gray glass that reflected the shining steel of the flashing skates and put flying magic into them. For a time Peter stood shivering and wistful on the bank—then borrowed his cousin's skates and lost them. He had to stop on the way home to see Tom's new pup and left the skates on the porch, just for a minute. When he came out they were gone.

His mother's face went white. "You borrowed Bob's skates after I told you to do without and you lost them. You are the most heedless, the most disobedient boy in this world. Nothing teaches you. You'll have to be punished so you will remember. For this you will not be allowed to have your birthday treat with the Judge. Now remember. That's final. You don't go."

Now August is a far cry from December and Peter, being young and heedless, did not get the full force of the decree. He was subdued and remorseful for a day or two and then forgot all about it. At last August with its one great day in prospect rolled around and Peter began preparations. "I told you that you could not go," said his mother sternly. She would have given a great deal to have been able to forget her edict, but her conscience and what she believed Peter's great need would not allow it. She must keep her word and do Peter good.

Peter was frightened but the thing was too awful to be true. Not go with the Judge on his birthday? Why they had spent this day together since that first one when Peter was scarcely able to reach the finger held out to steady his twinkling steps down the path to the garden gate, where the big shiny carriage with its prancing horses stood waiting to whisk the two friends, a very old man and a very young boy, off for a day with the magi.

No Peter could not believe his mother would do that, so he was very good and watched to obey at the instant of command and hung up his hat and gave the chickens water and shut the screen door without being told. "Mother, it's time to get ready. Shall I put on my best suit?"

"You may put on your best suit because it is your birthday, but you are not going."

Still Peter could not believe and raced away to come back dressed in his best and ready to have the gay necktie properly tied. "You are not to go, Peter," said his mother knotting the tie with trembling fingers, and in very pity for the pain and shocked distress in the pleading eyes she turned her back upon him.

"Step along, Peter," called the happy old man swinging wide the door of the carriage and patting the seat beside him.

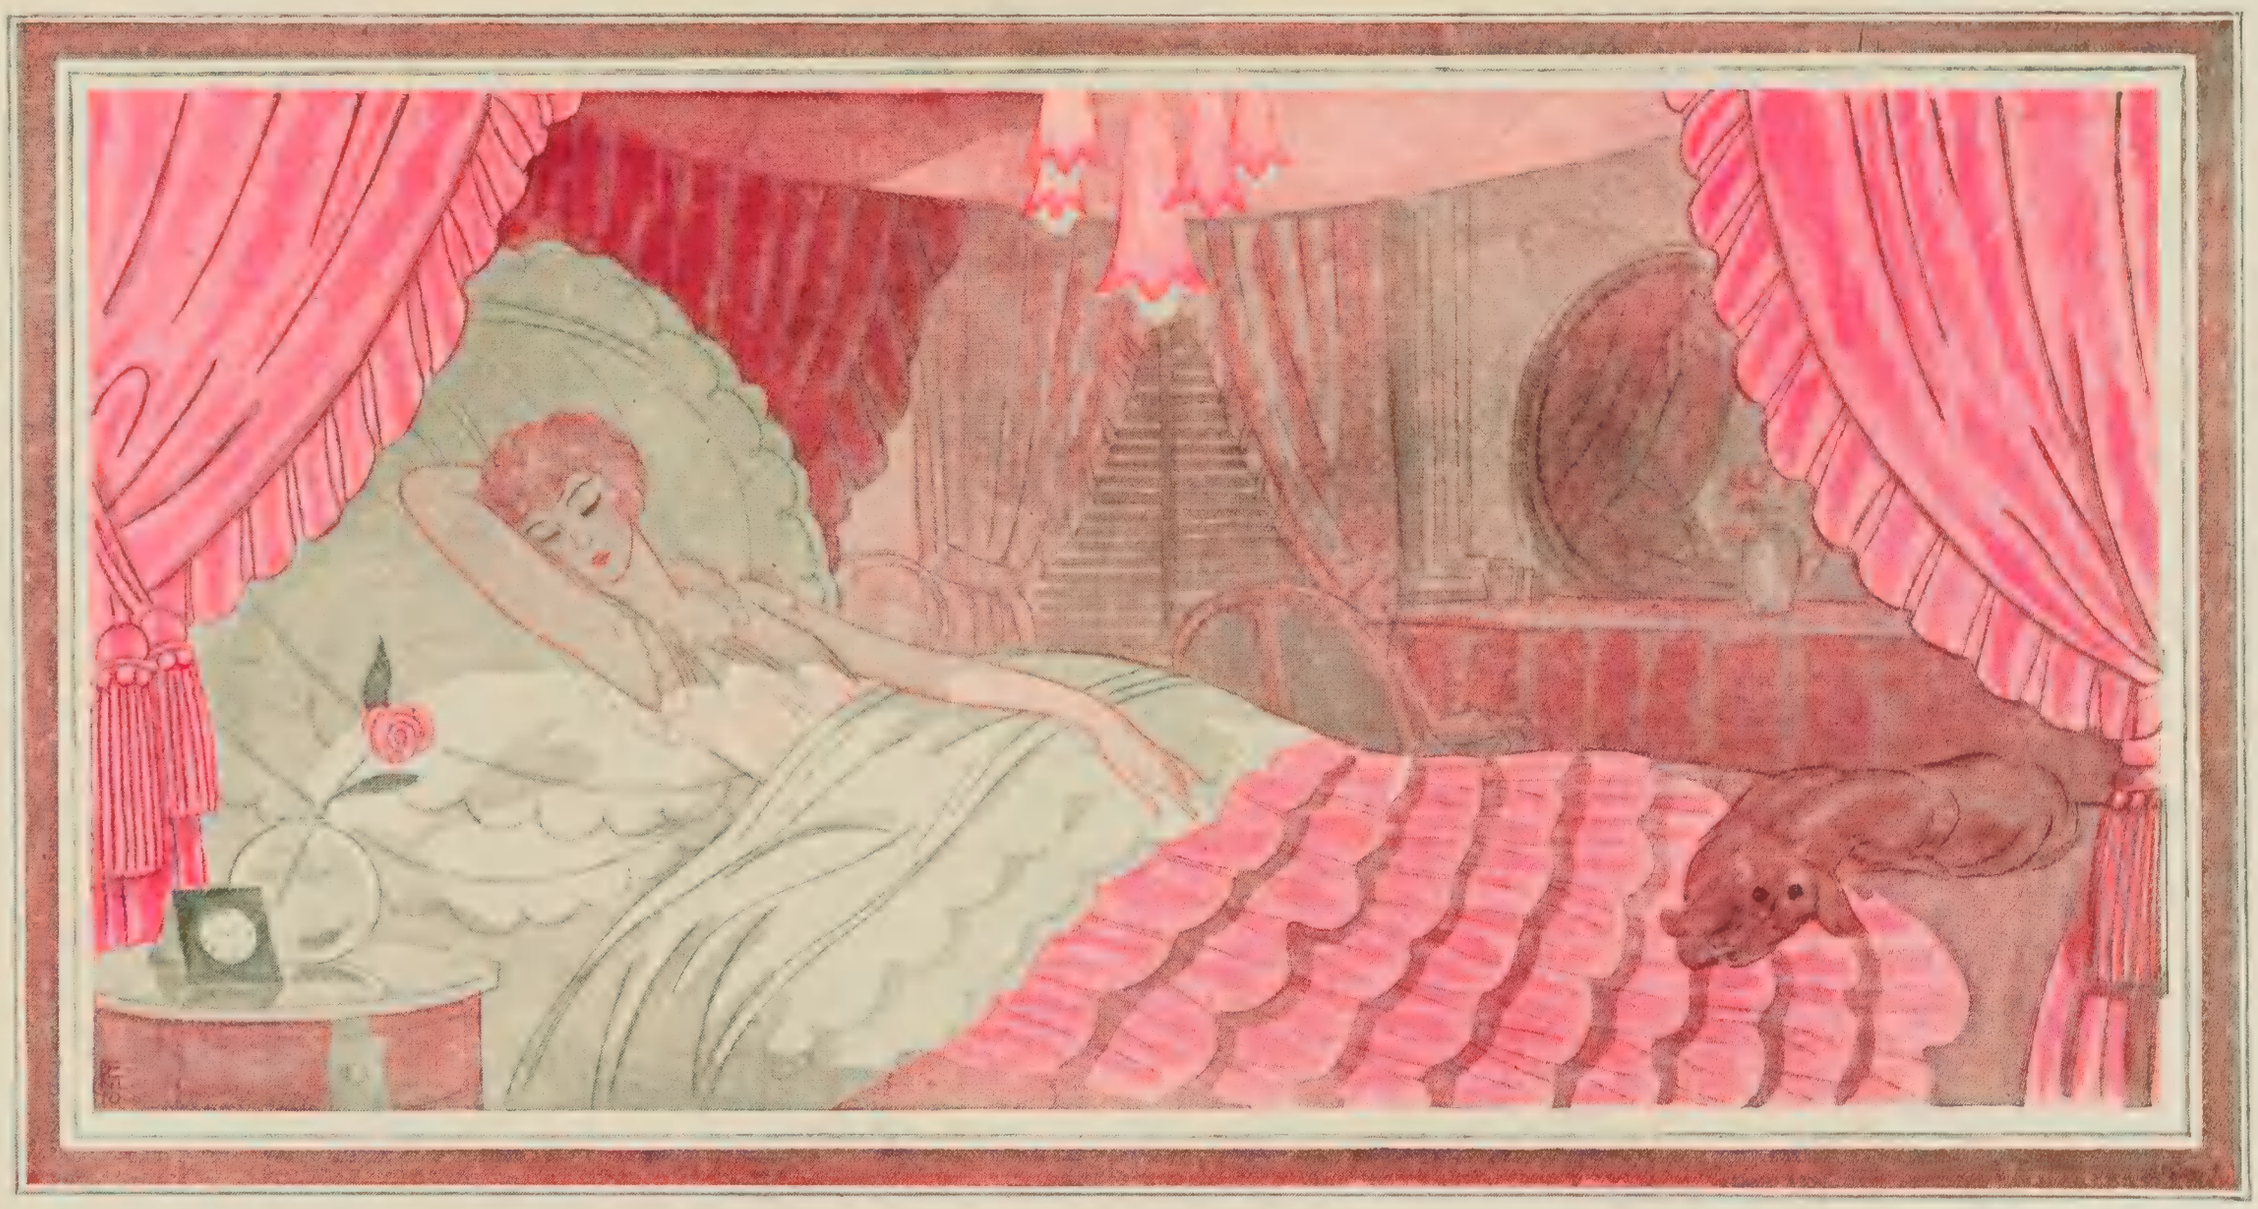
But Peter sat tightly on the porch rail and said in a strange hoarse voice, "I can't go. Mother won't let me."

"Nonsense, where is she? What is this? You don't know what you're doing. Remember he is a child. I am old and my days are numbered. Think what this means to all of us. Let him go for your own sake, for my sake."

But the law was the law and Peter stayed all morning on the porch rail, swinging his feet and gazing dumbly toward the library window where his old friend sat in resentful loneliness. At luncheon time he went to his room, changed his clothes and turned his face to the wall. He did not cry. By and by, sleep, the angel of mercy to suffering childhood, came to comfort him.

Peter never disobeyed his mother again. Often she wished he would, for his obedience was but the physical surrender to a powerful force, the spirit of the boy was not in it. That had died the morning he sat on the porch rail grieving for his lost day.

One must be very wise and sure of himself to punish a child like that. It leaves scars that last through life and often results in more harm than good. Once the child gets the notion that he was punished in the spirit of revenge or in a moment of irritation or in an unsympathetic spirit, he loses all faith in the one who hurt him. According to his nature he defends himself. One child is snarling and defensive, another secretive and hypocritical, another self-seeking and cunning—qualities none of us would cultivate in the spirit of any child.



IF PUNISHMENT is so dangerous and so uncertain in its effect, are rewards better? They are on the same plane as punishments and are to be tested by the same standard: Will they make the child happier and more unselfish? Again we hold back in doubt. Character is a spiritual growth and few rewards carry food for souls.

Adolescents are idealists more than grown-ups appreciate. Children would rather feel that they had rendered a service beyond payment than collect wages. They will run Mother Kelsey's errands for no richer reward than her smile and go grudgingly to the corner to earn your nickel. They will carry the bats and balls for their chosen champion and copy notes for the candidate for the composition prize just to save his time and effort. Billy will hear Betty recite her lesson, although he knows she is sure to win the dollar father offered for the best report card. They will do this, and they will cheer unselfishly for the winner if the reward is not used to nag them into grasping selfishness. That happens when the spirit of competition is too keen.

Are your gums suffering from a lifelong slumber?

Wake them up with Ipana and massage!
You can do it when you brush your teeth!

YOU rest, perhaps, eight hours out of twenty-four. And during that time, nature restores your vitality by clearing the poisons of fatigue from your body.

But, if you were to sleep, like some story book princess, for years and years and years, could nature possibly clear those poisons every day?

Decidedly not! Sleep is necessary, but so is exercise—work—stimulation.

And yet, people wonder why the gums are so subject to disease. Far from the heart, fed only by tiny blood vessels, they get only a faint impulse from the blood stream. Under a diet too soft—too creamy—they are cheated of the natural stimulation which coarse, fibrous food once gave them.

What's to be done in caring for the gums?

We cannot control our diet. Modern existence has settled that almost beyond our control. But we can stimulate our gums when we brush our teeth, and thus achieve the good effect which rougher food would deliver to our gums.

Brush your gums with Ipana every time you brush your teeth. It will help to combat gum troubles, because it will induce a lively, health-giving circulation of blood and impart a healing effect to tender, and even to bleeding gums.

Ask your dentist. He'll tell you the value of this treatment. Make your children follow it, too! It's important to their health.

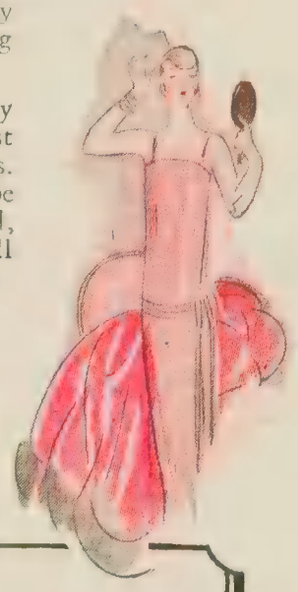
The history of Ipana and the story of its success

Five years ago we presented Ipana to the dentists of America. Our professional men demonstrated it all over America. They urged massage—a light massage with Ipana and the brush.

Dentists tried it—on themselves and in their practice. Ipana was a success. Its active agent is ziratol, an antiseptic and hemostatic, known by the dentists and used by them to allay bleeding and to heal infected tissue.

Now Ipana is well known—widely advertised. But still we urge you to ask your dentist about Ipana and the method we recommend—for we feel sure both will have his approval.

Ipana, unlike so many things that are good for you, is delicious to the taste. It cleans the teeth well, without abrasives, without whitening chemicals. And, because of its ziratol content, it restores weakened gum tissue to a normal tonicity.



As a test—switch to Ipana for just one month

Try it for one month! As a dentifrice plain and simple, you'll like it. And if, by chance, you are bothered with soft, tender or bleeding gums, you'll find out what a beneficial effect it will have on that understimulated, subnormal tissue.

There's a coupon for your use on this page. Frankly, we'd prefer that you ignore it, for the ten day tube can only tell you of Ipana's taste and cleaning power.

But a large tube, which you can easily get at your nearest drug store, will last for more than one hundred brushings. Buy one today—your teeth will be whiter, your gums will be firmer—and, all the time you are using it, you will have a new sense of oral cleanliness.

Your gums may bother you seldom or never. Your tooth-brush may never "show pink." But even then, as a preventive measure, brush your teeth and your gums with Ipana. Keep the circulation active, the tissue firm and the teeth clean.

The winsome guardian of your hair cries:

"Simple care is safest!"

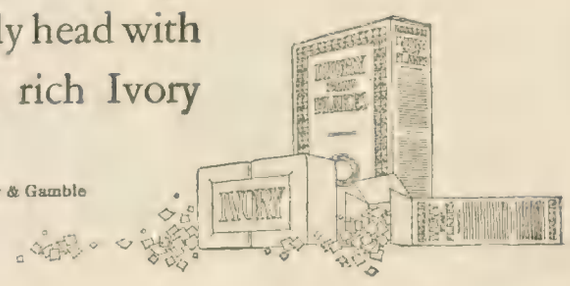
MAYBE you don't believe in elves any more. But a lovely real one watches over your hair, and she trembles with fear every time you say, "Well, what should I try next?"

"Don't experiment!" she pleads. "Just get your hair clean and soft and beautiful —and that is so easy!"

Elves don't ordinarily bother much with scientific matters, but they have been investigating the writings of scientific gentlemen who really know.

This is what they've found:

"You can keep your hair beautiful and fluffy and glossy by cheerfully shampooing it two or three times a month with pure soap and soft water, and by gaily brushing it thoroughly every day with a clean brush, to give it the glorious sheen that every woman wants."



When it comes to soap, the elves just naturally assume that you will use Ivory. They know it is pure and mild, and safe. When you massage your shapely head with that lovely rich Ivory lather, and feel the tiny cleansing bubbles getting right down to the depths of your hair, you, too, will know how pure and mild and safe it is.

And oh, how fine your head will feel, and how beautiful your hair will look—soft and fluffy and deliciously clean-smelling.

You will use Ivory for your face and hands and bath, too, of course, just as millions of other careful women do.

A THIEF IN THE NIGHT

Can the friendship of nations be stolen as lightly as a kiss?

By

ZONA GALE

"I SEE ENOUGH," PAUL MURMURED, "WHEN I LOOK AT YOU"

"DON'T you think it is the way heaven looks? No, I know you don't know, but don't you think so? Living here, it is like being the good God, looking down on all those little people—far, far below one."

Maria Alicia went on contentedly and said a great deal more in her sleepy Spanish voice. Homer Harden, her husband, sat listening with a tenderness which would have been the same if her voice had been ordering a car.

He seemed to have been listening to her voice for a lifetime, although their wedding, down on the "border," was but six weeks old. He and Paul, engineering south of Mexico City, had met Maria Alicia Resade, and Homer had won her in a month from that moment.

Her sister Alla, who had come north with them, spoke, with her twenty-year dignity:

"Maria Alicia, darling, would you mind very much not talking? Just looking, you know?"

"Of course," said Maria Alicia warmly, "I would not mind! How can one talk when all that beauty is in front of one? That sky, it is of lemon and orange, like a perfect drink." She said a great deal more.

The three of them sat on the terrace in the yellow California afternoon. From the stone façade of their new home the lawn sloped to the hidden road, beyond whose bordering pepper-trees the little town, the countryside and the distant ocean smiled back at them.

Perched on a post of the terrace wall, Alla was not looking at the valley. Her eyes were on the roofs of the village sunk in leaves beyond the peppers. Not the first white house, she decided, it was the second, nearer the spire—that must be Paul's house. And what if he were looking up this way, now, with a field-glass! She lifted her hand in a stiff boyish salute.

"Who'd you sight, Puss?" inquired Homer, apparently from the back of his head.

"—like a picture by you know the one I mean—Oh, what did you say?" Maria Alicia broke off.

"Nothing. No harm done, my darling," Homer assured her lazily.

"I saw Paul—in the mind of my heart," Alla answered Homer.

"But what did you say?" Maria Alicia inquired.

"Nothing, dear," said Homer. "She couldn't have meant it. Here he comes."

"But who comes?" Maria Alicia demanded.

Sometimes they thought that she did it on purpose, catching up a conversation by its ends and tying them thus, too far at the back—because she did look adorable as she questioned one, wide-eyed and intent.

Paul Bonar crossed the lawn, with a respectful look at Homer, a fleet smile at Maria Alicia, and his attention for Alla. Not an adoring, but merely a delighted attention.

Alla looked completely beyond him.

"You're just in time to drive me down to the village," she said, having just thought it.

"I expected to be," said Paul, who wanted nothing so much as idleness and tea.

"You're not going to do any of such things," said Maria Alicia. "We have orange-ice and thin cakes for tea. Besides, I want to plan this Summer."

"Darling, yes, let's plan the Summer," said Homer. "We've done it less than ten times so far, and if we don't plan it again how'll we know what we've planned?" He caught her hand and lapsed into tender murmurs.

"I have," Maria Alicia went on, regarding him not at all, "exactly what I've wanted all my life—a place where I can dig in the garden all the time and have my friends for week-ends. I have nine week-ends planned out and please, please, please, my friends first! I am so afraid of American friends!"

"But have you that many perfectly good Mexican friends in town?" Homer asked in astonishment.

"Oh, certain-lee! My friends at the consulates, you will love them!" (Her sound of the o in love was, Homer thought, not less than celestial. It was o as in stove, but yet not that either.) Maria Alicia looked over the tree-tops, her heavy lids drooped above those smoldering eyes; then came a dimple, and another, and a smile as sleepy as her voice. Every one found her adorable.

"See here, my beloved," begged Homer, "why not mix 'em up? Four foreigners and four—I beg your pardon!"

"You do very well to beg my pardon. You would say four foreigners and four Americans—is it not? No, no! Eight Mexicans and no American foreigners—oh, well, for ver' little while—" Her voice sank to its tender murmur. "Then I will have my international party, when I get used to your strange American ways, Homer my dear—to your friends' queer foreign ways—" she ended in delighted laughter.

Alla laughed too and looked at Paul. Then her laughter died. He was smiling, looking at Maria Alicia, and the look in his eyes was the look which she herself had watched for when he looked at her.

Homer, his mind still on the house-parties, began reciting suggestions. Paul, unbelievably good-looking as he sprawled in the wicker long chair, looked over at Alla, and she thought she caught something of resignation in his tone as he said: "Mayn't I drive you to the village, Allamalalla?"

"No, thanks," she said crisply; "I've decided on orange-ice. Here it comes."

HOMER chose the guests carefully—Sally Rice, Arkwright, John and Elsa Meyer. These, Alla and Paul agreed, could be trusted to represent America in any international mix-up. Though they had driven out from town or from the country to leave cards, Maria Alicia had met none of them. "I was in the garden—I was asleep—I was I don't know where," she had told Homer every time. "I will meet them some day—not yet," she always begged. And Homer had reflected astutely that there is something in a man's soul which secretly loves a woman to cloister herself with him and make excuses to the whole world about not being at home to it.

There was also something in his soul which loved the assurance with which Maria Alicia ordered that which he thought of as his household, including its house-party—loved her serene authority in decreeing all as she had been accustomed, not questioning its perfection. Especially he delighted in her secrecy. From the little court round which the house was built, in the fashion in which California loves to copy Spain, Maria Alicia shut them out for days preceding the party.

From the hospital, a half-mile away across the fields, she had coaxed a carpenter. They had seen him going and coming with his tools. From among the Mexican patients in the hospital she had lured one Pedro, a gardener, and his wife Catalina—on the day of the party they had arrived in bright sleeveless jackets sewn with little bells. From the cook at the hospital Maria Alicia had borrowed a red macaw—they had heard it screaming and swearing in the court. Otherwise her plans were her own.

When on the night of her dinner Maria Alicia came down-stairs in her silver gown sewn with blue jewels, Alla thought: "If I were as beautiful as Maria Alicia, Paul would have loved me as Homer loved her, and we should have had a double wedding and the world would be a decent world. As it is——"

"Maria Alicia," she said abruptly, "do you think Homer loves you as much as if you were American?"

"No difference!" cried Maria Alicia positively.

"All the same, I wish I were American," said Alla.

"Paul likes me as much as if I were American," said Maria Alicia innocently.

Out on the terrace with Paul, Homer was dwelling on another aspect of the matter.

"If Americans could give dinner-parties enough to foreign guests," he said, "we'd get some idea of internationalism."

"I've been thinking," said Paul, "that I wish here to-night we represented a dozen nationalities instead of two. Only——"

"Yes? Only——"

"Sometimes," said Paul, "about marrying into another nation, I get my doubts——"

Homer laughed. "Doubt about marriage or about nationality?"

"You've had doubts about neither?" said Paul.

"My heavens," said Homer artlessly, "I've got Maria Alicia."

Paul's eyes followed her as she led the way indoors.

"She's no lovelier than Alla," he said.

"She is too, man!" cried Homer hotly. "I beg Alla's pardon," he added.

"What about Alla?" Alla herself asked.

"Nothing, Allamalalla. Come along," said Paul, and tucked her hand in his arm.

"You like me to-night," she observed as they entered the house. "But you need not like me, you know, if you don't want to like me."

"You think I can help myself," said Paul grimly. "Well, perhaps I'm trying to."

"I will help you, too!" she cried with enthusiasm.

They streamed through the drawing-room to the court, a company of charming people. The Mexican guests were of distinguished bearing. Señor and Señora Gómez of the consulate, their niece, Soledad Gómez, and their cousin, young Carlos Gonzales of Mexico City. They were speaking English, save Gonzales, who was replying in Spanish to Sally Rice's excellent use of it. At the inner arch of the drawing-room they all paused.

OF THE court, which had been an unimaginative little patio with a bed of green in its cement, Maria Alicia had made a place of beauty. The hospital carpenter had thrown out, high on the wall, at unequal levels, two little balconies, their railings painted black. Here and there he had hacked at the stucco walls and she had inserted some charming old tiles which she had found in town. Two ugly cement vases, banished from the terrace, she had turned bottom side up, quite changing their line, painted them terra-cotta and piped water in one and gas in the other so that a tiny fountain and a glow of blue-and-orange flame gave two high points of interest, between which half-curved the table about the green, starred by veiled bulbs of light. In one balcony Pedro strummed a guitar, while his small wife sang monotonously and sweetly with her castanets. And in a bright hoop swung and scolded the blazing-red mackaw, cross and sleepy and profane.

AND ONCE A CLEAR AND BEAUTIFUL VOICE CAME FROM BELOW, AND MARIA ALICIA HERSELF STOOD THERE SINGING OLD SPANISH LOVE-SONGS

"By George," said Paul, "this is the kind of a world I live in, inside, only I've never seen it before!"

"You will see more," said Maria Alicia.

"I see enough," Paul murmured, "when I look at you."

Alla caught his tone, but not his words, and she flashed round on young Carlos Gómez such a sparkling look that he turned from the little Soledad to whom he was betrothed, and who pouted up at Arkwright, saying: "They say American men make pretty speeches. Where are yours?" And Sally Rice, seeing Arkwright's answering warmth, leaned to the staid Señor Gómez and observed: "Señor, are American girls as charming as you had thought?" And at his fervent reply his plump wife turned to the American, John Meyer, and cried: "Surely all American business men are not tired! You are not!" "Not now," the gallant John replied. Whereupon his wife, Elsa, said to her host that there was absolutely no fool like an old fool, and this Homer did not hear at all, because he was watching Maria Alicia. It was a perfect international circle.

They found their places, and Alla, sinking into hers, was abashed to find tears very close as Paul's great figure settled into his chair beside hers and he murmured:

"Everything all right, Allamalalla?"

"No," she said forlornly.

"Nothing the matter with the way you look," he said idly. "You can't start with that. Go on from there. What's wrong?"

"Is it not so, Mr. Paul?" came in Maria Alicia's clear tones. "Am I not as—what you call—as partial to you as to my Mexican friends?"

"That's what I want to know," said Paul, and Alla turned abruptly to Arkwright, on her left.

"Let's settle the whole blooming international question," said Homer. "If twelve of us can get along as peacefully as this—even a couple of us marry—why, doesn't that compose the danger of any difficulty forever?"

"But what if we land in the divorce court?" Maria Alicia inquired.

"By a rapid calculation, that will only be one of us from each nation," Homer exclaimed. "There will be others left."

"Other Americans will marry you, my dear Mrs. Harden," Arkwright suggested.

"But will they?" asked Maria Alicia. "How can you be so sure?"

Señor Gómez, with his great voice which boomed out above the droning sweetness of the little voice in the balcony, said with his manner of finality:

"International difficulties, these are first of all matters of manners. Of caste! We here—could we ever disagree about anything seriously at this moment of the world? We have too much humor, too much savoir faire. We could laugh away any difficulty. There is probably nothing that we here could not manage among ourselves."

"Oh, I disagree," Paul said lazily. "I'm certain that I could start a fight here, all in the exercise of the best of manners."

"What nonsense, Paul," Homer protested. "Nothing could come up here that we couldn't settle amicably, as among close friends—and that even though some of us had never met before to-night."

Young Carlos Gómez cried: "I am with Mr. Bonar! A quarrel is possible in any company."

"What bloodthirsty folk at the party!" cried Maria Alicia. "Why will men talk of fighting—fighting! Why should anybody fight me?"

She looked so lovely, so plaintive, so exquisite. Above, on the tiny balcony, the red-jacketed Catalina began the lazy measures of "Golondrina."

"It is very likely about you that we should all be fighting, señora!" said Paul.

"But I do not wish to be foughten for!" cried Maria Alicia, with one of her rare and delightful lapses of English.

THEY debated it gaily. The lines of opinion, they observed curiously, did not form on either nationality or sex. While Señora Gómez, Sally Rice and Arkwright were with Paul and Señor Gonzales, on the other hand Soledad and Alla and the Meyers believed, with Homer, a quarrel to be impossible. And Maria Alicia continued to say only: "I am so hoping that something may test us. What, I ask you, could test us?"

"If you have a lower class to deal with," Señor Gómez gave out, "I might agree with you. All quarrels nowadays start with the lower classes. It was a Serbian student who——"

"Let us call in the opinion of that class," said young Gonzales softly and at a pause in the song called up to the man in the balcony:

"Pedro! Did you ever see a quarrel among ladies and gentlemen at such a party as this?"

There was an instant flash of white teeth in the dark face as the smooth voice answered:

"Sí, señor. I have seen ver' nice gentlemen fight. Ver' good fight, too."

There was a burst of laughter from the table. As it ceased, Paul heard Arkwright say to Alla:

"What a beautiful sapphire you are wearing!" She lifted her hand and touched her necklace.

"The expert opinion of the class!" John Meyer was crying. "That class will always fight. As long as you have Pedro's class on earth, you will have fighting. Since dueling, gentlemen never start a quarrel—understand me, gentlemen do not start a quarrel. All over the earth they are drawn into it by tradesmen, commercialists, money-lenders mere politicians. The learned professions, the arts, the scientists, polite society do not quarrel first."

"By Jove," said Arkwright, "you're right. They

The Secret of being happily married

A Husband passes on the Rules to his Son

By IRVING BACHELLER

"And the love that is best is the love that has lived,
When the springtime of youth is gone."

So runs the old song. And IRVING BACHELLER in this beautiful letter to his son tells how the "love that lives" is fostered by understanding and humor, by mutual helpfulness and common sense. THE DELINEATOR is happy to have secured permission to publish the letter for its readers. With a wealth of intimate and moving detail this popular author tells how his own married happiness was built up step by step and year after year. All married and going-to-be-married couples should read this letter. They will draw from it inspiration and a wider vision of what they can do with the life that lies beyond the wedding march, the rice and the flowers

MY OLD MOTHER TALKED TO ME OF THE GENTLE ART OF KEEPING STEP

WHEN MY WIFE WAS LATE FOR A DINNER I HAD PREPARED TO SURPRISE HER, I TASTED THE BITTER CUP WHICH IS SO OFTEN TOUCHING THE LIPS OF WOMEN

MY DEAR Son: One thing I would not fail to leave to you. It is the secret—if I may call it that—of my happy and contented life, a part of which you have shared. So, while the truth of the matter is clearly in my mind, I sit down to commit it to you in this letter. It will be a little history of my loves, the first of which was my love of men, all kinds of men, which was born in me.

There is no art so useful as that of making friends and keeping them. Yet this gentle art will be of slight service to any one unless it begins at home. There are many people who have not learned how to win and keep the friendship of a wife or a husband. They are careful to win and keep the friendship of those who command the way to success, but they are careless of him or her whose friendship is the thing most important to them. It commands the way to real happiness.

The love between a man and a woman is like a plant. It must grow or die. It can not stand still. Nothing stands still. One's love either grows wider and deeper or it grows less. The first passion is not the real thing, it is only a phase of it, a kind of preparation. That will pass. It should be the beginning of that affection which endures and is patient. If it is to grow it must have the bread of friendship and mutual sacrifice to feed upon Love is capable of miracles, but there is one miracle which it can not perform: It can not fast and grow strong. It is like every other thing that has life. It must be fed. When you get a wife, don't expect the ravens to feed her love for you.

I used to struggle anxiously for success in my business and later in my craft. It came slowly. I find now in its delay a great kindness. I have seen much water and many people going over the falls in my time. I have come to think that it is a misfortune for the young to achieve riches. The danger of disaster is too great. The strength of the young is for struggle. Therein is their great chance for real achievement and lasting happiness. What a rich and delightful comradeship I enjoyed in those years of hard work!

Once I saw a memorable meeting between old comrades of the Civil War. They embraced each other as tears ran down their cheeks.

"My God, sir!" one of them exclaimed, in explanation of his tears, "I love that man. He and I have fought and bled together and shared the same piece of hard-tack."

It is the smooth and flowery path of ease that is dangerous. Shared troubles and hardships are the meat and bread of real affection.

If my wife had a good husband it was because she made me that by loving, faithful devotion. I know that I had a good wife. We got from each other the things we sowed.

What a harvest came to us! I had not dreamed that in all the fields of this world I could hope to see the like of it. Slowly an abiding conviction had reached us that one had not to die to go to Paradise. We knew that we were in the midst of it.

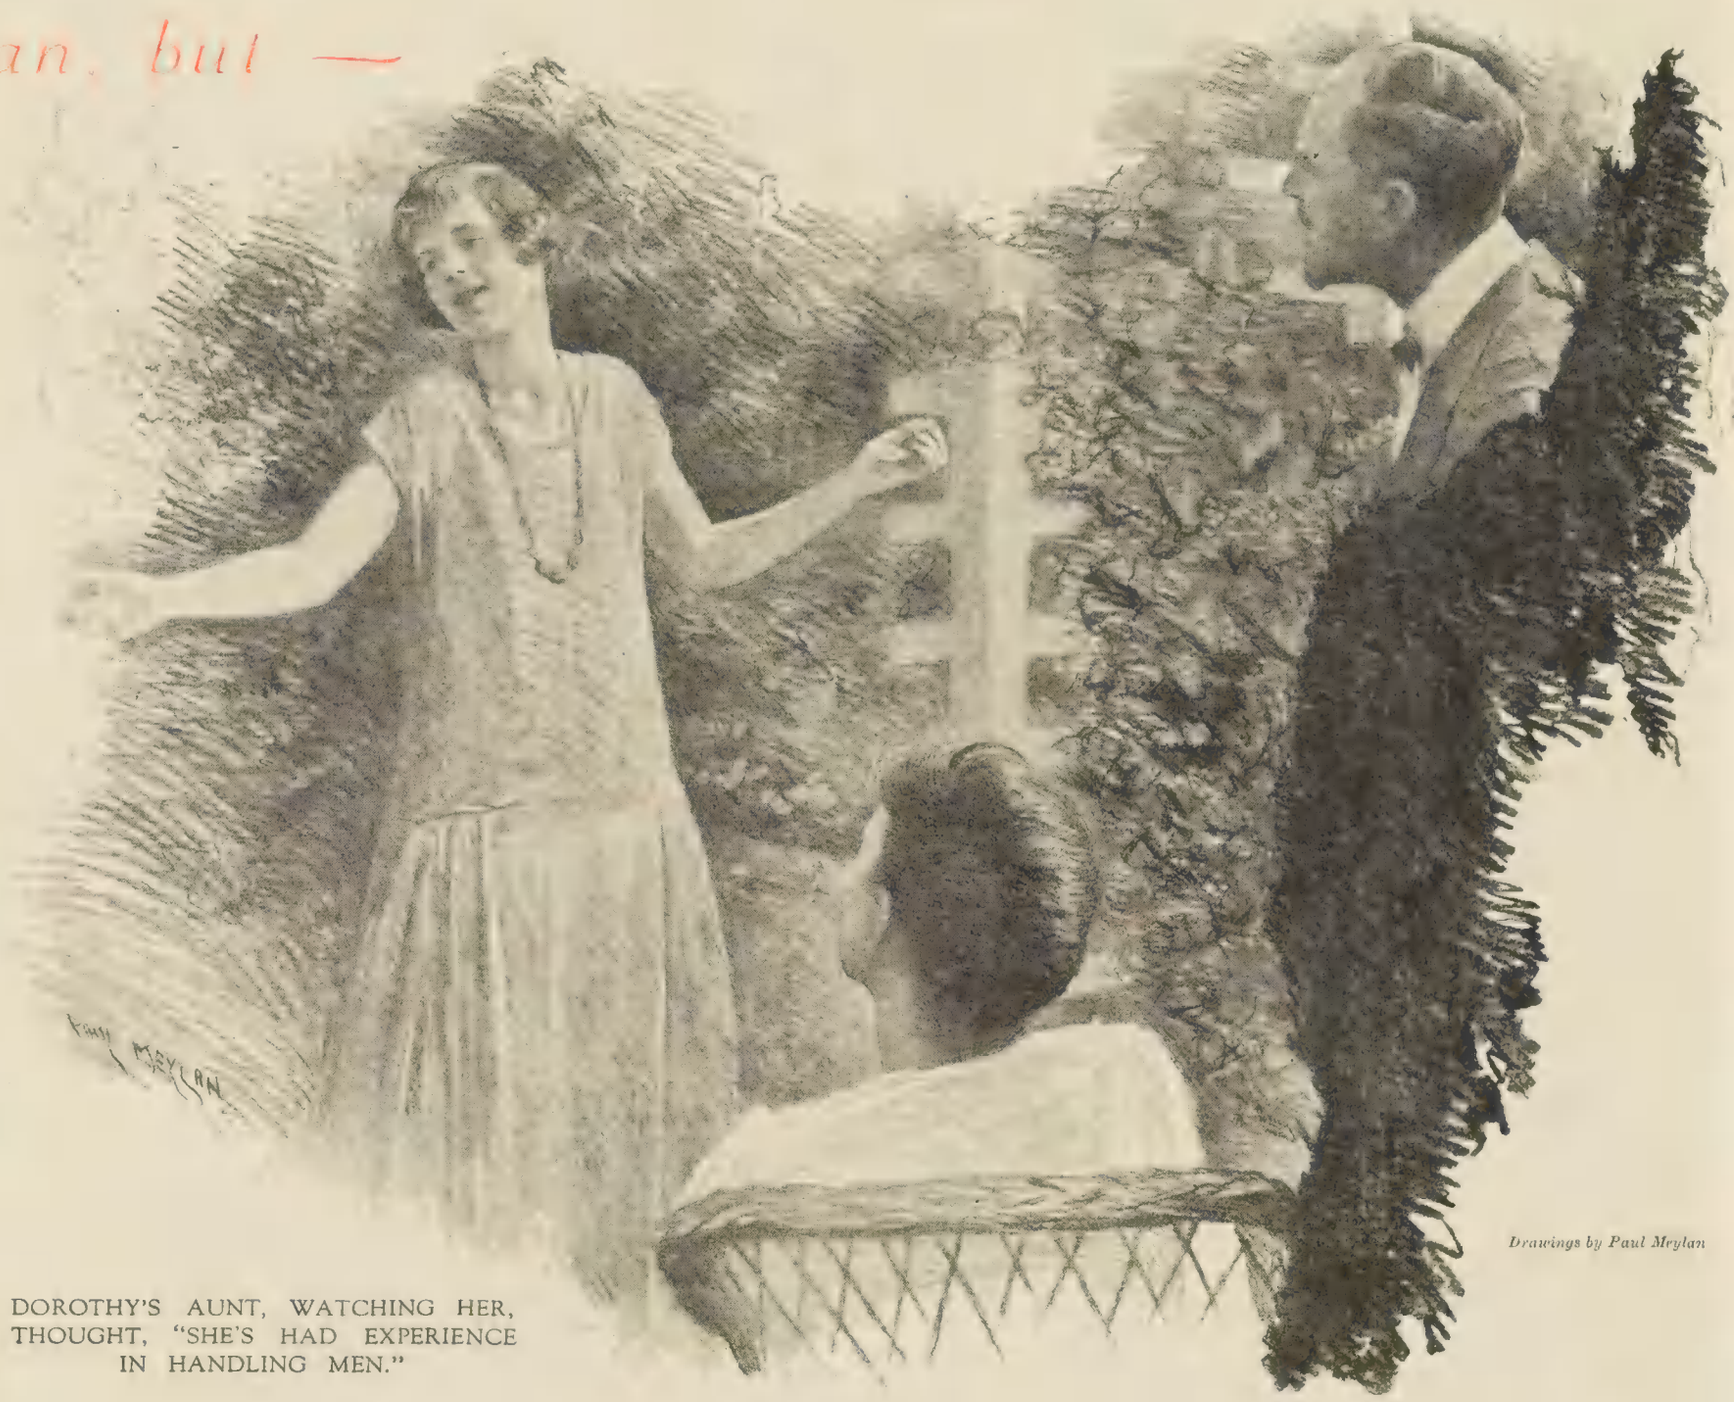
Then suddenly she was called to another part of that wonderful country. I was alone, but my faith was strong for the trial.

We were very human. The result might have been different—so vastly different.

Now a word to you as to the seed of our harvest. It is mostly in the words honor and judgment. Most men and women could be just as happily married as we, if they would put into the enterprise the same sense and honor that is needed in running a successful peanut-stand. You could not succeed with inferior goods and dishonest measurements. You know the first step in making a hare pie is to catch your hare. The first step toward making a happy marriage is a decent boy and a decent girl. The world is full of them. They are not hard to find. Nobody of ordinary common sense can long be fooled in choosing a mate. It's as easy to distinguish between a good and a bad person as it is to tell a straight from a crooked stick. The first important function of the human intellect is to help one in choosing his mate and his way. If one is foolish enough to marry without consulting his intellect as well as his heart, he is almost sure to be unhappy.

Once the well-chosen two are married the rest is mostly up to the man. He is the leader, the captain, the pathfinder. Much depends upon his honor and courage and good faith. At the altar he has taken upon himself the most solemn and binding obligation known to this world of ours. Before God and man he has promised to be true to the woman of his choice, and leaving all others to cleave to her. Does he mean it? Is he honest in this great undertaking—as honest as he would be with a business partner? Will he treat his wife with as much good faith as he gives to Smith and Jones, who are associated with him in the shop? Are the laws of God as sacred to him as the by-laws of his corporation? If so, there is not one chance in a hundred that his marriage will be unhappy, for the wife will be apt to follow in his footsteps whichever way they lead. It is natural that it should be so.

We should all understand that a man who is a traitor to his home, who breaks the heart and spirit of his wife and brings discredit upon his children, is guilty of the grossest breach of honor of which a man is capable. I would sooner forgive him who defaults in the counting-room. There may be some faint flavor of righteousness in his motive, and he is always hoping to restore the sum he steals. In any event he is not seriously undermining the foundations of civilized life.



So many men try to stand on both sides of the fence in this matter—to be openly straight and secretly crooked. How sure they are to wreck their homes and build up a growing distrust of themselves! For here is a great truth. No man ever fooled his wife or his community for long as to the exact condition of his character. It will come out, somehow, in whispers that travel like the winds of heaven. You might as well try to keep the air out of your house. Then, too, the human eye has a power which is little comprehended of seeing the truth. The eyes and ears of

THE FORTUNE HUNTER

By MARGARET CULKIN BANNING

She gets her man, but —

DOROTHY'S AUNT, WATCHING HER, THOUGHT, "SHE'S HAD EXPERIENCE IN HANDLING MEN."

Drawings by Paul Meylan

DOROTHY got off the train, hot and secretly cross. She stood disdainfully on the platform, looking like an illustration of what the Summer girl should wear while traveling, her flat envelope purse tucked under her arm at the proper angle, her hat-bag at her feet. She loved the hat-bag, so new, so shiny, so deftly initialed—and much good it would do her, she thought, to bring it to this place. There was probably not a man in the town. Doubtless they all left as soon as they were christened. Kerosene lamps, crocheted tidies, mosquitoes loomed gloomily in her imagination.

She turned sharply and almost ran into a woman approaching rapidly—wearing, as Dorothy promptly noted, a white linen dress that wasn't so bad, but a hat without an atom of style.

"I had to look twice," said her aunt, "I couldn't believe it was you. Somehow you don't look like your pictures."

"People seldom do," said Dorothy, with sophistication, being kissed through the remark.

Mrs. Boyd led her niece around the station to the parked automobiles, and they entered a well-washed and comfortable one. Dorothy's eyes ran over the group of cars. Here were pleasant indications—cars of important makes, and beside one of them a couple of interesting-looking men. Her spirits went up automatically.

"It doesn't look like a small town with all these lovely cars," she said.

"What keeps such people here in Wyndham?"

Her aunt laughed. "They live here only part of the year, many of them. They come for the Summer. You see, there's the lake only a mile away and the best beach for miles—and then there's the golf, and I suppose lots of them come because they like the town. Your mother always loved Wyndham, Dorothy."

"Did she?" asked Dorothy, whose eyes had grown keen at the mention of beach and golf.

"She didn't come back to it often after she was married. Never after you were born. You were such a little thing when she died."

FOR a few minutes they drove in silence, and then the car was stopped before a gray shingled house with green shutters which Dorothy regarded with enthusiasm.

"What a darling house! Did you build it?"

"We made it over," said Mrs. Boyd, "little by little, as we could afford it."

She and Dorothy went through the yard, surrounded by a low wall of natural stone.

"Of course the garden's in back," said Mrs. Boyd, "that's the best of the place. That's my pride."

Dorothy smiled at her. It was all charming and not in the least what she had expected during that last miserable hour, when she had decided that she had been a fool to come, even if it did give her a chance to say that she had been visiting in the East.

"This is the bed that your mother used to have when we were home," her aunt told her, putting the hat-bag down beside it.

"Pretty yellow wood," Dorothy commented.

"It's hard maple," answered her aunt.

She gave a curious glance at the girl looking around her with approving stock-taking. How very pretty she was and how much taste she had. Everything about her was pleasing, from the bobbed hair with its very slight permanent wave to her exquisite silk stockings. But Mrs. Boyd found her own smile getting mechanical. She gave Dorothy a little information about the next meal and the time her uncle would be in, and fled.

Doctor Boyd found his wife sitting in the little arbor, out back of the bird-bath.

"Dorothy here?" he called jovially.

"Yes. She's here."

"Well, what's wrong with her?"

"Hush. Not so loud. Nothing. She's awfully pretty."

He sat down and took the sewing out of his wife's hand.

"Well, what is it?"

"Oh, I suppose I thought she'd be a little less mature, somehow. Isabel's daughter—I don't know why I let her escape me so long. Perhaps she felt a little strange. Maybe we were both shy. Here she comes."

Doctor Boyd advanced to meet his niece, his eyes lighting up, for she was very lovely as she stood between the hollyhocks in a quaint blue dress with Kate Greenaway fulness.

"Why, you're a beauty, Dorothy. Nobody told me that!" he said.

She laughed.

"I'm so thrilled. This is almost the nicest place I've ever been. It's like the Mount's garden at home."

Mrs. Boyd, watching, thought, "She's had experience in handling men. How different she is with Tom. They are both quite at ease."

Doctor Boyd paid his niece a humorous kind of court at dinner. She met it easily, pleasantly. No, she wouldn't smoke. Never had the habit—or any decent cigaret holders! Besides she wasn't allowed to on the newspaper. She then told them about her work. She wrote the society pages, but her pride was the "Jane says" column which she edited, a column written by a mythical "Jane," who had a great deal of inside knowledge of social events, a humorous outlook and an array of clever phrases.

"They all want to be mentioned in it, especially the ones who pretend that they want to be left out."

Hard, cruel little reflections such as this came from her strangely, for she looked so sweet and so young. Mrs. Boyd, watching her, felt the puzzle increasing.

Doctor Boyd chuckled.

"Work's all right, I suppose, with plenty of young men to dance attendance?" he questioned.

The faintest cloud came over Dorothy's face.

"Not many men. Most of my best friends are married now. There are so few available men at home left."

"What makes a man available?"

"You should know, Uncle Tom," laughed Dorothy, "he has to be a 'good provider,' anyhow. That's all I insist on."

"And how's your father?" asked her aunt, changing the subject swiftly.

"Father? Oh, you know what he's like. He's a darling, but he's always running a convention for some terrible lot of people—people you never meet. Or boosting for something."

Mrs. Boyd let the conversation fall to her niece and her husband. Oh, you couldn't blame this girl for being a little hard, seeing life on its cheapest, hardest side, from the social columns of a newspaper. She must be given a good time—a young time—while she was in Wyndham.

"What would you like to do to-night, Dorothy? We could ride out around the lake—it's a lovely drive—or drop in and see Mrs. Jennings. She used to be your mother's best friend and she's very anxious to meet you."

"Just as you say, Aunt Louise," said Dorothy docilely, reflecting that there wasn't much choice. Either way she would probably be expected to be sentimental over her mother's old home.

So Mrs. Boyd made the decision. Perhaps she rather dreaded being alone with her niece.

"Well, let's just say hello to Mrs. Jennings."

DOROTHY liked the walk. She felt herself relax a little out of the mental tenseness that always kept her alert for her advantage. To walk along in the shadowy street, past houses with big beautiful lawns, to feel that Mrs. Boyd was in a way part of this, made Dorothy easier than she had been in a long while. They turned up an avenue of trees (a private drive, thought Dorothy—her mother's old friend must be rich), and on a deep-screened veranda, Mrs. Jennings rose to greet them.

"You've brought Dorothy over right away!" she exclaimed delightedly and held out a cordial hand.

"She isn't going to sob over me, anyway," thought Dorothy cheerfully, warmed by this sense of being welcome in the midst of such affluence.

Mrs. Boyd turned to speak to some one who detached himself from the shadows.

"You home, Martin?"

Even in the darkness Dorothy guessed that Martin must be young. Her mind, so concentrated on its own purposes, began at that instant to weave about Martin Jennings. But she had learned in a hard school not to be over-eager in action.

"So you meet Dorothy right at the start of her visit," Mrs. Boyd introduced them.

"Do I begin to say Dorothy, too?" asked Martin Jennings.

Dorothy felt that beginning was auspicious.

She barely noted that his face was well cut and that his hair was thick and sandy. Odd, how little a man's looks had come to mean to Dorothy. So many other things counted so much more—the amount of money he had, the place he held socially—above all, his freedom from marriage or engagement. It was such a struggle to find any one eligible, and if any such men did turn up in Cosmopolis it was always the girls who could entertain them, the girls with cars and homes and dress allowances, who got them.

Martin Jennings couldn't be engaged or married. The older women didn't act as if he was. Mrs. Jennings said that he had come home from some little town to be with her over the week-end.

"I wonder, Martin," she suggested, "why you don't take Dorothy—the car's still out in the avenue—and run over to the club for a while. They'll be dancing. She can meet a few people. He's quite safe, Dorothy, and we're a most informal community. All your aunt's friends have been expecting you as much as she has, I think."

"Would you like to go?" asked Martin Jennings. He spoke courteously, without any pressure in his tone.

"Would you?" countered Dorothy.

"Well, to tell you the truth until this minute I most decidedly did not. But I'm changing my mind. Unless you're one of the girls who dances all night. I ought to warn you I'm no good in endurance dances. I'm old, you know."

"Run along, Martin," said Mrs. Boyd, "it will do you good."

DOROTHY wondered vaguely why Martin should need to have good done him. Then she forgot his possible problems in the fun of being driven along the lovely country roads in a car that went so smoothly and so very swiftly. Her respect for her companion grew.

It was delicious to be a visiting girl for once. How many times she had written up the triumphs of some visiting girl at home! Now to be the center of the stage was like a dream. She knew from the attitude of every one—but particularly that of the girls—that Martin Jennings was a young man of importance.

"My luck," thought Dorothy, "has come at last."

They did not stay late. Dorothy suggested herself that an hour was long enough. He liked that. On the way home she rather expected to find him human and flirtatious, for everybody "necked" now, especially these quiet ones—but he made no attempt to do anything of the sort. So she huddled in her cloak and kept to her own side of the car and listened to him talk.

Her uncle and aunt were still up when she came in and she captivated her uncle even more with the wind-flush on her face and the glow of excitement in her eyes.

"Did you like Martin?" asked her aunt after he had gone.

"Yes," said Dorothy, "but why is everybody so choice of him?"

Doctor Boyd laughed but his wife sighed.

"Poor Martin."

"Has he an affliction?"

"Wealth," said her aunt.

"I could stand up under that," laughed Dorothy.

"There's more to it. He's very rich and he's had a good deal of faith knocked out of him. You see, his mother made a second marriage when Martin was growing up. She had a large fortune and the man who married her thought more of it than he did of her. It ended in the divorce court and the stamp is on Martin, in a way. He suffered a lot of disillusionment. But he fought. He wouldn't let the man, who really was a fortune-hunter, get a thing out of it but a ruined reputation. It brought out a hard streak in Martin."

"You mean he's suspicious that people are after his money? Got a fortune-hunter complex?"

"That's it," said Doctor Boyd, "he's a stern and implacable youth—he needs attention, Dorothy. You give it to him."

"I'll fortune-hunt him," laughed Dorothy.

She went up-stairs with a gay good night. She was thanking her stars that she had been careful with Martin Jennings. Her mind leaped ahead, half-fearful. What a triumph it would be to go back to Cosmopolis engaged. Engaged to a wealthy man. To marry—to show the girls who thought she was a last leaf—to show the men whom she had failed to land what she could do.

Little phrases danced through her mind. "Mr. Lewis Lasalle announces the engagement of his daughter Dorothy to Mr. Martin Jennings—" that was the way it would read. And then—"The groom is a Yale man, a member of—" Dorothy closed her eyes in a dreaming anticipation of triumph. For two years she had known that her only chance of improving her position was in a good marriage. And who was there to marry in Cosmopolis? Phil Moore had rushed her and she thought he was almost in love with her until it was suddenly announced that he was engaged to Cynthia Deming, who was poorer than she herself and had no drive at all. It wasn't as if she had cared for Phil. She simply wiped him off the scant list of possibles. But he hadn't played quite fair, she felt.

ARMS back of her head and pillowless, Dorothy went to sleep dreaming.

As she got up in the morning she felt again the sense of refreshment that had come the night before. The smile on her face was more real when she appeared in the dining-room. Her aunt, sitting behind the sort of coffee service that Dorothy admired, greeted her warmly. Doctor Boyd was full of jokes—not the kind of jokes her father told, which were stupid men's jokes with raucous endings. Her uncle had humor and philosophy. By the time breakfast was over Dorothy felt that she belonged here in Wyndham.

And the next two weeks were happy ones. Into such Summer gaiety as there was in Wyndham, and Dorothy soon discovered that it was a distinguished gaiety, she was welcomed at once. Doctor Boyd's niece was welcomed everywhere and soon Martin Jennings was always in attendance.

Her first feeling when Martin asked her to marry him was one of quick relief—that this time at least she had not deluded herself or overplayed her hand. While she rather fumblingly sought to say just the right thing she could not keep the picture of an amazed and admiring Cosmopolis out of her mind. A thoroughly confounded Cosmopolis! But those thoughts did not interfere with her sweetness to Martin and certainly not with his happiness. He was a radiant young man, so much in love that his mother was delighted. Only Mrs. Boyd's pleasure was tempered and she did not show that except to her husband, whom she knew she could trust. Once or twice she looked speculatively at Dorothy, and one day when Dorothy was expatiating on what she had to do to get "things ready" for her wedding which was to take place in the fall, Mrs. Boyd said deterringly:

"You won't forget that it's you Martin wants. He won't care what kind of wedding you have. Come and be married from my house, dear——"

"It's wonderful of you," said Dorothy and hesitated. Before her came a vision of what peace a quiet wedding in Wyndham could offer; but that was followed by the thought of Cosmopolis and the revelation of her triumph. For years Cosmopolis and its society had been the center of Dorothy's life. She was going to show Martin to Cosmopolis! She finished her remarks to her aunt, "I think I ought to be married at home. There are so many of my friends who will want to be there, you see. And you'll come, won't you, Aunt Louise?"

"LISTEN," SHE CRIED BREATHLESSLY, "YOU KNOW HOW YOU HATE FORTUNE-HUNTERS—WELL, THAT'S WHAT I AM—AND I'M NOT GOING TO MARRY YOU!"

"Of course we'll come, dear——"

IT WAS only a day or two after that that Dorothy was back in the office of the Cosmopolis Journal.

"My, I'm glad you're back," said her assistant. "It's been a dirty grind—and I can't get the kick into the stuff that you do."

Never had Dorothy felt more impelled to put kick into it. She put a fresh sheet of paper into her typewriter, ran over the notes and began to tick away. Just at the foot of the column which announced what "Jane" had to say came a properly formulated notice of her engagement to Martin Jennings.

Dorothy had come back from Wyndham to make Cosmopolis fête her. But she had not been back a week before she found that there was much managing to be done.

It was not that she forgot Martin. Not for a minute. She told herself that she only wanted Martin to be proud of her, to see that her own townspeople liked her. But her letters to Martin became perhaps a little mechanical, enough so to draw forth a protest in one of his—"I don't give a whoop how many parties they give for you. Only don't let them tire you out, will you, darling? Of course they'll all want to do things for you, but just don't let them."

He wrote that letter to Dorothy one day when Cecilia Moore of Cosmopolis was saying crossly to her mother, "I don't care about entertaining for Dorothy a bit, mother. But she expects it and it's embarrassing. She did give your reception a wonderful send-off in the 'Jane says' column——"

"Well, it must be very simple," answered her mother.

Dorothy sensed it all—but she did not care.

She was blithe, for so an engaged girl must be. She made a miraculous trousseau for ridiculous prices, deftly copying the things in the best trousseaux of the season. She dropped in at the shops where wedding-presents are chosen to hint at her favorite patterns of china and silver—her taste in linens. All those things that some one else may do so tactfully for a bride Dorothy was forced to do for herself. She flashed her engagement ring, which was beautiful, and it encouraged her with the thought, "After I'm married to Martin, I can relax."

She had planned it for October twenty-eighth before she knew that Cynthia Deming and Phil Moore had chosen the same week. It was too late to change.

THERE came the time, of course, when Dorothy put her final "Jane says" column into shape, shook hands all around the office (it was astonishing how much they seemed to like her) and left the Journal office for good. The next night was to be her wedding. All through the day Dorothy was nervous. Cynthia Moore was married two days before Dorothy and had somehow sapped a good deal of the social interest in nuptials. Dorothy wondered how many people would come. She was full of pathetic, almost desperate hope and fear, and her bridegroom found her hardly normal. Fortunately he took that as a natural enough development.

She had told Martin she could not see him the next morning. At eight o'clock that day she was dressed and working, a bride in an old blue smock. Details claimed her. The whole affair rode on the crest of the wave of happiness for Dorothy, who, none the less, was somewhat shadowed under the eyes, having no mother to insist that she rest and only a host of friends who said "You need sleep, Dorothy—why don't you try to get a nap?"

Night came. Management did pay after all. If Esther Davis was bridesmaid, then the Davises, of course, would come—if the Davises, then the Pentons—and so on. And Dorothy had supplemented the engraved invitations by personal telephonings. The rooms were crowded with people all in wedding mood, a little grave, a little curious, a little gay.

Dressed in white velvet, for Cynthia Moore had worn satin, she stood before her mirror. The bridesmaids were in the next room, talking noisily. In half an hour or so she would be married.

There were voices in the next room still. Two women were sitting on the bed next the partition, probably taking off carriage-boots. How easy to hear them. How easy——

"Put it over, didn't she? Clever girl."

"Well, she's been at it for years. She knows all the ropes. You never see Dorothy Lasalle without an ax to grind. How she did work up this wedding! She wanted all the important people in town throwing rice at her."

"Everybody's here."

"I was dead to-night, but she called me up personally and asked me to get here. No reason why I should. My husband absolutely refused to come. But then, you always have some curiosity, you know. She's worked people so for presents. I wanted to see what she got."

Why didn't they go away, thought Dorothy, her face aflame!

"What's the man like?"

"Very nice, I hear. I always feel sorry for a man who gets a girl like that. Sooner or later he finds out that the girl's a fortune-hunter. She tried desperately to get Phil Moore, you know. Mrs. Moore stopped that. She didn't mind Cynthia having no money, but she didn't want Dorothy."

"Clever girl, though," said the skeptic.

AT LAST they moved. On the other side of the partition Dorothy stood, hands clenched. So that was how they talked, so cruelly. Oh, she'd vaguely guessed it, of course. One wasn't social editor without knowing such things. But she couldn't face these people now—she couldn't face that mockery to-night. Suddenly she thought of Martin as the only person she wanted to see and then the words came back with redoubled force—"Sorry for the man—sooner or later—he would find out"—No, he wouldn't—there wasn't anything to find after all. She'd be a good wife! Her startled, tired thoughts scurried away from the word "wife!" Somehow, in the rush of preparations, in the sense of "putting it over," she hadn't thought what it would be like to be Martin's wife. To have him find out that he didn't want her after all perhaps, to have the look in his eyes that she had sometimes seen in her Aunt Louise's face—Oh, they all knew she was a schemer. Only Martin hadn't known or believed it.

Dorothy gathered up her dress and went down the hall to the room where Martin was. He looked very proud and a little nervous.

"What did I forget?" he grinned at Dorothy.

She shut the door behind them both and leaned against it.

"Listen," she began breathlessly, "you know how you hate fortune-hunters—like the man who married your mother. Well—that's what I am."

Like most men in crises, he made only unintelligible sounds.

"I am—and I'm not going to marry you! Go away quietly, get out of here and if you ever think of me at all, remember what I saved you from!"

She heard her aunt outside.

"Can I come in, Martin?"

"Yes, something's gone wrong with Dorothy."

Dorothy confronted her aunt.

"You know," she said, still in that tense low voice, "you know what kind of a girl I am, a schemer. You've known all along. Every one here knows. They're all sorry for Martin and making fun of me. Ask me if I'd marry you if you were poor, Martin. I wouldn't. Not for a minute. I wanted to show Cosmopolis I could get a desirable man. But I won't put you through it. That's one thing I won't do, Aunt Louise. Let them go away and say what they like. Give everybody a chance to spread the news. Tell them all the truth. I don't care!"

"Hush," said Mrs. Boyd. "Martin, she's simply exhausted and hysterical. Get Doctor Boyd for a minute."

Martin hesitated.

"You mean you don't like me, Dorothy?"

Dorothy laughed, a foolish, crushed laugh.

"I don't know," she cried. "I know right well I wouldn't go through this for any one else!"

They called the doctor and tried to calm her, tried to prove it was only fatigue. But Dorothy was silent and rigid. She would not be married. It was only an apartment, in which such things can not be suppressed and wedding-guests can not be kept waiting too long. Gossip began to filter through to the living-rooms. They consulted hastily a worried Lewis Lasalle, a grim bridegroom and a grave uncle and aunt. Then, suavely, Doctor Boyd announced that Dorothy had been suddenly taken ill and that there would be no wedding. The guests dispersed, the caterer and his assistants were paid off and went their bewildered way, the little maid wept, the smilax in the living-room seemed to droop, the candles were blown out. Martin hung around, but his mouth was set, and finally he went away without asking to see Dorothy again. After that Mrs. Boyd made her niece go to bed. A strange, uncertain silence came over the house and the older people sat around trying to eat some of the wedding ices, which Lewis Lasalle tried to joke about and failed.

"I'll stay here to-night, if Lewis will give me his room," said Mrs. Boyd. "You go back to the hotel, Lewis, with Tom."

MRS. BOYD went to sleep after she had heard the clock strike three. There was no sound from Dorothy's room, no sob, no complaint, no hysteria. But it was impossible that she should be asleep, thought her aunt. She wondered if she dared offer affection and did not quite dare. Mrs. Boyd felt that Martin had not been very fine. He must have seen at least how brave Dorothy was.

When she wakened, it was to find the morning advanced. She looked at her watch and felt ashamed of having dodged tragedy so long. But when she slipped into one of Dorothy's negligées and went to her niece's room, it was empty. She found Dorothy in the dining-room, making coffee in the percolator. She was dressed for the street, even to her hat.

"Good morning," ventured Mrs. Boyd; "but Dorothy, you shouldn't be up!"

Dorothy straightened her shoulders and smiled.

"Well, if I'm not getting married, I'm going to get my job back. I can't lie around with a broken heart. This will make a good story for my column, too!"

"You mustn't go to work. Come to Wyndham with me. Maybe you and Martin——"

Dorothy shook her head.

"No—I couldn't go to Wyndham. I just couldn't. I'm better off here. I thought out a lot of things last night, Aunt Louise, and I gave up the idea of running away. There's a whole lot of wasted stuff to be paid for—I may as well help pay for it. And I don't really care what they say. I really don't—that's a fact."

She looked straight at Mrs. Boyd and her aunt recognized the truth. She didn't care for gossip. She had gone past that.

"Also," remarked Dorothy, pouring out the coffee, "I'm glad I did just what I did. All night I was more glad every minute. It ought to show Martin that even if he thinks every one is after his precious money and position, some people don't take it."

She faltered over that last statement, then looked nonchalantly at her ringless hands and back at Mrs. Boyd.

"I'm hard, Aunt Louise, you know—hard as nails."

"You're brave," said Aunt Louise, "braver than any one I have ever known, except your mother, who was braver yet—for she married your father because she loved him and faced a good deal of ridicule from her friends who only saw the most obvious things about him."

"So they made fun of my mother? Well, anyway she got the man she wanted. I'm glad of that."

She rose from the table abruptly, pushing away her coffee and toast.

"I'll bet they'll take me back on the paper. After all, I haven't committed any crime. And with days on the paper and nights sending wedding-presents back, I shall be too busy to mope!"

THE telephone rang and Dorothy shivered.

"There it goes," she said. "Tell any one I'm all right, will you, Ida?" she addressed the maid. "I haven't time to talk. I've got to get out of here before the telephone begins to ring steadily. I'm not much of a hostess, Aunt Louise, but I can't sit around cherishing my broken heart. It's not my style, even if it is sentimental and picturesque. I can keep working. That's what I've always done." She jumped, nervously. "Lord, there's the door-bell. The telephone is for you, Aunt Louise. And don't let any one in, Ida."

But Ida failed or was bribed, for Martin Jennings appeared in the doorway, looking tired and sheepish and frightened and triumphant. They faced each other—defiant weariness on Dorothy's face, a look which seemed to beg him to leave her alone and not force her to talk. Her words were the echo of her old gay manner.

"Aren't you early—under the circumstances? Want some breakfast?"

"Don't I!" said Martin. "I didn't have time to get any. I gave up the railroad ticket, but I have your wedding-trip down below. I got a shop open early, thanks to your father's influence with the automobile show. Your wedding-trip is red and has four tires and is very expensive," he grinned at her "and it's quite fit for a fortune-hunter to ride in. It stops only at small towns and restful hotels where we can get acquainted. We'll let your family come far enough to witness the ceremony and then we'll show some speed."

Dorothy looked tired and white and dragged and pitiful.

"You mean you're suggesting that I go away with you after all this? Why? A sense of pity or obligation?"

"A sense of shame," said Martin. "I'm ashamed of myself. As far as I can see, my money is the only attractive thing about me. Take it, Dorothy, and if you can bear it, throw me in, too. Doctor Boyd told me a few homely truths last night and I saw a few myself. I've been staggering around for years, suspicious and ugly for fear I wouldn't be loved for myself. And last night I didn't measure up, because I was still thinking about myself, even when you were proving so fine and showing more than that—weren't you?"

"More than that," said Dorothy. "Oh, yes. I care. Horribly. But you're sure you want me, hard and scheming and everything? Even if I love you? You know what every one will say?"

"The only thing I care about," said Martin, coming close enough to demonstrate, "is what Jane says!"

What love may lead to —
Alice and Linda dash toward the precipice

"Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And that thoughts of men are widening with the process of the suns."

Mr. Hutchinson took the title of his great new novel from these lines of the poet Tennyson. At first he called it "The Increasing Purpose," but he has recently determined to hold even more closely to the original quotation. He has therefore asked us to run the remaining instalments under the revised title, "One Increasing Purpose."

SYNOPSIS

SIMON PARIS came through the slaughter of war unscathed. Why? he wondered in agony. A mysterious answer seemed to come from his dead mother: "You are spared for a special purpose." But the war ended and still he could not find the purpose. Visiting first his brother Charles and his wife Alice, later his rich brother Andrew and gay wife Linda, he witnessed in both houses turbulent married life with storms ahead. Then came again into Sim's life Elizabeth Glade. They loved deeply at the instant of their reunion—but she had pledged never to marry while a sum of money stolen by her father remained unrepaid. Groping for further light, Sim bought a cottage in the country—near the country-seat of Lord Staverton, Andrew's employer, and the estate of Stupendity, the great department-store genius, for whom Elizabeth did secretarial work. Sim, creating a new furniture design, aroused the keen interest of Stupendity's business assistants. But one evening, on the downs, a vision of his purpose came at last to Sim—a certain knowledge that the purpose was "of God."

PART FOUR

ELIZABETH'S life, self-chosen, was very hard. She worked unceasingly—but work unceasing is not of itself hard. The always busy are the enviable. They have no time for frets or ills. Their brief snatched leisures, just in being leisures, are packed with delights impossible of purchase by those at whose command lie all of pleasure's toy-shops. Not less than sleep, work does knit up the raveled sleeve of care. It is a hard couch—but herein lies its recompense: a stone pillow, before and since that used at Bethel, is capable of dreams.

Elizabeth had no dreams. The heart, however long and hard the road of duty, always can dream dreams. But her heart, and not her mind alone, was given to her duty in behalf of her father's memory.

"I don't want only to pay his debt," she more than once had said to Sim. "Sim, what I can not bear is the thought of some one sending out bitter hate against my poor father. Dear Sim, that is what I want to shield my father from."

Miss Andiron, embittered, made this very hard to do. She lived in a London boarding-house and whenever Elizabeth came to see her, as at every opportunity Elizabeth came, "This is how I am compelled to live" was the burden of her cry. "I might have had a nice house, I might have had nice servants, I might have kept my car—but no, I was robbed. In my old age when I need comforts and when I could have had comforts I am denied comforts because your father robbed me."

Those were cruel words for the heart of Elizabeth.

IN THE week-end following Sim's vision as he rode home from Chesney Towers, Elizabeth came down to the Towers immediately after a visit to Miss Andiron in which Miss Andiron, particularly out of humor, had caused her particular suffering. She had come alone, no Stupendity party with her; and Sim went over to the Towers and into the library and was struck, immediately he saw her, by the paleness of her face and by the sigh with which, getting up from the table at which she worked, she sank onto the couch to which he led her.

These were the signs and tokens of a very great weariness. They caused in Sim an excess of pity and a great hungering of love. They caused in him also a very great concern at that which, much wounded in a great conflict within himself, he had come to tell her.

Approaching it circuitously, he began:

"Elizabeth, you are frightfully tired."

"Oh, I am a little bit fagged, Sim."

"You have been going too far, Elizabeth."

She sighed. "Sim, I have a long way to go."

He said: "That is what I want to talk to you about. A long way to go. There are twenty years for you to go, at this rate."

"Nearly twenty years, Sim."

"And then?"

She made a gesture with her hands.

The couch was low. She put one foot across the other and clasped her hands about the knee thus raised and set her eyes upon the long vista of the great apartment. As though her thoughts hung pictures there and she reviewed them, she said low and softly: "I feel that I shall be very old in twenty years, Sim—all gone that is pleasant in one—all done that one cares to do."

Perhaps the pictures changed.

"We might have married, Sim—had children——"

A sound of pain escaped him.

"But this thing came into my life. Marriage, dear you, motherhood, children had to go."

Her voice was barely audible.

"Of course that's frightful for a woman, Sim. They talk, these modern women, they talk of a glorious independence. Sim, I've got independence. I am doing very well. When I have paid my father's debt, I can see quite plainly that I shall be established, able to get excellent employment, beyond any fear of a starved old age. That is independence. But, Sim, for a woman, that is life incomplete, not rounded off, left just to peter out."

She watched those pictures.

She presently said: "Sim, a man somehow can complete his life, round off, satisfy it, without a woman. I don't know how—I only know that it is clear he can. Alone, he can go up the wave of life, achieve the crest, look down the trough, see the long dimness in the hollow, begin descent, and have no loneliness, no sense of incompletion.

"A woman can't do that, Sim. She needs, she is created for completion—completion in her husband's and her children's home, Sim."

After a while she said: "That is what I am facing, Sim."

His turn was now—now was the hour of the casting of his die.

He said: "You need not face it, dear."

His voice shook. "I love you, beloved."

He said: "I love you, beloved. I have offered you marriage. There were those chances of employment that I had. They did not seem to suit me. That was nothing. If you had said that you would marry me, I would have taken one—and can—they still are open."

She murmured: "Dear, my vow."

He got up and crossed the room and then returned to her.

"Well, let that be so. But I have thought about this. Suppose that I had an offer of enough money not only to make your payments to Miss Andiron but to make them much greater, to pay her off in half, in a quarter of twenty years. Suppose you asked her to choose—should you continue to pay her little by little as you are paying her or should you, by marrying me, pay her all in half, in less than half the time? Suppose you asked her that—what would she choose, do you suppose?"

Elizabeth said: "Sim, of course there is no doubt which she would choose."

"And are her choice, her wishes to be considered?"

"Much more than any one's, Sim."

"Well, then—well, then!" His voice was thick, there was about his look and tone an intensity that almost was alarming to her. He said a third time: "Well, then! Suppose I had an offer to-morrow, now, this minute, of a thousand pounds a year—a thousand, and more increasingly to come."

The harshness suddenly went out of his voice. He said deeply: "And, Elizabeth, there is this that you have told me of the incompletion of your life, its desolate and pitiable outlook—there is this of our love, of me, of children to us."

"Sim, yes," she breathed.

He said: "All possible within the offer of a thousand pounds a year."

"All possible," she sighed. "Impossible all."

He said strongly: "Not impossible. Elizabeth, I have had that offer."

"Sim!"

He had his elbow, as he sat, on his knee. He bent forward his clenched fist, and she could see the flesh gone white where with a terrible constriction of his fingers the nails pressed in. "I have had that offer," he said. He bowed his head down on to his extended arm: "God help me, I have refused it."

She saw that something very insupportable had happened. She put an arm about his bowed shoulders. "Oh, what is this, Sim?"

His voice, coming between teeth that were clenched, said, as in a groan: "I have refused it and I have drawn you on to tell me the happiness that I have lost you. I have drawn you on to tell me the happiness that might be mine and I have refused it. God, God!"

"Sim, tell me."

HE CAME up from his bowed position and faced her. "There is a very great deal to tell you. I came to-day to tell you of two things. That is one. Stupendity came over to see me last Sunday. He has taken up those furniture designs of mine. He thinks that there are immense possibilities in them. He wants to put them on the market—'Simparis furniture,' it was to be called."

He stopped. He said wearily: "You had better hear the whole of this part while I am at it, before I come to the other. Simparis furniture—I was to design it, I was to superintend the making of it. Elizabeth, you have to understand, as Stupendity quite clearly understood, that this stuff, this furniture, if it was to create the vogue it could create, essentially must be individually made by a craftsman's hand and under the eye of the designer. No two pieces even of one pattern could be exactly the same, each would have the workman's self-expression. That was the difference between the things of Heppelwhite, Chippendale, Sheraton and those——"

He broke off. "Elizabeth, I am sorry for all this jargon."

She said: "Dear, go on."

"It is necessary that you should know it all. That was the difference between the art of those men and the machine-turned stuff, however beautiful, that came after it—that, in its turn, was to be the difference between the Simparis stuff and the other. Well, there was the proposal. I was to design, I was to find and select and supervise the workmen. A whole-time job, Stupendity offered me a thousand pounds a year—to start."

He stopped again.

"Dear, wonderful!" she breathed.

He said bitterly: "Yes, wonderful!"

He said to her in tones most deep: "Elizabeth, that was last Sunday, early, just at nine in the morning. That was one thing I had to tell you. The other thing had happened to me on the evening before, and I had not slept that night. Elizabeth, I had been coming back from here to my cottage, and as I came a thing happened to me. Elizabeth, my purpose—this thing that has been so utterly distressing me all these months—Elizabeth, my purpose, came to me as I was coming back."

"Oh, Sim!"

"Elizabeth, it is—of God."

She breathed: "I knew it, Sim."

He told her that which had happened to him. He told her of his thoughts as he rode up the common; of the light in the sky; of his thought of Saul; of his thought of himself, crossed over from life transient to life eternal, flung abject at the foot of that bright road between the two and of his mother coming down to lead him up; of the refusal of his throat to ask her to lead him up to God; of his pronouncing of the word and of the great stillness that came to him when at last he uttered it; last, of his prayer within the church—"some truth that I can understand."

She heard him with a shining happiness in her eyes, murmurs of happy wonder in her voice, in her hands touches of a great comfort, that were exquisite to him, though they tortured him.

He said: "But, Elizabeth—but, Elizabeth, all that was clear, and in the night there came this clear thing—that I had just to wait and I should have some truth that I can understand. I am nothing without it. I am a very ordinary man—I am a man of my time, a material, practical time, and I wait now to know some truth that I can understand behind the mystery. I have only now to wait for the revelation—to watch for it; give all my thoughts to it; Elizabeth, to pray for it."

She murmured: "Watch and pray."

His mood seemed to change. He said very heavily: "Yes, watch and pray."

He got up. "I have said that my purpose has been revealed to me. Elizabeth, do you see that it has been only half revealed? Of God, I know. For God, I know. How for God, I do not know."

"Sim, it will come."

He cried: "You say it will; Elizabeth, I said that, I knew that on the night that it happened; and immediately, on the very morning after, came this offer which can give me you. But the two are not possible together: God's purpose, man's purpose—all that I think I seek of heaven, all that I know I seek of you. God's purpose, that I shall watch and pray for it; man's purpose that I shall take this offer, earn, work, be occupied. Elizabeth——"

She took from him the question he had not spoken. "Sim, you have done what you are to do. God's purpose, you have accepted it; man's purpose, you have refused it."

He cried, "Refused it!" He held out his arm. "It is here, in my hand, waiting for me. I have only to close my fingers to take it. Stupendity will give it to me, he would give me twice a thousand pounds, to-morrow, if I will take it. Elizabeth, all our happiness, all here in my hand—" he began to close his fingers—"for me to close my fingers on."

She leaned forward and, with one hand beneath his hand, with the other hand smoothed back his closing fingers.

"A THOUSAND POUNDS IS A LOT OF MONEY FOR OLD GAND TO LEAVE TO HIS NURSE," EXCLAIMED SIM TO HIS BROTHER. ALICE SHUDDERED VIOLENTLY

IN THE time that followed it was very curious to Sim that, in a way he could by no means define but only very strongly feel, he had the sense of being nearest to an answer of his prayer when he was in the company of a family whose acquaintance he had come to make. These people, resident some ten miles away, were called the Englands. They lived over at Knapton, beyond Shifney. They were a very old family, many generations settled in that part of the country and owning there a considerable estate; and Sir Henry England was dependent, Andrew told Sim, entirely on the revenues of

The weakest Link

By

FIELDING H. YOST

Director of Intercollegiate Athletics, University of Michigan

THE life tables of the United States Census for 1920 tell us that the death rate of women between the ages of seventeen and thirty-two has risen and now, for the first time in history, exceeds that of men. The home-making woman has become the weakest link connecting this generation with the next.

I do not know the full explanation for this condition, but one reason may be that other groups are having a great deal done to preserve life by outside agencies, while the mothers are left largely to their own resources.

Therefore women must take it upon their own shoulders to discover where their special weaknesses lie. To this end every woman should have regular, periodic physical and medical examinations. These would show up whatever defects she might have.

Frequently the "little smoldering fires of illness" are hidden from sight. Silently they spread. If ignored, they are often fanned into a devastating flame of disease, but if discovered in time they can be extinguished.

At periodic intervals a prudent owner of an automobile has it overhauled by an expert. The engine is examined, all bolts tightened, the electrical system tested, the springs inspected and the carbureter regulated. A modern business man takes an inventory of his stock. An up-to-date manufacturer has the machinery of his plant, from engine to furthermost pulley, made one hundred per cent. efficient.

Is it not more important to have your human power plant overhauled from time to time? All unknown to you some important part, the heart, the lungs, the kidneys, may be on the verge of a breakdown. Only a thorough medical examination by a competent physician can reveal your real condition. Let one examine you. If he finds you in good physical condition, you will be glad to know it. If he finds any impairments, you can apply corrective measures, which may overcome them, or at least so control them as to save you from severe illness, possibly from permanent disability or death.

Approximately ninety-eight per cent. of our people are afflicted with physical imperfection of some kind, and over ninety per cent. of these are unaware of it. Preceding most serious illness there is usually a long period of impairment. This breaking-down is frequently so slow and insidious that one does not realize its danger until it is well advanced, although from the very beginning it leaves signs that science can detect.

AS A more or less extreme example of what I am getting at: a great many women suffer regularly from headache; yet week after week they will make no attempt to determine what causes their trouble. As a headache is a symptom and not a disease, there is a plentiful supply of drugs that will relieve the symptom. For this reason, there is no warning or danger signal so frequently neglected as a headache. A tablet or a powder, and "pouf!" the headache is gone. Yet in doing this the sufferer merely eliminates the symptom, and thus masks the true cause.

Headaches result from various causes. Sometimes inherited sensitiveness of brain and nerve tissue, together with some other more immediate irritation, is the cause. Or headaches may result from eye-strain, from nose and throat affections, from an affected tooth, from constipation, overeating, improper eating or other digestive troubles. Other causes are flat-foot, tight shoes, tight corsets, tight collars and tight hats. Also there are headaches that come from diseases of various kinds. Headaches due to disease of the brain are likely to come under medical treatment early, but others, such as result from kidney troubles, coughs or rheumatic troubles, frequently pass uninvestigated.

When an acute headache is present for more than a day, medical advice should be sought. When headaches persistently recur, a thorough physical and medical overhauling is called for.

I use headache as an example because a headache is so easily recognized; but there are many other symptoms that carry messages fully as significant to the trained expert. These can be revealed only by a thorough medical examination.

Drawing by Joseph Simont

Most intelligent people report periodically to their dentists; some report to their oculist regularly—but why stop with the teeth and eyes? Are not the lungs, the heart, the kidneys, the stomach and spine just as important?

Many industrial organizations are taking hold of the idea of periodic physical examinations with enthusiasm. Managers of large establishments have appointed their own physicians or sometimes have brought in physicians to take the personal histories, to examine medically and to advise their personnel, hoping in this way, by prolongation of periods of healthy activity, to get improved qualities and quantities of production, as well as to keep their people better satisfied and in better health.

Not only has this movement gained a foothold in the industries, but it has become a regular feature of life-insurance practise. At the present time over forty of the life-insurance companies are making use of the opportunities in periodic examinations to prolong life. Some of these companies have for a number of years offered policyholders the services of their laboratories for urinalyses and certain other examinations. Others have extended their service to include a complete physical and medical examination at the home offices or in the field. Still others have employed some agency qualified to make their examinations throughout the country.

This service of the insurance companies is based on sound business sense. One company made a study, in 1920, of the policyholders that had taken advantage of the company's free examinations offered in 1914. They found that in the six years two hundred and seventeen of the originally examined had died, whereas they had expected from their mortality tablets that three hundred and three would die in that period. In other words, eighty-six fewer policyholders died than expected, resulting in a large saving to the company. The test was further extended to include a comparison of examined policyholders with the whole body of policyholders. The difference between the two groups was twenty-four per cent. in favor of the examined.

Insurance companies are not organized for charity. Nevertheless one company is willing to spend $300,000 in one year to provide physical and medical examinations for its policyholders. It is very easy to see why. If an examination did nothing but prolong a life for one year, it would save the company many times the cost of the examination. An examination such as an insurance company would give would probably cost the company in the neighborhood of $10.00. Interest at five per cent. on $20,000, assuming that to be the value of the policy, for one year would be $1,000. In other words, the company is saving $990. Is it any wonder that insurance companies are spending money to provide free examinations?

NOW the question: Does your life mean more to the insurance company than it does to you and your family? If the insurance people find it profitable to them to have you examined, certainly it would be infinitely more valuable to you. The insurance people are interested, professionally at least, only in preserving life. You are also interested in prolonging your life, but, perhaps, even more than that—you are interested in securing and maintaining for yourself abounding health, strength and endurance. Your health is your greatest possession, without which the coming years would be a menace and old age a tragedy.

The practise of periodic physical and medical examinations is based upon the theory that it is better to keep well than to get well. The need is periodically to search your body and your life for the original sources of physical decay and life failure, and to utilize the abundant means that science can supply for lessening your burden.

I am addressing this message principally to the women of America between the ages of seventeen and thirty-two. I do this for two reasons: First, because the women of this class constitute not only the most important link but also the weakest link in the progression of the race. Certainly every woman of this group should receive a complete physical and medical survey at least once a year. I myself obtain a complete examination twice a year.

The examination will reveal your true condition. Then the real benefit of the revelation is up to you, personally. Your examiner will prescribe remedies for whatever impairments he finds. Some will require medical attention, but more frequently the remedy will call for some revision of your living conditions. Most physical impairments are the result of improper eating, improper exercise or improper sanitation. The remedy is to eliminate the cause and follow sane rules of health.

The tip-top story of the big top

LITTLE TEXAS

By DIXIE WILLSON

A circus star lights the way to a honeymoon

DO YOU love the circus? Do you love twelve-year-old girls? Then step right up and meet little Texas Fitzgerald, star of the Great Melbourne Shows. A multimillionaire grandfather, who cast her off because his son married Meg, her circus mother, now wants her very badly and is hunting America over for a clue to her. But little Texas knows nothing of this. Her happy circus life fills her days and nights to the brim. Dear friends are everywhere—the animals, the show people, Mrs. Sunny Bill Peck who mends the glittering costumes. Even funny old Mr. Fobes at the St. Louis boarding-house (where she stayed when she left the show at Three Trees, Arkansas, to go hunting her grandfather) has a warm place in her loving heart. Relentlessly the old aristocrat pursues his latest whim. The chase for his granddaughter is at its hottest just as this instalment starts!

PART THREE

JUNE afternoon in Three Trees, Arkansas, was like the end of a long journey. Sleepy houses, sleepy lawns and trees, drowsy fences, lazy dusty roads, little stores with drawn blinds and awnings napping in the sun.

In the cool old Cavendish house, back among its trees, waited a midday chicken dinner until train time, when Mr. Cavendish and the Honorable Richard Zylder were to go and meet the latter's client, Kingsley Fitzgerald.

"Well, Richard," Mr. Cavendish was saying as they walked slowly along the quiet streets to the station, "there must be some mistake somewhere. My father's log cabin was the first house in town. I've lived here all my life, and of five thousand people who've moved in and out I've known or I've seen every one of 'em—every one!"

"But, Cavendish," Mr. Zylder argued for the fiftieth time, "there would have been no reason for the girl and boy to mislead me! It was to their advantage—not mine—that I should know where to find them. I couldn't possibly have misunderstood the town or State. I asked them blankly where they had come from and they told me Three Trees, Arkansas."

"You're sure you can tell me no more about the mother?" Cavendish suggested.

"No," Mr. Zylder replied. "I regret to say—no. King married her in France, they lived in Paris three years till he died, and we heard nothing else, until suddenly a week ago Mr. Fitzgerald was addressed on the train by a conductor, who informed him he had a granddaughter aboard! Mr. Fitzgerald has very set habits and views of life, Mr. Cavendish, which did not at all accord with the interference of such an unexpected thing. He had been utterly disappointed in his son marrying against advice, and had repeatedly expressed his desire never to meet the woman who was the cause of it—so his immediate decision was to escape an unpleasant experience by having me dismiss the child—whose only knowledge of how to reach him, it seemed, was through me."

At the end of the main street was the railroad station, drowsing like the rest of the town in the sleepy sun. The two lawyers crossed the bare yellow road and seated themselves at the end of the little wooden building on an iron bench in the shade.

"The name is Fitzgerald, you say," Mr. Cavendish mused, "and the child is a girl, twelve years old?"

Mr. Zylder held his hat in his lap.

"Twelve years old," he repeated. "A child noticeably handsome—light curls, slender build, straight aristocratic head—called 'Texas,' the young man said. The young man was much interested, though no relation—a tall fellow, poorly dressed. His first name was Joe. I didn't ask the other."

The men sat silent and thoughtful. Mr. Cavendish looked at his watch, turned the stem back and forth in his fingers.

"WHY, WHERE DID YOU GET THIS PICTURE?" LITTLE TEXAS CRIED IN AMAZEMENT. A FLUSH OF PINK CAME UP IN MRS. SUNNY'S CHEEKS

"Richard," he said at last, "I'm sorry, but I can not help you. I can only say that to my knowledge there is no Fitzgerald in the town of Three Trees, and—" he smiled—"and as I'm quite a connoisseur of the favor of ladies from ten to twenty, I can pretty safely say that never, in Three Trees, has there resided any noticeably handsome young lady who has had either light short curls or the nickname of Texas!"

Mr. Zylder didn't reply. He was entirely mystified. In three minutes more the two-coach train steamed into the station.

MR. FITZGERALD, as brusk, as autocratic as ever, acknowledged Mr. Cavendish, swung into pace with them and, direct as always, wished to know without delay what had developed.

The entire matter was gone over again—and then, in silence, the three gray-haired gentlemen, absorbed entirely in thought of one fair-haired girl, made their way to the old-fashioned house where the dinner of old-fashioned chicken fricassee was waiting.

Mr. Fitzgerald respected the information Mr. Cavendish had been able to give them, but he was not willing to accept it as final. When dinner was over, he suggested a call on the postmaster.

Yes, sir, he'd been postmaster nineteen years. Yes, sir, he knew everybody who'd ever lived in Three Trees, Arkansas. No, sir, there had never been a family of Fitzgerald in town. Well, sir, why not ask the schoolmaster?

So they found the schoolmaster. Yes, there was a school law that every child in town over five must attend school. Yes, he personally knew every twelve-year-old child in town. There was no Fitzgerald.

Through the remainder of the afternoon client and lawyer went from one place to another—to every one who might have known, but there was only the same answer over and over. No one named Fitzgerald. No golden-haired child.

In the evening they sat in willow chairs on the Cavendish lawn. Little girls in delicate frocks strolled by, hand in hand with tall people. A shy little girl in a flowered apron came to bring Mr. Cavendish a bouquet of flowers. Across the street in a garden swing a little girl dressed in lavender stretched white toes down to reach the green grass.

It was June and twilight. Slowly it began to come over the self-centered old man that Fitzgerald Mansion wasn't all the world after all. Suddenly that great house of his in St. Louis seemed empty. Suddenly he dreaded going back to it and being there alone.

Mrs. Cavendish and the shy little girl brought a table for supper out on the lawn. Mr. Cavendish held the little girl on his knee.

"How old are you, Alice?" he asked her.

"I'm twelve," she said bashfully.

"Do you know a little girl with curls all over her head who is twelve?" he asked.

"Yes," she said promptly. "Josie Barber has curls all over her head. She's twelve."

"But her curls are black," Mr. Cavendish said gently. "Don't you know any one twelve with short yellow curls?"

She shook her head. "There isn't any one twelve with short yellow curls," she said.

After supper was over Mr. and Mrs. Cavendish walked down the street to take the shy little girl home to her mother. They left Mr. Zylder and Mr. Fitzgerald alone on the old-fashioned lawn in the twilight.

"Well, Kingsley," Mr. Zylder said, "there doesn't seem anything to do about it, does there? I'm sorry."

"She must be found," Mr. Fitzgerald said, immediately his curt, demanding self once more. "I will not give her up."

But sometimes there are things demanding people may demand in vain.

"My dear Kingsley," Mr. Zylder answered, "there is nothing else for you to do but give her up. You did that a week ago!"

BUM Casey, the Melbourne circus elephant-tender, buckled himself into a ragged rain-coat at five o'clock one morning.

"Lord a'mighty, I never see the beat!" he grumbled. "When I git a show o' my own, I bet my bottom dollar one place I never come to is Wy-nona, Minnesoty! Thirty years I been comin' here every blamed Summer—and I never got forty miles any side of it but rain didn't start up!"

Bum was swallowing a mug of coffee in the privilege car, where food was served before and after the cook-tent was up.

"Hear that, boys?" the waiter roared down the length of the counter. "Bum's goin' to spoil his clothes in the rain. Ain't that awful!"

"Say, you ain't kiddin' me a bit! Keep still!" he retorted. "It's Albert's account makes me low down on rain. Every job on a thick lot is got off on Albert, the best elephant o' the lot, 'cause he's got a willin' disposition. Band wagon gits sunk—stakes is drove in too deep—trunks has to be got out—who does it? Albert! And the stickin'est mud that rain ever made is in Wy-nona, Minnesoty! It's——"

"Shut that door!" some one shouted. "It's blowing rain in my coffee!"

Bum stepped out in the wet gray morning and pulled the door shut behind him. The performers' section had come in on a siding several tracks away—doors shut, shades drawn, everybody asleep. Farther up, the cages rolled down from the flats, the teams were hitched on and they rumbled away.

A rain-soaked fellow shambled toward him in the gray twilight.

"Say, Bum," he called half-way across the tracks, "git Albert around, will yuh? My pole wagon's stuck half a mile down the road, and I can't git her out!"

"How come yuh waited till five to git stuck?" Bum inquired. "Yuh been haulin' since four, ain't yuh? How come yuh give Albert an hour in peace?"

"Wy-nona, Minnesoty," however, proved more considerate of Albert than its owner had anticipated. It was not until parade was out and back and the show was in running order for the day that his "willin' disposition" was again imposed upon.

IN THE ladies' dressing-tent everybody was singing as they sewed or fussed around the trunks, their feet up on the little platforms or in rubber boots. Somehow it was always part of a rainy day that the girls in the dressing-tent should be singing.

Rivers of water ran under the side wall and a great puddle was at the front door. Aunt Mary's costume-tables were standing sideways to save them from sinking, and Aunt Mary and Mrs. Sunny, in storm-rubbers and rain-coats, were busy moving velvets out of the drip.

"I always say," Aunt Mary declared in her most convincing tone, as she tugged a basket of gold hats out from under a roof leak, "I always say nobody's worth their salt unless they can stand a good miserable rainy day and not weaken! These dispositions that shrink up when they get damp are folks that I'm a-hopin' will get shrunk plum' out o' my sight!"

Mrs. Sunny, shaking the wrinkles out of the scarlet hunting-coats for the high-jumping act, was joining quaveringly with the girls in the corner singing "Kathleen Mavourneen."

"That's why," Aunt Mary went on, "that's why this rain is showin' me a lot about you, Mrs. Sunny, that all your willin'ness and handy ways never showed me at all! It sure satisfies me to see you here with a—" She stopped short at the door, her hands on her hips.

"Well, bless my soul, ladies!" she said with spirit. "Now let it rain!"

With a splashing like a young tug-boat, rubber coat buttoned close, little Texas appeared in the doorway, her face sparkling with laughter.

"Oh, it's lovely and wet," she glowed. "Aunt Mary, where can I get a boat to sail in this puddle?"

"Law sakes!" sputtered the keeper of the wardrobe, "don't bein' a star make any difference to your dignity, for goodness' sake? Expect me to drop the whole routine of a show dependin' entirely on me and go into the boat business? What's the matter with all your gentlemen friends to-day? Go down to the pad-room and make Joe build you a boat!"

Texas glanced around.

"Yes, I might ask Joe," she considered, "but it looks awfully nice in here, too. Maybe I'll stay."

It was the end of the little girl's third week as a real performer. It still was more than Texas could realize that this wonder should have come out of those hours of practising which she had cherished only as a happy surprize for her mother. She and Meg loved it and wondered at it together; and this day was like the gorgeous tail of a sky-rocket, because it was only one day after pay-day when her third salary envelope had been delivered into her mother's hands!

Texas shook the fringe of water drops from her rubber hat and stopped at Mrs. Sunny's table a minute.

"Maybe," Texas suggested pleadingly, "maybe, Mrs. Sunny, after the show, we could look at your keepsakes to-day?"

Mrs. Sunny, in the top tray of her open trunk, had a little white box full of pictures, tiny shells and samples of silk that she called her "keepsakes."

She had promised a long time ago that they might some day look at them together.

"May be we can," Mrs. Sunny smiled, "if the rain stops a little so they won't get wet."

A sudden shouting outside and a sloshing on wet ground interrupted them—and a growling undertone of grizzly bears!

"Oh, listen, Mrs. Sunny, the bear-cage is stuck in the mud!" began the little girl. "I'd better hurry out and help, don't you think? There's always some little teeny weeny place where I can push!"

Aunt Mary looked around from a pair of purple trousers she had spread on the trunk to patch.

"Well, of all things!" she put in. "The star of the show moving the bear-cages! You stay right where you are, Miss Fitzgerald, and git into your tights! Now that you've got crowds comin' on purpose to see nothing but you, you've got to be there and look like they expect you to! There goes second bugle now! Ladies! Outside for grand entry!"

So Texas, with an uncomfortable feeling of neglecting duty, had just to listen to the trouble around the bear-cage.

"I think it must be very handy to be nothing but a boy," she said with a sigh. "If mother'd like me as well, I wish I could be one!"

Disorders of the Skin in young Children

"The world is mine"

By HENRY L. K. SHAW, M.D.

The Happy Child Department

Directed by DR. HENRY L. K. SHAW

Recently President of the American Child Hygiene Association; Consultant of the Division of Maternity, Infancy and Child Hygiene in the New York State Department of Health

THE skin of a young child is not simply a protective covering or an envelope in which the body is sealed, but it is an important organ performing several vital functions. For example, it is the principal means by which the heat of the body is kept at a constant temperature. When the heat is produced in excess, it is eliminated through the skin by a process of radiation and evaporation. The skin also protects the body not only from mechanical or physical injuries, but also from bacteria which may cause blood poisoning.

The skin is composed of two distinct layers. The outer layer, called the epidermis, is made up of flattened cells which get tough and horny in exposed parts such as the hands and feet. These surface cells become scaly and rub off. Where there is an undue amount of pressure or irritation, they increase greatly and form calluses and corns.

The inner or true skin, known as the dermis, contains blood vessels, nerves, sweat-glands and oil-glands. The pressure of these nerves in the inner skin explains why a cut, bruise or burn is so painful. The nerves can convey pleasant sensations, such as many touch sensations.

Tiny blood vessels are very numerous throughout the true skin; this is the reason why a small cut will often bleed profusely. Warm clothing or hot weather will expand or dilute these blood vessels and give a bright flush to the skin. This may also occur in certain emotional states, as when a child blushes with shame or flushes with anger. Cold and fright will contract these small vessels so that the skin appears white or blanched.

Various poisons formed within the body may be carried to the surface by the blood and cause irritation which results in rashes or eruptions on the skin. Certain diseases produce specific poisons; these cause characteristic eruptions, from the appearance of which a diagnosis of the disease can be made. The rashes which occur in some of the contagious diseases of children, such as measles, scarlet fever, and chicken-pox, are examples of the effect of different poisons produced within the body and carried to the skin.

THE inner layer of the skin contains glands that secrete an oily substance which serves to keep the skin and hair in good condition. These are the sebaceous glands and are found in large numbers over the face and scalp. If the oil is not frequently removed by washing, it gives an oily, greasy appearance to the face or hair. On the face the glands often become plugged with dirt or dust and form little black spots, commonly called blackheads, which are a source of much embarrassment to girls and boys. Blackheads can be removed by steaming the face, washing with a mild alkaline soap and gently squeezing the pores. When the glands in the scalp secrete too little oil, the skin becomes dry and scaly, and the condition known as dandruff results. When too much oil is secreted, the hair becomes greasy.

Sweat-glands are also found in the true skin and they have several important functions. Their chief use is to secrete a water-like fluid known as sweat or perspiration. This process goes on continually in healthy persons, but under ordinary conditions is evaporated as rapidly as it is secreted and is thus not noticed. A large and visible amount of perspiration is secreted as a result of exercise, hot weather, warm clothing, fever, or general weakness, for then the glands become more active, largely on account of the greater amount of blood flowing through these glands. The cooling of the skin by the evaporation of the perspiration is one of Nature's methods of controlling and maintaining the normal temperature of the body.

Another function of the sweat-glands is the elimination of body poisons and waste. The necessity of this elimination of waste and poisonous products was illustrated in the school physiologies of many years ago by the story of a small child whose body was entirely covered with gold-foil at a time when Queen Elizabeth was to be welcomed on her entrance to London. This gold-foil covered and sealed the outlets of the sweat-glands and prevented the discharge of their poisons, and as a result the child died.

In babies these sweat-glands are very active, and the excess of perspiration often irritates the pores so that a fine rash is produced which is called prickly heat. Woolen underwear keeps the skin warm and induces perspiration, while the fine fibers of the wool irritate the moist skin. This accounts for the location of the rash on the throat and abdomen where the wool comes in most direct contact with the skin. The sweat-glands in the scalp produce a great deal of perspiration when the body is overheated or weakened by a condition known as rickets. There is generally more sweating on the back of the head where it rests on a pillow. This is one of the very early sign of rickets.

It is rather a remarkable fact that a baby has over three times as much skin or surface area in proportion to his body weight as an adult. This has an important practical bearing in the care, bathing and clothing of a baby, as the skin is the chief organ concerned with the production, maintenance and regulation of heat. Therefore greater caution must be taken in exposing babies and young children to inclement weather and to extremes of heat and cold.

The larger area of the skin in children, the greater activity of its various glands and the more rapid circulation of blood produce more perspiration and execrete more waste material than in adults. When the pores become clogged so that these poisons are not removed, they cause rashes and eruptions on the skin. For this reason it is necessary to keep these pores open to promote the health of the child and to see that nothing interferes with the process of elimination of body wastes. The general health rules of life must be observed, such as careful diet and food habits, personal hygiene, care of the mouth and teeth, abundance of rest, outdoor air and exercise.

THE hygiene of the skin itself is concerned chiefly with cleanliness. Regular bathing not only removes dirt from the skin, but opens and cleanses the pores of the oil and sweat glands, stimulates the circulation and refreshes the nerves. A hot bath with water of a temperature of about 100 degrees Fahrenheit for ten or fifteen minutes twice a week with a good lather from a mild alkaline soap will remove the oily secretions and the products of perspiration from the skin and keep it in good condition. A daily cool water bath at a temperature of about 80 degrees Fahrenheit for a few minutes cleanses the skin and produces a healthy warm glow after the bath which not only is invigorating but is an excellent preventive against colds. In little babies the evacuations from the bladder and the bowels are apt to irritate the delicate skin if the diapers are not removed directly after soiling. These parts should be carefully washed after changing, and should be thoroughly dried and powdered with a good, unscented talcum powder.

A very painful eruption which may lead to raw, sore points of ulceration is sometimes found in the diaper region and is the result of irritation from wet diapers which have a strong odor of ammonia. The ammonia usually is not passed in the urine but is the result of the action of an acid urine on the alkali left in the diapers from the soap used in washing and not entirely removed in rinsing. In these cases the diapers must be more thoroughly rinsed after washing and not left on the baby after soiling. The parts can be cleansed with mineral oil and protected with some mild antiseptic ointment. Exposure to the air helps to clear up this very unpleasant eruption.

It is well to remember that exposure to the direct rays of the sun will heal many disorders of the skin. The healing property is found in the ultra-violet or actinic rays, which are filtered out when they pass through ordinary window-glass. The tanning of the skin by these rays gives it a remarkable resistence to infections. The sun treatment is now very generally used in the treatment of rickets and in all kinds of tuberculosis in children. There are a number of special sun sanitoria in this country and in Europe where the children under treatment live out-of-doors practically stark naked in Winter as well as in Summer. They play in the snow in Nature's garb and they gain in strength and vitality, make complete cures and never catch "cold" or develop pneumonia. Colds are more prevalent among children who are over-dressed and live in over-heated rooms during the Winter and who do not get enough sunshine or out-of-door life.

ECZEMA in babies is rather a common disorder and one that distresses not only the infants so afflicted but their parents and relatives. There are a number of different inflammations of the skin included under the term eczema. A frequent form in fat, well-nourished and often overnourished breast-fed babies appears on both cheeks and is called facial eczema. There may be a good deal of inflammation of the skin with oozing of fluid which forms hard crusts. This may spread all over the face and extend into the scalp and is most disfiguring. The causes are not definitely known, but they are concerned in some way with the nutrition of the body. In some cases the mother's milk is too rich, as a result of her eating too much and exercising too little. But when these babies are weaned from the breast on this account and put on artificial feeding the condition does not always improve. It is sometimes caused by too much sugar or too much fat in the food. Some babies with facial eczema pass very acid urine, and when this acidity is reduced by medicine and diet the skin shows improvement. There are certain elements in food called proteins which, when absorbed into the blood, produce irritation and an eruption of the skin which is often called eczema. Physicians can make skin tests with various proteins to determine whether any particular one is responsible for the eruptions. Then the elimination from the diet of the mother or the baby of the food containing the offending protein is supposed to cure the eczema. Unfortunately while brilliant results are sometimes obtained, yet in most cases this does not seem to affect the course of the disease. This encouragement, however, can be given to mothers of babies suffering from eczema: in very rare

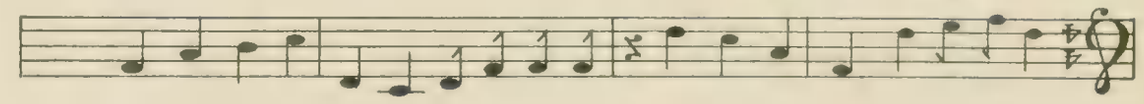
OFF TO SCHOOL!

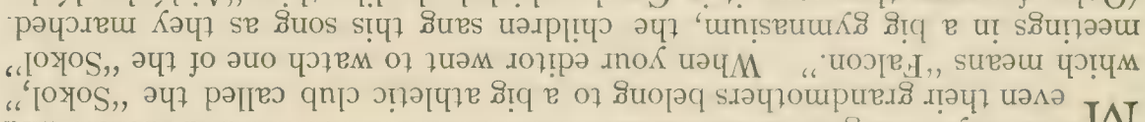
Just a postage stamp may help you keep your little students sturdy and well, and put them near the head of their class. Your letter, with a two-cent stamp for postage, will bring you our FREE leaflets — "The School Lunch" and "Making Homework Count."



"The School Lunch" tells you how to organize a simple community plan for school luncheons, gives you food plans for the cold lunch, the hot dishes, the mid-morning feeding, and recipes for some nourishing dishes.

Angelo Patri, the great educator who has written on this subject for THE DELINEATOR, in the leaflet "Making Homework Count," shows what the sympathetic help of father and mother can do for the youthful scholar.

Other booklets that mothers of the school child should have are THE DELINEATOR Service bulletins on "The School Child," "Mental Health of the Child" and "The Development of Personality." They will be sent promptly on receipt of the price—ten cents for each one.



And every month—if you join the Happy Child Club for mothers of the School Child—you will receive a personal letter from Doctor Shaw, guiding you in the training, feeding and care of your youngster as he grows. Membership in this club is only fifty cents a year and the first letter will be sent you immediately upon receipt of your membership dues.

OH WHERE THE FAIREST MEADOWS LIE

An Old Czech Song from Across the Sea

MOST boys and girls in Czechoslovakia and their mothers and fathers and even their grandmothers belong to a big athletic club called the "Sokol," which means "Falcon." When your editor went to watch one of the "Sokol" meetings in a big gymnasium, the children sang this song as they marched. (Only of course they sang it in Czech, which looks like this: "Ај lúcka, lúcka zelaná, roste na ni tráva.") Here is the song in English, for you to sing and march by.

Oh where the fair - est mead-ows lie, Grass-es green are grow-ing, Grass-es green are grow-ing,

A Wonder Clock of Prague

ON A tower in Prague, the capital of Czechoslovakia, stands a wonderful clock, hundreds of years old. This clock not only tells the hour, but the season and the month of the year as well. Figures on it move whenever the hour strikes, a bell rings, the cock crows, two doors open and the figures of Christ and His Apostles go by. The machinery inside is so complicated that when it got out of order no one knew how to make it go, and the Wonder Clock was still for two hundred years, until at last a clever clock-maker started it again. At all hours during the day, in the street before the clock-tower, people stand waiting to watch the hour strike. Your editor saw it three times.

Here is a picture of the Wonder Clock. Cut out the two doors. Cut out the notched circle, or if you do not want to spoil your LITTLE DELINEATOR, copy or trace it exactly the same size on stiff paper or pasteboard. Copy and color the twelve figures. With a paper - fastener inserted through the red spot on the face of the clock fasten the circle through the middle, on the other side of this page. As you turn it, the figures will go by the cut-out doors as they do in the real clock.

MILE DETI:
(that is "Dear children" in Czech.)

First I want to explain about Deli-bear's adventure—your editor really did find the Deli sign and the Deli candy-store, near my hotel in Prague, 'way over here in Czechoslovakia! So I took this picture to prove it was true. I would have bought Deli-candy for your prize, but it would have grown stale before it reached the winner. So instead I found this game of nine-pins, made by Czech children in a club called "The Little Legion." And what do you suppose those boys and girls were doing the afternoon I went to visit their "Little Legion" club-house? Laughing over an American movie—Mary Pickford in "Pollyanna!"

Good-by till next month. Please try for the contest. Don't forget to send for your September Deli-Club Secret Letter.

Your editor in Czechoslovakia,

WIN THIS GAME FROM FAR AWAY

These nine-pins will be given as a prize for the most interesting letter telling what you like best in this LITTLE DELINEATOR and why. Second prize — this month's cover, framed. Contest closes September 20. Address Czech Contest, LITTLE DELINEATOR, New York, N. Y.

The Castle of the Cats

A LEGEND OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA

ONCE upon a time, in an old castle-fort near Black Hill there lived a rich King and his daughter. Eleven fair maidens waited upon the Princess, but she was herself so fair and so good that she shone among them like the sun in the heavens. And all in the Castle were happy and God blessed them, because they were kind to the poor.

But one day a Witch and her ugly son came to live on Black Hill above the Dark Valley, and they were jealous of all happiness and plotted evil against the Castle. But every day the Princess and her maidens went walking in the sunshine, for they were safe so long as they did not climb Black Hill nor wander into the Dark Valley. And as they went, they blew sweetly upon little horns of gold, so the sight was fair to see.

Now the Witch's ugly son saw the sweet sight and heard the sweet sound and he followed the Princess at a distance, until his ugly heart nearly shriveled up with love, and he ran home to his mother and teased and whined and gave her no peace until she promised to get the King's daughter into her power.

So the Witch turned herself into a strange and beautiful bird, and flew ahead of the maidens above the Dark Valley. But the Princess did not follow. Then she turned into a strange and beautiful beast, and ran ahead in the underbrush. But the Princess did not follow. Finally she hid in the woods and played such strange and beautiful music as was never before heard by human ear. But the Princess only laughed, and returned safe to the Castle with her maidens.

How the old Witch shook with rage, and her ugly son grew uglier and more shriveled day by day!

One afternoon, as the Princess and her eleven maidens rode forth upon their twelve beautiful steeds, in the sunshine above the Dark Valley, they heard far below a pitiful sound of weeping as of some poor soul in distress. Their kind hearts were touched; they forgot all danger and galloped down to the rescue.

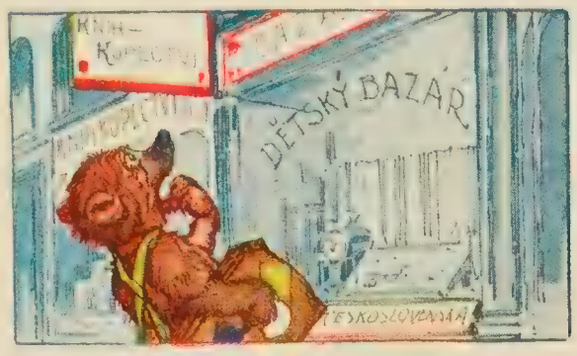
Suddenly, dark shadows began to close about them and one of the maidens cried in terror: "Alas, we are in the Dark Valley. It is the Witch who led us here!"

Back they turned, and rode at breakneck speed, but it was too late. Close on their heels came the old Witch, while her ugly son galloped grinning behind.

Then the frightened Princess remembered a holy man living near by, who might be able to save them. "To the hermit's cave!" she called, and madly they rode, till the sparks hissed under their horses' hoofs. But ever closer came the Witch.

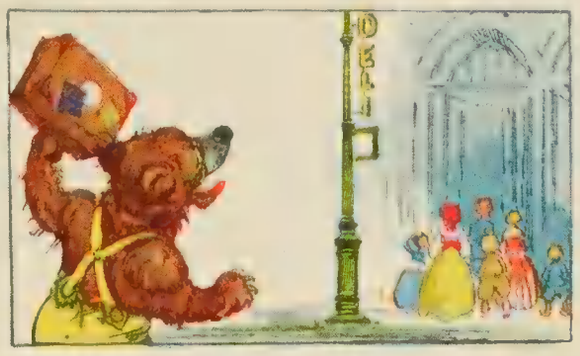
That was a wild race! Hearing the clatter of hoofs, the old hermit ran from his cave. He saw the terrible danger of the Princess, but he had no power to set her free, but only to lighten the spell, when it should fall.

Now the Witch had caught up with the maidens and raised her black wand to strike. Suddenly the Princess sprang from her horse, turned, and fell headlong down the steep cliff into the valley below. Before the Witch could speak, the hermit had cried in a loud voice: "She shall turn into a pillar of rock and stand until there comes this way a youth of generous heart and pure soul who is worthy to set her free."



How the Witch's ugly son shrieked and yelled and how his mother stamped her big feet with rage! The Witch turned and fiercely she struck the eleven maidens with her wand; they vanished, and eleven pretty little cats ran mewing and meowing to the Castle. Since that day, it has been called the Castle of the Cats, and always at midnight may be heard a loud mewing and meowing. The Witch herself became a bird of prey, and each night she circles over the Castle of the Cats, shrieking hideously. As for her ugly son, no doubt he shriveled up completely. But the pillar of rock still stands in the valley, waiting for the youth of generous heart and pure soul worthy to set her free.

An old shepherd who lives near Black Hill and the Castle of the Cats told this legend to one of the editors of the Czechoslovakian Junior Red Cross Magazine, who let us have it for THE LITTLE DELINEATOR.



DELI BEAR IN THE CAPITAL CITY

1—Poor Deli-bear is lost in Prague and can not ask his way,
For not a word of Checkish talk has Deli learned to say.

2—Such funny upside-downish signs on every house and street;
But which means what, and which tells where is something good to eat?

3—Oh, ho! he spies upon a post—D-E-L-I—
and more,
A window full of Deli-sweets—a Deli candy-store!

4—He only orders: "Deli!" and the salesgirl understands.
With Deli-sweets of every size she fills his Deli-hands.

5—So tummy full and pockets full, and feeling fit and fine,
"Hurray for Prague!" our hero cries and climbs the Deli-sign.

6—While Checkish children laugh to watch a bear, with might and main,
A-throwing Deli-badges down, and Delisweets like rain!

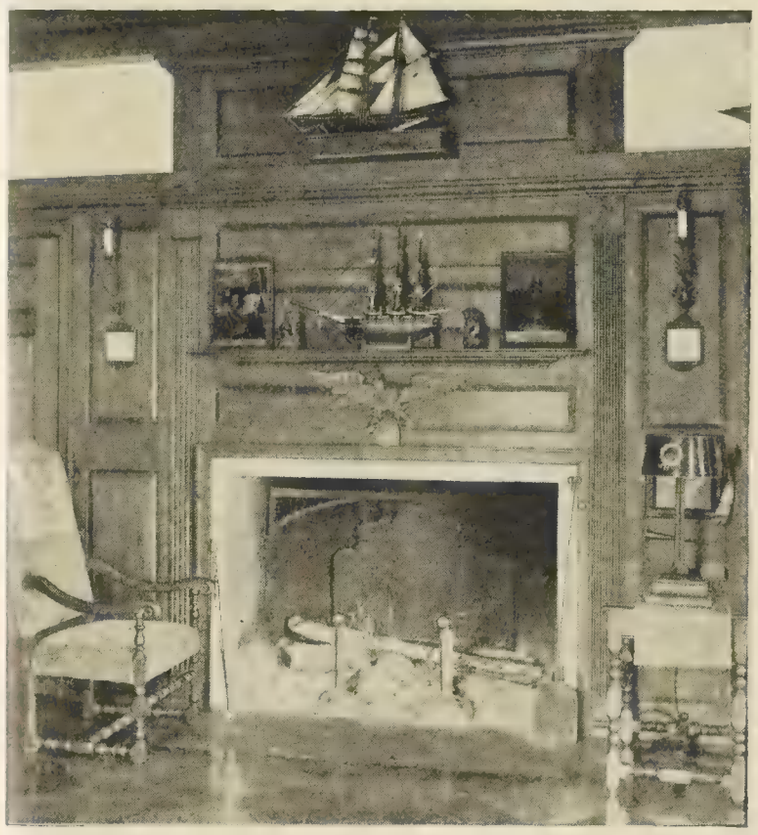
Little Ships for Decoration

By MARGARET MOCHRIE



Department of Home Building and Furnishings
Directed by MRS. CHARLES BRADLEY SANDERS

If all the ships I have at sea
Should come a-sailing home to me,
Ah, well! the harbor would not hold
So many ships as there would be
If all my ships came home from sea.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX

And if they didn't?—Well, then you could have one of these entrancing little models of gallant seafarers. Our House Decoration Department will tell you where their harbors are, if you'll write, enclosing a stamped envelope, to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

AFTER seeing the fascinating miniature old ships, one wonders how they could have escaped the attention of interior decorators for so long; for they add immeasurably to the distinction and individuality of a room and are as colorful as they are interesting. What could be more fitting, for instance, in a house of old English architecture, than a ship—perhaps a model of one

Ships, emblems of adventure and romance, bring the allure of sea-swept shores to the stay-at-home's fireplace which helped scatter the Armada for Queen Elizabeth—sailing gallantly above the fireplace? Or a tiny replica of the Mayflower on a brass-bound chest in the hall?

There is almost no limit to the different types which may be had. They are as numerous as the kinds of ships that have sailed the seven seas. There are gay Spanish galleons, their sails adorned with brilliant coats of arms. There are romantic Chinese junks, with strange carvings and lantern-hung decks. There are French ships of the time of Louis XV, lavishly decorated in gilt, and Flemish and Dutch fishing-smacks, rugged and brown, with a sturdy charm all their own. And there are the breezy clipper ships, which made much of our own adventurous history.

It is only recently that ship models have found their way into homes as purely decorative objects. Until a short time ago they were confined, for the most part, to museums, to small private collections, and to the families of seafaring folk who kept in the "best parlor," along with the wax flowers and the plush-covered picture album, a little model that grandfather, or perhaps great-grandfather, made of his own ship. Often, in their spare moments at sea, sailors carved and fitted together little replicas of the vessels in which they sailed. Although these are sometimes faulty in detail and proportion, particularly with regard to the parts of the boat that are not readily visible from the deck where the workman sat,

Here a seventeenth-century British frigate rides gallantly at anchor under a winding stair

An original model, this—and in a state of perfect preservation

they are more decorative than many which are mechanically correct, and are sought after for their artistic value. Besides being kept as mementoes of past voyages, these models were often placed in churches as votive offerings.

The scale models are more or less elaborate. Those used as construction guides were at first finely executed and decorated by some of the best artists. Later they degenerated into plainer objects. Some models were presented as gifts to reigning sovereigns or to certain important nobles. Boxwood, ebony, pear wood and ivory were among the materials used in fashioning them. Exquisite carving decorated the decks and cabins. It is not unusual to find a small ship model with such items as parquet floors, real glass windows, fine inlay work, and doors complete even to the hinges. A model of a brig called The Great Patience—and what great patience must have gone into the making of it!—is correct down to the most minute detail. Pots and pans hang in the galley, and the tiny bunks are fitted with blankets. There are even locks and keys for the cabin doors! One can readily believe the story that the retired Portuguese seaman who built the boat went mad worrying over what was to become of his treasure after his death.

The number of really old ship models available at the present time is limited. Some of the little ships have been lost and broken, and the most valuable of those that remain are in museums. The Peabody Museum in Salem, Massachusetts, contains the oldest collection in the United States. There are some interesting specimens at India House, New York, and some good ones at the Metropolitan Museum. But probably the finest collection in the world belongs to the Louvre in Paris.

Private collections of ship models are a comparatively recent development, but they are rapidly increasing in number. The collecting fad has naturally sent the prices of good ship models soaring; models which used to be obtainable for twenty-five dollars now sell for far up into the hundreds. The Britannia, a man-of-war, built in Chatham in 1682, recently brought seven thousand dollars, and other ships have gone for five, ten, twenty, and even as high as thirty thousand dollars.

So, if you are fortunate enough to have inherited or have acquired a good original model, cherish it as you would a Rembrandt. But even if you haven't, you need not entirely despair of owning a decorative ship. Replicas of models of many historically important ships, such as the Santa Maria and the Mayflower and the Bon Homme Richard, and of many different types of vessels, have been made by modern workmen, both amateur and professional, and may be had at reasonable prices. For the slender pocketbook there are inexpensive models flattened at both sides. They are full-rigged, but are wrought with less detail than the others. Hanging against a plain wall, they are very effective and colorful.

This quaint sloop model stands out decoratively against its window horizon

On the whole, it is more satisfactory to buy a good modern copy that is artistic and graceful in line than an antique which is in poor condition or badly made.

An authority on the subject told me that the safest small boat to purchase is an American clipper ship. This type is easily recognizable, and the modern models are usually well-proportioned. However, for some reason—perhaps because of the greater demand for them—they are more expensive than models of other kinds.

Spanish galleons and seventeenth and eighteenth century English ships are attractive, and so are the more elaborate Chinese junks and French vessels. The wisest plan is to choose the model which best suits the house and the room it is to decorate.

Growing up politely

By ELSIE C. MEAD

THOUGH the teaching of table manners seems to be the crux of definite child training, probably because bad manners are more noticeable, and therefore more objectionable, at the table than anywhere else, the mother's responsibility for teaching courtesy does not end with the dessert. To raise children who will behave at all times, as Gilbert and Sullivan express it, "most politely" will require constant attention to all the little amenities of daily life.

The question of when children should rise is safely met by the rule that they should always do so when older people enter a room, whether friends, family or strangers. If the older person is running in and out he can relieve the child of this duty by telling him to keep his seat. Strangely enough, there seems to be a feeling in some quarters that this common courtesy is servile. Recently a trustee of a very large educational institution was being shown around the new dormitories by the dean; when they entered one of the sitting-rooms where two students were reading, the students did not budge, and later the trustee inquired of the dean about this lack of respect. The dean's reply was that he had taught the students to pay no attention to him, as, he explained, "I like to be considered one of them. I think it is more democratic." With such false ideas promulgated by the heads of our institutions, it is easy to understand the difficulties of instilling courtesy in the young. As a matter of fact it is the A B C of good breeding to rise when any one enters the room in which you are sitting. In this case the office of dean carried with it a dignity which should have been acknowledged.

One of the precious early lessons to be taught and one that helps children after they enter the larger world of adult life is to learn unfailing courtesy to employees and domestics, or people of a different social status. "Good morning" and "good night" smooths many a path, and children will unknowingly copy parents who are careful in this direction. All orders to employees should be courteous requests; children should learn that imperious demands are ill-bred and unbecoming. A respect also for the hours of employees does not come amiss; a child who learns that on certain days he can not expect the services of his nurse or the sympathetic aid of a "general girl" learns a useful lesson in consideration for others. In this connection a mother without the help of a maid should plan her day so that she can have a rest hour, and a child, even a little tot, can be taught to respect that time and learn to amuse himself while mother takes the rest that she so much needs. Don't feel you are asking too much of your youngster to consider you; this is the easiest time for him to form this habit of thinking, and you are depriving him of what is his due, if you don't give him the chance to project his thoughts away from himself.

TEACH your children the laws of hospitality; a guest should have the best of everything you have to offer. Children should particularly be taught to feel the responsibility of what is due a guest of their own age; the ideal little host gives up the nicest of everything to his visitor. If it is a question between a bed and a cot, he gives the guest the bed; he also gives him the best hook on which to hang his clothes and lets him have first say in choosing their games.

Courteous manners sit so gracefully on children who have absorbed them early and without self-consciousness. Teach yours to hold open doors and allow the adults to pass before them in or out. Always have your child escort a guest to the front door in order to perform this service.

Your children usually love to use the telephone, but they should be taught to speak courteously at it or suffer the pain of not being allowed to answer it; note the casual "yup" and "what" and "wait," without any prefix. Telephone manners always recall to me the story of a green office-boy, just employed by a banking house in New York, who was asked to get Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan on the wire for the head of his firm. After he had connected with the Morgan office, his horrified employer heard him say, "J. P. to the phone, please."

Never let cruelty to animals get any headway with your youngsters; it is a basis for cruelty in all forms. Teach them respect for old age. Lucky the children who have grandparents they can know, but failing that, contact with people two generations older than they helps to breed reverence if their parents make it a point to instil it. Train your children to leave the most comfortable chairs for their elders, and also impress on them never to pass between two people talking together, even if it means a long way around.

TEACH YOUR CHILDREN COURTESY TO VISITORS

In a house where no maids are kept, a child can be most useful in learning to help to serve gracefully at the table, remembering to pass food always on the left side and never to cross the arm in front of a person to remove anything from the further side.

At the movies or the theater or church, children should learn to step forward and hold open doors, to stand aside and allow the older people to take their seats first. In church it is often welcome for the younger eyes to find the place in the hymnals or prayer-books and hand the book on before doing the same thing for themselves. This should apply to a visiting stranger in the pew as well as to the family.

TEACHING your children the proper form for introductions will give them an ease in this matter that is hard to acquire later. At a friend's house the other day I found the young daughter of nine in the living-room with a playmate and after I had greeted her she said, "Mrs. Mead, this is my friend, Sarah Jones." Immediately we were all friendly and at home; introductions break down awkward barriers and should never be omitted. The woman's or older person's name should always be mentioned first, as "Mrs. Star, may I present Alfred Barnes." Never should children acquire ill-bred alternatives such as, "Shake hands with Alfred Barnes," "Mrs. Star, meet my friend, Alfred Barnes." Boys should learn that they must always remove the right-hand glove before shaking hands, and after the first salutation on the street it is not necessary for the young man to keep his hat off while talking to a woman.

At a party young boys should feel their responsibility, for by their thoughtfulness and willingness to put themselves out a bit they can make a lagging party "go." A little unselfishness towards the less popular girls by all the boys at a party would not fall very heavily on the individual boy and certainly would lighten the burden of the hostess. No party is a really joyous one if only the very popular dancers whirl about and there is left an outer fringe of wallflowers. I actually heard a boy refuse his hostess's request to dance with a certain girl at a party in New York not long ago. This struck me as the very acme of bad bringing-up. The fear of being "stuck" with a girl seems to obliterate any thought of obligation, and it does suggest that a vast improvement could be made in the system of conducting dancing parties. A group of ushers especially chosen to be responsible for introductions and relieving each other by dancing with the girls who have fewer partners is one way to make a party give more pleasure. The young male of to-day, when it comes to dances, believes the world revolves about him, and he is often insufferably self-important. Mothers have a real task with their growing sons to have them keep their perspective as regards themselves.

When George and Mary wish to marry

CAN YOU AFFORD TO MARRY?

Perhaps you could live on his salary if you planned your expenditures with a careful eye. Martha Van Rensselaer and Flora Rose have gathered a wealth of information from families within every range of income. The series of articles of which this is the first will give you in practical, helpful form the results of their study. Each article in turn will help you with your food budget, your clothing plans, your home-buying and house-furnishing allowance—every item of household and family expense will be scrutinized and given its proper place in the budget. When you make your own budget, send for our leaflet which gives you a suggestive division of items. It's a valuable guide and the first step you should take in budgeting. When we mail it, we will include, too, an interesting incentive to budget-making—the leaflet that shows you "How Money Makes Money." A two-cent stamp for postage will bring you both of them. Address the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

MARY and George wish to marry for the age-old reason that they have fallen in love with each other. They are asking themselves—and us—"How much of an income should two people have if they wish to begin housekeeping together, and what will it cost to raise a family? Should there be some protection in the way of savings or investments to fall back on, or is it reasonably safe to marry now without such protection?"

What too often happens with young people is that blindfolded by romance they set out together without map or compass on an uncharted sea to come through whatever perils beset them as best they may. We shall never advise our Marys and Georges to run away from risk or hardship or sacrifice. These are ordeals through which youth needs to pass. Our concern is not to halt these two ardent young people, but to get them ready to meet their difficulties; to unblindfold them and teach them to face the risks they will run. This will not keep them from sailing, but it may keep many of them from shipwreck.

The details of what any family must spend to maintain itself in comfort and decency may be gathered under five main headings:

(1) Food, which includes not only cost of all raw materials, but also cost of meals eaten away from home and cost of ice.

(2) Clothing, which includes cost of materials used in making, cost of ready-made clothes and of repairs, cleaning and pressing.

(3) Housing, which includes rent, if a house is rented; interest on investment, insurance, taxes and cost of upkeep, if a house is purchased; and includes in either case cost of upkeep of grounds. It includes also furnishings and any cost of transportation incurred in going back and forth to business and to school.

(4) Operating, which includes heat, light and water; telephone and telegrams and postage; fuel for cooking; all cleaning supplies; small working equipment; laundry; service.

(5) Development, which includes health, recreation and vacations; education; personal expenses; charities and benevolence; savings in all forms.

There is truly nothing simple about this problem of the cost of living. It is too much tied up with all the other intricate problems of human life, such as strength of character, tastes, standards, desires, social customs, and knowledge and skill in home-making, ever to be other than difficult.

Marriage is a partnership in which each member of the firm has special duties and needs special training. In this partnership it is the right and obligation of the man and woman to determine together the expenditures for the common good of the family. It is also the right of each to be independent in personal expenditures.

Safety in marriage demands a long look into the future. Gaze forward into the years and see if you can finance the housing, clothing and feeding of a family, and the rearing and educating of children.

Marriage can be successful even on a small salary if the parties are thrifty, vigorous, self-sacrificing and courageous—able to find their way through the essentials and non-essentials of life.

THE only way to give two young people any fundamental assistance in this problem of the cost of living is to set up before them some standard which they may use as a measuring-rod. The measuring device we have attempted here is that amount of money which will, on the average, if carefully spent, provide safety, decency and a reasonable amount of comfort and development. Such a device includes low standards of comfort, and does not take into account any real luxury. The attempts we have made to show how to figure costs must be regarded largely as guides and not as rules.

What must Mary and George spend for food? To provide a dietary that will give the greatest measure of health protection from food, not less than eighty cents a day is necessary for raw food materials for two grown persons. This small amount spent for right foods means a wholesome diet, but a monotonous, uninteresting and unvaried one. It restricts eating to eating to live. A dollar to a dollar and ten cents a day for two adults with knowledge and skill will buy raw food materials for a simple, plain diet with a few spots of interest. A dollar and a half a day for raw food materials for two adults will permit some food luxuries; two dollars a day for two adults, skilfully spent, will provide raw material for food luxuries as well as necessities. To furnish anything like an appealing and at the same time adequate diet, however, these young people should count on not less than fifty cents a day apiece or a dollar a day or thirty dollars a month to buy the raw food materials.

What shall Mary and George spend for clothes? Nowhere can we find any satisfactory basis for agreement on a clothing standard. All we can do is to summarize the budgets we have had given to us by various friends who are maintaining a fair to good appearance on modest incomes.

Mary, if skilful, may maintain the wardrobe decently but meagerly for a hundred and fifty dollars a year for herself, and a hundred and twenty-five dollars for George. With two hundred dollars for herself and one hundred and fifty dollars for George, plus her skill in making, making over and keeping in repair, the two may be simply but attractively clothed. With three hundred dollars for Mary and two hundred and twenty-five dollars for George, they may begin to rise into the well-dressed class; but this larger amount still means a very modest wardrobe for each. To maintain a standard of clothes which will give them not only comfort but reasonable satisfaction in looking well, it is hardly safe to plan on less than two hundred dollars a year for Mary and one hundred and fifty dollars for George, and this means that Mary must do no inconsiderable work on her own wardrobe and some on George's. If Mary can not sew, they must count on spending much more than this. Exceptions to these allowances may be made in warm climates, where the cost of clothing may be reduced.

What must Mary and George spend for housing?

If Mary and George marry with the idea of having a family, they must anticipate choosing shelter for one or two children at least. While it might be possible for just the two of them to live in two rooms or three rooms, they must be ready to think ahead to a larger need. Rents

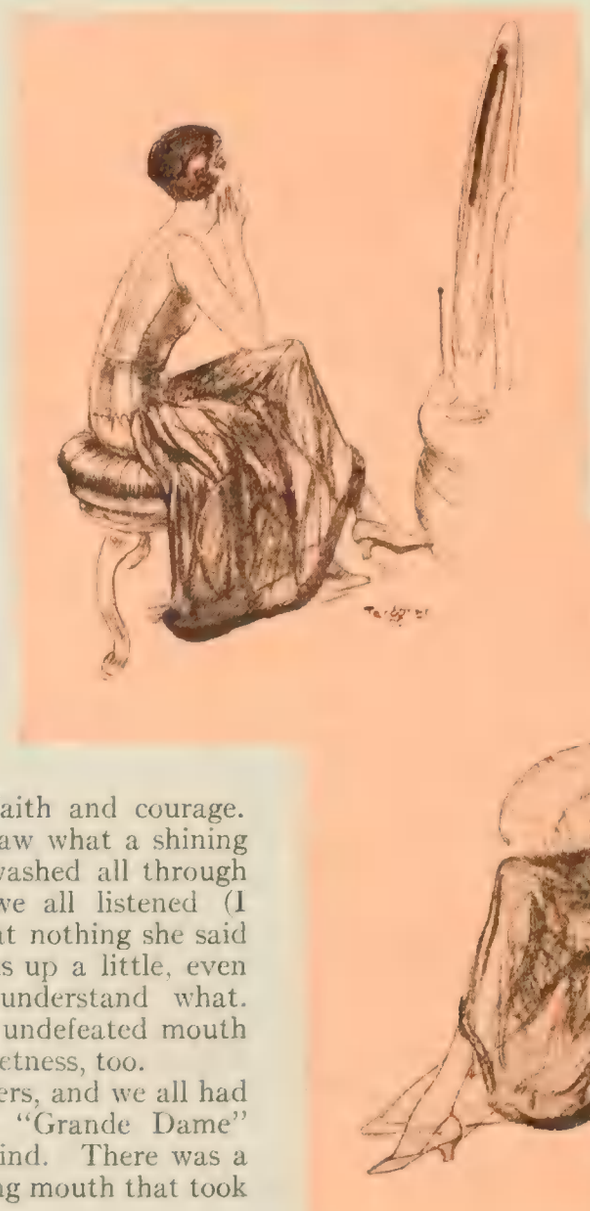
The Curving Bow

By



CELIA CAROLINE COLE

WHERE IS YOUR MOUTH?

Is it with you in the living present? Or does it go back to collect the records of old defeats and grim sorrows? Your face can not look alive unless your mouth is alive with you. Your lips may be dry and discolored when they should have a silky softness. You may unknowingly grimace when you talk. Your teeth, and tongue and breath—all these are factors in the beauty of "The Curving Bow." Ask for Mrs. Cole's leaflet on the "Care of the Mouth." She will be glad to answer any other questions on beauty too. Just write to her, at THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, enclosing a two-cent stamp for return postage.

FOUR women stood on a corner. One of them was the kind to whom, or around whom, nothing awful ever happened; you could feel smooth, wide driveways all through her life; no rough, pioneer paths. Her eyes were keen with intelligence, but her full, red mouth drooped at the corners like plumes that had started out in sunshine and had got caught in a rain. The second woman was a writer—an impressionistic person; no clear lines nor colors, mystical—born for luxury and love. Her eyes were velvet and moonlight and her mouth was a "sweet, red, splendid, kissing mouth." The third was a writer, too. She looked tired and there was a grim, fighting look hidden somewhere back of her eyes, and her slim little body drooped with weariness. But her mouth was like a banner, flung joyously out, marching to victory, singing with faith and courage. When you looked at her mouth, you saw what a shining little thing she was—like something washed all through with light. And when she spoke we all listened (I was the fourth), because we knew that nothing she said would pull us down, but would lift us up a little, even though we didn't believe or quite understand what. The strength and sweetness of that undefeated mouth came out in words of strength and sweetness, too.

All four of us were wives and mothers, and we all had "jobs" and worked at them. The "Grande Dame" since the war had lost faith in mankind. There was a hopelessness and ennui in that drooping mouth that took the heart out of you.

The second one had kept her soft "Cupid's curves" because she believed that warm, individual, human love was the one thing worth having and giving. She had known despair and failure, but nothing had hardened her because there was always human love somewhere for her into which she could creep and find new strength.

And the little shining one had known hunger and daily fear of death for the one person in the world dearest to her; she had carried a man's responsibilities in supporting a family, and she was still not "out of the woods" so far as work and a living were concerned. But she had faith—crystal, shining faith in a guiding intelligence; an unfailing love that you could go to and renew yourself.

And the secret thing of every one of us was revealed in our mouths. Eyes tell tales, too, but not so nakedly as do our mouths.

You are discontented or disillusioned; your pliant mouth drops its corners the way a scolded dog drops his poor little tail. You are vain; your mouth flattens into shallowness. You are generous in your judgments and actions; your mouth keeps its curve and takes on a warm, human, understanding expression, and laughter waits in the corners. You are grim with fighting against the blows life gives most of us; your mouth straightens out into an endurance line, thin and grim. You love good food and luxury and caresses; your mouth becomes sensuous and a bit coarsened. You adopt a philosophy of "All is good" and get it no further into your life than words, and your mouth takes on that thin, flat look of optimism that is worse than a droop, because it's artificial.

Whatever is going on inside of you is betraying you at your mouth.

There are quite a number of mechanical things to do to lift up the droop and banish the lines that come with drooping. Perhaps the best is five or ten minutes' molding at night from the sides of the chin up to under the eyes; not pushing, but pressing, lifting, pressing, lifting, pressing, lifting, by the two middle fingers of each hand; then from the sides of the chin to the temples, lifting and strengthening those muscles that control the corners of the mouth. When molding, have a good, rich cold-cream, a skin food, or cold-cream mixed with some one of the good muscle oils on the market, spread over the face. Then at the end, pat with an absorbent cotton-pad wet in ice-water, squeezed out, and wet with a tonic or an astringent. Then when you get in bed, consciously lift the mouth by thinking a smile, and take that thought-smile into peaceful sleep with you.

And don't go to sleep, please, with your thoughts sitting in a family circle discussing some problem, round and round and round. Send your thoughts off to play, and say to that unconscious mind in you that you don't use half enough, and that has stored in it all you need for every problem—say to it, "Mark me, you Mind-in-Me, give me that solution in the morning. You can. Thank you." Watch the corners of your mouth come up, relieved from tension and responsibility and fear. And watch, too, how many problems are solved by the morning answer!

Several of the beauty salons have mouth exercises, scientifically worked out to keep the face muscles supple and firm. Whistling is splendid for the mouth. Feel the whistle in your eyes as well as in your mouth.

A smile and silence are two of the most powerful charms in the world. A smile that understands, or challenges, or rejects, or reassures. Oh, so few words would be needed if people only understood the power and charm of a smile!

Very often there is a slight discoloration around the mouth. Always cleanse the mouth after eating, preferably with a bit of cold-cream on a dampened cotton-pad, or with warm water, if you prefer that. Then until all discoloration disappears, use one of the stinging circulation or combination creams the beauty manufacturers have proven to be so effective. It brings the blood up strongly and extracts yellow tones and brown shadows quite astonishingly. Do this four or five times a week, always putting on skin-food afterward for five or ten minutes; then wipe off and powder. It brings a velvety, cleansed, whiter look. Or use a mild bleach—a cream or lemon-juice; or if your skin is not too dry, pat with a lotion made half peroxide, half rain-water, holding the lips folded in, to protect their sensitiveness. Let the lotion dry on.

Deepening the pleasant little valley that runs from the nose to the center of the upper lip, adds to the curve of the mouth—the Cupid's bow. With thumb and forefinger bring together gently the curves of the upper lip; make a habit of this when you are reading, or having your scalp massaged, or listening to your youngest's spelling lesson.

All the sweetness and adventure and understanding in you should be in your mouth. You can have a nose that leads you around, and a skin that isn't at all luminous any more, and hair that is faded, and a certain look under the chin that every woman of forty knows, but if your mouth has kept its sweetness and sense of humor and generosity, you're a nice person, and he who runs may read.

All grown-up life is rather a snuffer. Dreams so rarely come true. But if you haven't lost your ability to dream, and have gained the courage to follow your dream, you aren't snuffed low. It's all there in your mouth—the struggle and the refusal to be snuffed out.

Just why a mouth is called a Cupid's bow I don't know, but if one could keep love in the heart, brimming, and a bit of mischief in the mind, just enough to make one play, and never forget that to neglect a moment's happiness is a crime punishable by law—the law of living, I think perhaps there would be more curving bows in the world. Don't you?

THERE ARE SEVERAL THINGS YOU CAN DO TO KEEP YOUR MOUTH A CURVING BOW; ONE OF THEM IS—NOT TO TAKE YOUR WORRIES TO DREAMLAND

Dressing Up the Everyday Dish

By WINIFRED MOSES

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

THE simplest dish gains interest if attractively garnished and appropriately served. A little extra time invested in dressing up the daily meals will yield ample returns both in the satisfaction experienced in having appealed to the eye as well as to the stomach and in the pleasure and appreciation of one's family and friends.

A very simple method of improving the appearance of the ordinary main hot dish is to arrange some of the vegetables or starchy foods in the form of a border with the meat in the center and the other vegetables as a garnish on the outside. Very simple meals present an attractive and festive appearance when served in this manner.

Perhaps the simplest and easiest border to prepare is one of mashed potato. To prepare this border, mash the potatoes thoroughly. Then add four tablespoons of hot milk or cream (some varieties of potatoes require more than this amount of moisture to make them of the right consistency) and two tablespoons of melted butter for each pint of mashed potatoes. Season with salt and beat with a fork until the mixture is light and fluffy. Place an oval, round or square pan, buttered on the outside, in the center of a hot platter. Shape a border of the potatoes around this and then remove the pan. Place a creamed meat, fish, eggs or vegetable within the border. Reheat the dish for a moment. Garnish it and serve.

To vary this border for a company dinner, add two egg-yolks to each pint of the seasoned mashed potatoes and mix well. Then fold in the stiffly beaten whites of the eggs. Shape in the same way as the plain potato border on a platter or chop-plate, or on a plank such as is employed for planked dishes, and place in a hot oven until the potatoes take on a delicate brown. Remove from the oven and fill the center with creamed fish, ham or ham à la king, and surround with a border of buttered onions or baby beets that have been reheated in melted butter and a little vinegar.

Another combination that is still more attractive and colorful is a ring of the potatoes filled with creamed chicken or eggs à la king, with an outside border of stuffed baked tomatoes or peppers. If a very festive dish for some special occasion is desired, put the hot mashed potatoes to which the eggs have been added into a pastry-bag. Set the greased pan in the center of a heat-resistant platter or plank and pipe the potato mixture around in ribbon form. Fill this with chicken à la king and surround it with a border of broiled mushrooms or buttered asparagus tips.

Sweet potatoes are prepared in the same way as white potatoes, except that the border should be brushed with the white of an egg before reheating in the oven.

Greens—spinach, dandelion, beet and turnip greens—present a more distinguished appearance when served either in a mound or in the form of a border. Put carefully cooked, well-seasoned, chopped greens in a hot, well-greased ring mold. Invert on a hot chop-plate. Fill with creamed or mashed potatoes or well-seasoned boiled rice and garnish with rings of hard-boiled eggs and slices of crisp bacon.

Greens to be used in borders must be thoroughly drained in order that no water drain from the border to detract from the appearance of the finished product. They can be more attractively arranged when dry.

The appearance of common cabbage or the often-despised sauerkraut may be improved greatly by this method of treatment. Arrange in the form of a ring, fill the center with fluffy white mashed potato piled high, and surround with a border of crisp sausage cakes or link sausages.

Rice also lends itself to the border treatment. Rinse the rice thoroughly in cold water and put it on to boil. While it is cooking, melt four tablespoons of butter in a saucepan, add one or two tablespoons each of finely minced onion, green pepper, red pepper and celery. Let this mixture simmer, with an occasional stirring, until the rice is ready. Add the drained rice. Mix the sauce in with the rice. Turn the whole into a well-greased hot ring mold. Invert on a hot platter. Remove the mold; fill the ring with curried salmon or eggs. Surround it with buttered cauliflower or slices of fried tomato. Creamed or minced dishes may also be served in the rice border.

Macaroni, spaghetti or noodles make excellent borders. These of course can not be molded, but they may be arranged on the outside of the platter or chop-plate. Serve them in an appetizing ring as a border for roast beef or mutton.

Macaroni makes an especially delicious border for a Swiss steak or pot roast cooked with tomato or creole sauce. When the steak or roast is done, arrange it in the center of a hot platter. Add the cooked macaroni to the sauce in the pan in which the meat was cooked and reheat, stirring lightly to prevent burning and to mix it thoroughly with the sauce. Arrange this in a border around the meat.

Planked meats, chicken or fish offer one of the most effective means of serving food in an attractive form. A border of mashed or duchesse potatoes usually surrounds the meat on the plank. These may be put on with a pastry-tube or arranged in balls or patties with a spoon. Nests of the potatoes may be used as a border or may be used as a garnish around the meat. Inside the border these nests of potatoes are most effective when filled with a colorful vegetable such as buttered peas, carrots or a combination of the two vegetables. Potato croquettes, balls, French fried or Julienne potatoes, bread points or rice croquettes may be used as a border for planked meat.

Stuffed tomatoes, peppers, glazed or buttered onions, or broiled tomatoes are used to fill in the plank. Other vegetables, such as string-beans, asparagus or cucumbers, may be used with the planked dish in attractive arrangements.

These garnished dishes have many advantages besides beauty. The whole meal is served at once with a minimum of dishes and the maximum of ease.

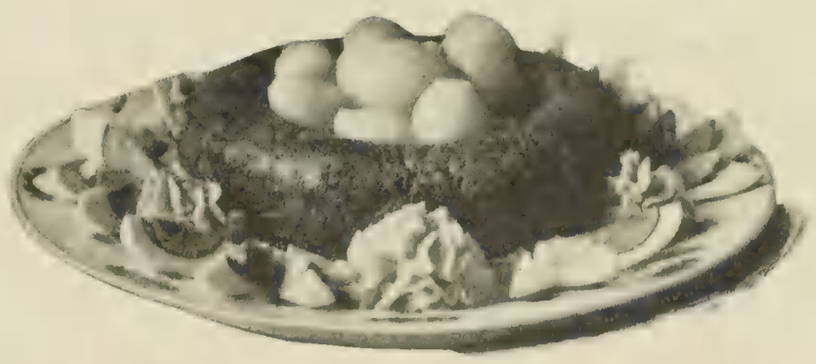
Planked fish may be decorated with parsley and slices of lemon alone. Chicken on a plank may be garnished with mushrooms or oysters in addition to the potatoes and vegetables.

Eggs served on a bed of chopped spinach, mashed potato or chopped meat are more interesting than the egg alone. A poached egg surrounded by a thick sauce or purée is most appetizing. Crisp slices of bacon or sprays of parsley make a great difference in the attractiveness of an egg dish.

Many vegetables are colorless affairs unless a bit of paprika or a sprinkling of chopped parsley is added. So simple a thing as browning in the oven will add much to certain vegetables, especially if they are first sprinkled with grated cheese.

Even soups may have their bit of decoration. Nicely browned croutons made from left-over bits of bread make a clear soup attractive. A spoonful of whipped cream added to pea or tomato soup gives just the contrast of color desirable as an appetite appeal. Noodles, tapioca, spaghetti, egg balls, royal custards, thinly sliced vegetables, a bit of chopped parsley or a sprinkling of cheese will give the dressed-up effect to many every-day dishes.

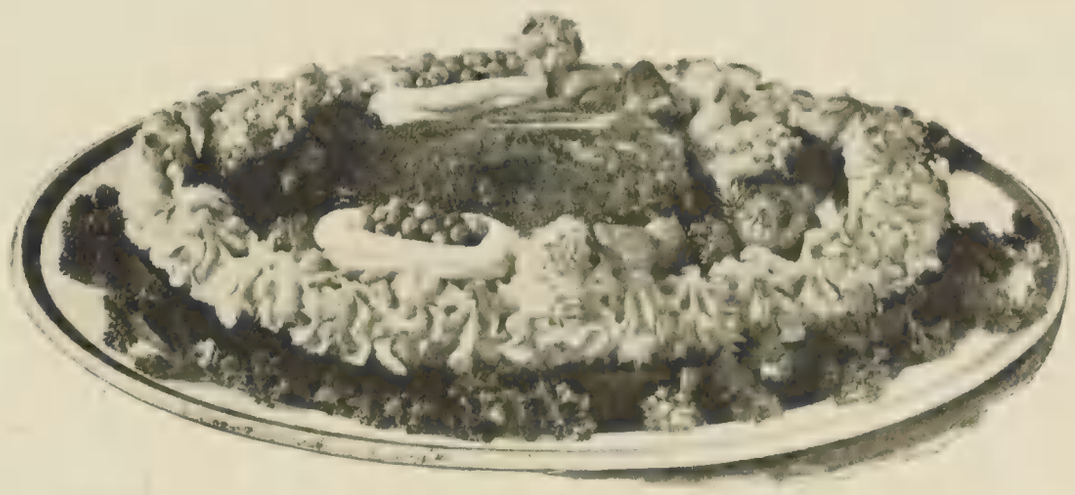
Desserts and salads are the easiest of foods to garnish. With salads one should always be careful that the garnish does not extend over the edge of the dish. Here, too, as in all cases, the garnish should not interfere with either the service or the eating of the food. Where more color or accent is needed than that supplied by the lettuce, cress or parsley used as a background for the salad, it may be supplied by a sprinkling of paprika, minced parsley, a few capers, a grating of cheese, a strip of pimiento or of green pepper, or a few grated nuts. Tiny new onions, radishes cut to resemble roses, sliced pickles and whole or sliced olives are appropriate to use with vegetable salads.



Whipped cream, either plain or sprinkled with chopped nuts, cherries, candied fruit, preserved ginger or a bit of jam, offers an attractive finish to many a plain dessert. The possibilities of the pastry-tube in using whipped cream, decorative icings and meringues to garnish desserts is almost limitless.

GARNISH AND SERVE!

How much or how little those words can mean—simply a sprig of crisp green parsley or an elaborate decoration made with a pastry-bag and vegetables. If you would like our directions for preparing planked steak and ring mold—two dishes which can be easily and effectively decorated—write to our Home-Making Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., enclosing a stamped, self-addressed envelope



Greens, potatoes, onions and boiled eggs look like most ordinary food when served in this plain fashion

But see what happens when you mold the greens in a ring, fill with the onions and garnish with potatoes and egg

Would you think that with a steak, potatoes and tomatoes and peas you could make such a glorious dish as this home-cooked, planked steak?

Timbales, puddings, custards and croquettes are made better by a bit of garnish. This timbale is trimmed with strips of pimiento put in the dish before filling

ADVENTURES IN LAMP-MAKING

By Frances Lorry

Gay-colored beads make fascinating ballast in this glass-bottle base

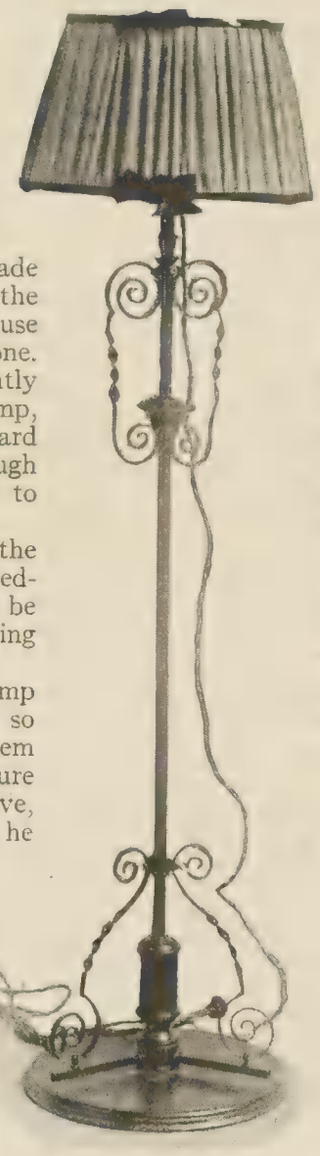
THERE is as much magic in the lamps one can buy or make to-day as there was in that far-famed lamp of Aladdin's. Indeed, a modern person is just as apt to be a slave of the lamp as the genii of old, for the bewildering array of shades, brilliant parchment and subdued silk, the fascinating stands of polychrome, wrought iron and pottery, leave one almost powerless when it comes to making a choice. The only way to make a wise selection is to keep in mind sternly the home setting—that is, the size of the room, the kind of furniture you have, the color scheme, and the uses to which the lamp will be put.

With a world of color and shapes to choose from in shades and bases, one may need a bit of advice. If the lamp is to be used for reading—a purpose which is often far from the intention and the design of the maker—use some tone of yellow or rose in the shade. Avoid blue, as this color absorbs light. Furthermore, make sure that the light from the lamp will be shed over a sufficient radius to include the reader's back. Remember that the taller the base and the broader the shade the larger will be the patch of light thrown by the lamp.

If one lacks sufficient funds to purchase the alluring lamp bases and shades that are so temptingly displayed in the shops to-day, take heart, for it is quite possible to have individual and decorative fixtures attractively shaded at a very small cost, if only a little ingenious thought and labor are expended.

After the amateur's first timid but successful venture into lamp and shade making, no empty jug, crock, bottle or vase will be safe from schemes of transformation. Old oil-lamps, vases of good shape whose decoration or coloring offends, empty jars that have been saved with the hope that they might be used "some time," seem to plead with the lamp-maker to turn them into joys forever. Perhaps the happiest feature of this delightful pastime is the feminine triumph of using things one hasn't had courage to throw away or vision to utilize before.

When I learned that I was to have the joy of furnishing a cottage of my own, I vowed I should never have the usual cottage lighting—stark incandescent bulbs swinging stupidly from the rafters. Thereupon I began to look around the house for suggestive jugs or bowls. To my joy I found there was a lamp in everything—if only one had the vision to see it!



Since fixtures already wired can be bought ready to slip into the base with a small opening, the amateur lamp-maker need be concerned only with bases and shades. If the lower part of the fixture is too large for the opening, cut it into several pieces and lap them over, pressing them together with pliers. If the lower part of the fixture is too small, wind it with paper and fasten it in firmly with melted paraffin or sealing-wax.

In selecting a wire frame for your lamp-shade, remember that a circular rather than a hexagonal or octagonal shape will give better results and be easier to make. From two-thirds to three-quarters the height of the base is a fair guide for proportion. The fixture should not show below the shade, nor should the lower edge of the shade cut off the top line of the base. Because wire frames come only in stock sizes with diameters differing by two inches, the right proportion is sometimes difficult to get. A frame that is too large can be cut down by a tinner, but don't let him try to add to a smaller one. It's like the added cubit to one's stature.

In a single-bulb lamp the shade generally rests on the bulb. If the fixture shows below the shade, use a round bulb instead of a long one. If the shade needs to be slightly higher in a two or more bulb lamp, put a few thicknesses of cardboard on the center rod, but leave enough of the rod projecting on which to fasten the finishing knob.

It is a good plan to ballast the lamp-base. I use sand. A bedroom lamp of clear glass may be made very attractive by anchoring with varicolored crystals beads.

The idea of making a bridge-lamp from two discarded chandeliers so intrigued me that finally I took them to a tinner, together with a picture of one of the popular, inexpensive, wrought-iron ones. Listlessly he gave ear, unperceiving, "Lady, with my time at a dollar thirty-five an hour, you better forget it and buy one." But the thought persisted in my mind, and when, some time later, that old family retainer, the plumber, was at the house, I showed him how I thought the transformation might be made. That perceiving soul returned with his hacksaw, and together we achieved. He amputated the three projecting arms, mounted the tip of the rod thus left in a ready-to-hand circle of wood, miraculously of the right diameter, and secured it with a washer and a nut. From the twin chandelier we took two matching scrolls and fastened them to a joining in the rod near the top. These we bent to the desired shape before fastening them with screws and binding them with fine wire. This major operation took half an hour of the plumber's time. A coat of dull black paint gave the stand the appearance of wrought iron.

It took two discarded chandeliers and a plumber to produce this really practical and individual floor-lamp

As this lamp and one made from an unglazed vase of terra-cotta were both intended for the living-room, they were given twin shades of orange crêpe bound with black velvet ribbon. The vase lamp was painted black with a drip pattern in orange to match the shade. Needless to say they were hugely successful.

For my cottage porch-lamp neither a parchment nor a fabric shade nor a painted base seemed suitable. So I cast about me for an inspiration. Finally I located three tall, slender jugs of roughly glazed clay. Two I found in the attic, one in the laundry. Now the three of them are netted into a wicker-and-reed covering of the simplest pattern and each one is topped by a shade of finely woven split bamboo that in a former incarnation was a man's garden hat.

The difficulty of making parchment shades seems to be exaggerated in the sets of directions now current. Only a few special materials are necessary: the parchment itself, some tubes of oil-paints, including black, turpentine, paper-clips and small brass brads. Orange, vermilion and light brown are desirable tints to buy because shades so colored give a soft glow when lighted and are cheerful to look at in the daytime.

When working with parchment, many steps such as winding the frame and gluing the outside may be eliminated. First make a pattern by folding wrapping-paper over the frame, fastening it at intervals with paper-clips. Allow from one-third to one-half an inch at the edges and three-quarters to one inch at the lapover. See that there is no fulness or wrinkling in the pattern before laying it on the parchment and cutting it. Have ready oil-paints thinned with turpentine to brush on the paper, covering small sections at a time with a light stroke and using a clean cloth to distribute the color evenly. A very light color may be applied to both sides. The paper-clips are used to hold the covering to the wire until the edges have been turned down, sewed and finished with the binding. The two ends are lapped over and fastened with small brass brace brads evenly spaced.

The wires of shades to be covered with fabric should be wound so there will be a foundation to hold the stitches. The upright wires are wound first, then the top and bottom, so that all the ends are covered. Use pieces of any light-colored narrow ribbon. These do not twist quite as the long rolls of special winding-ribbon do. Always sew the lower edge of the lining and the outside first; then draw the material up tightly to the top. Calculate the fulness according to the fractions made by the upright wires, and pin the gathers into place before the final sewing. Bindings, such as ribbon, velvet and galloon, cover a multitude of stitches and rough edges, and make an attractive finish.

If you live in an accumulative household, try the game of "I spy" a lamp the next time you inspect your cupboards and other hiding-places. It's a most enjoyable pastime and profitable as well.

And second-hand bric-à-brac and furniture shops offer a wealth of material in every form—from old vases and candlesticks to cart-wheels, which, with ingenuity, may be turned into the most individual of lighting fixtures.

One of the most interesting central fixtures I ever saw was made from the hickory wheel of an old cart. Turned on its side, it was hung by three short iron chains which led to a central chain that was fastened to the ceiling by a stout hook. From the ceiling and down the chain, passed the electrical wire which ran around the wooden rim of the wheel and lighted the candle-equipped sockets. These candles were placed at intervals of about five inches around the wheel, and when the entire fixture was lighted, produced a soft, pleasing circle of light.

This type of fixture is, of course, unshaded, and may not appeal to many who like the softness and mellowness which a bulb gives when covered with silk or paper. The problem of shading a high ceiling fixture is often difficult, but THE DELINEATOR will be glad to advise its readers in this matter as well as in any other relating to lamp-shades.

An old earthenware bottle makes this lamp

If the writer made distinctive and good-looking lamps for her home, so can you. You need directions, of course, to have your shades possess that so-desired professional look. But our House-Decoration Department will gladly send you those in return for four cents in stamps to cover postage. Just address Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

YOU CAN DO IT, TOO!

SOULIÉ SKETCHES FROM THE BUTTERICK PARIS SHOP SHOW FLARED LINES FOR FALL ENSEMBLES

Black, white and silver are used by Lucien Lelong. The heavy satin coat is banded with civet cat, and side plaits stitched down part way are allowed to flare below. Silver embroidery trims the white georgette tunic top

The element of surprise in a coat of black marocain from Chéruit is contributed by the unexpected glint of copper-colored velveteen where the flares ripple foward from each side. The facings of the lapels are also of the copper color. The sleeve is unusually close for a coat

A gray ensemble makes itself more interesting by the insertion of bands of gray crêpe de Chine. The kick plait, the slanted pockets and the small white linen collar strike a boyish note. White linen also peeps out, vestee fashion, from the slit at the front. From Premet

Tortoise-shell Byzantine satin turns up its dull side for bands, collar and deep cuffs, and gives a waistcoat effect to a Jean Patou frock. Flares, which we have learned to expect at the front and back, have moved to each side

A flared coat of billiard green velvet is put over a rose-beige crêpe de Chine frock trimmed with rows of gold buttons. The collar, pointing the way to the ear, is in a position to whisper that high necks are becoming important. "Modèle Jenny"
(Déposé, reproduction interdite)

Renée paints a plaid on brown crêpe satin for the long tunic of this ensemble. The scalloped hem climbs upward at the sides and its curved outline is repeated by the flares of the coat. The fur at wrists and neck is Labrador and the exaggerated tie is part of the frock collar

THE FLARED SILHOUETTE IS FLOUNCED OR APRONED AND PARTIAL TO THE JABOT

THE Autumn fashions show an important silhouette—the easier line of the flare. The leaning toward softer lines, which began with Spring and increased with Summer, is becoming a positive bent with Autumn. It takes the form of circular flounces, circular skirts and circular aprons. A flounce that encircles the entire frock is as smart as the one that ripples at the front only. Many well-dressed women, however, prefer the front-flounced frock, for it combines the two silhouettes—flared at front, straight at back. One of the newest of the front flounces is lifted, drapery fashion, to the left hip. Another runs its upper edge diagonally up one side. An all-around circular flounce curves upward at the front to meet the downward curve of a jabot. The circular apron on a straight dress gives the flare line without sacrificing anything of the slim line. Handkerchief draperies, also, simulate the new fulness.

PLAITS ARE SMART, SLEEVES ARE LONG AND THERE IS A TENDENCY TO BRING NECKS HIGHER

YOUTH is the "pull" straight frocks have with style. For freedom and to make the short skirt more wearable, slim frocks hit upon the happy plan of plaits. They allow width without advertising it and their lines assist at slenderizing. Frocks are smart with a single inverted plait at the front, or a cluster of them there. A new dress puts a plait at each side. The straight frock without fulness also holds its own, and the wrap-around does not need plaits for freedom.

Wool frocks take the straight line. Flounced ones invariably use silk. The circular skirt may use either. For silk dresses there are crêpe satin, satin Canton, satin, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma, Georgette, etc. Straight dresses use both silks and wools, the latter including soft twills, cashmere, wool crêpe, kasha, camel's-hair twills, flannel, novelty wools, serge, etc.

THE FLARE TURNS BACKWARD ON A NEW FROCK AND COAT—OTHER COATS ARE STRAIGHT, PLAITED, ETC.

6302—The smart circular flare makes its first appearance across the back of a coat straight in the front. Use short-nap coatings, cashmere coatings, suède-finished coatings, etc.

19 years or 36 bust requires 2¾ yards 54-inch kasha. Lower edge 2 yards.

The coat is for ladies 38 to 44 bust, also misses 15 to 20 years.

6300—A mannish-style coat must of course be double-breasted, notch-collared and conveniently pocketed. This smart coat, cut on the newest lines, has a slightly fitted effect above and flares a bit below. Make it of tweeds or mannish suitings. Lower edge 53 inches.

36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 54-inch tweed.

The coat is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6304—10787—Flannel, kasha, camel's-hair twill, heavy crêpe de Chine, heavy silk crêpe or heavy satin, etc., makes a smart one-piece dress. The straight lower edge makes this slip-over frock also suitable for wide-bordered flannel, etc. The monogram is decorative. Work in color. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 4⅛ yards 27-inch flannel.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6298—Here we find the circular flare across the front. This new and graceful coat is an excellent type for an ensemble. Make it of short-nap coatings, cashmere coatings, etc.

19 years or 36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 54-inch kasha duvetyn.

The coat is for ladies 38 to 44 bust, also misses 15 to 20 years.

6305—A charming frock inserts a plait at the left side. This one-piece dress fits closely at the hipline. The lower edge is straight and the sleeve has two seams. Use worsteds, cashmere, wool crêpe, light-weight kasha, etc. Lower edge with plaits out 52 inches

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch twill.

The dress is for ladies 34 to 48 bust.

6296—The straight-line coat looks with favor on the fashionable plait, and places one on each side of its lower front. Use novelty weaves, tweeds, cashmere cheviots, or camel's-hair with plaid or plain twill flannel lining, etc.

36 bust requires 3¼ yards 48-inch novelty wool. Lower edge 47 inches.

The coat is for ladies 33 to 52 bust, also misses.

6303—This collar makes a becoming frame for the face. The straight line coat may have its pocket on the outside or on the lining. Use tweeds, cashmere cheviots, novelty weaves, etc., with plain twill flannel or plaid lining. The lower edge is straight.

THE AUTUMN SILHOUETTE TAKES THE EASY LINE OF PLAITS, FLARES AND SOFT GATHERS

6259—With collar tied and shoulder running into the sleeve, this one-piece slip-over dress has chic. Use crêpe satin or plain satin with silk crêpe satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe de Chine, etc. The lower edge is straight.

36 bust requires 3¼ yds. 35-in. crêpe de Chine. ⅝ yard 35-inch contrasting. Lower edge 46 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6275—10119—The embroidered flowers and the hand-made one belong to the same plant family. Work in one-stitch. A circular flounce crosses the front of this one-piece slip-over frock, which fits the hipline closely. Use Georgette, crêpe de Chine, etc.

36 bust requires 3½ yds. 39-in. crêpe satin. (Flounce cut crosswise to avoid piecing), 1 yard 39-inch Georgette. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6227—Plain Georgette, chiffon, chiffon voile, etc., are delightful for the slip-over frock that has a full, straight skirt attached at the low waistline. The narrow drop skirt and camisole are of matching satin. The ribbon flowers are hand-made. Lower edge of skirt 3 yds., of drop skirt 48 ins.

36 bust requires 3½ yds. 39-in. Georgette.

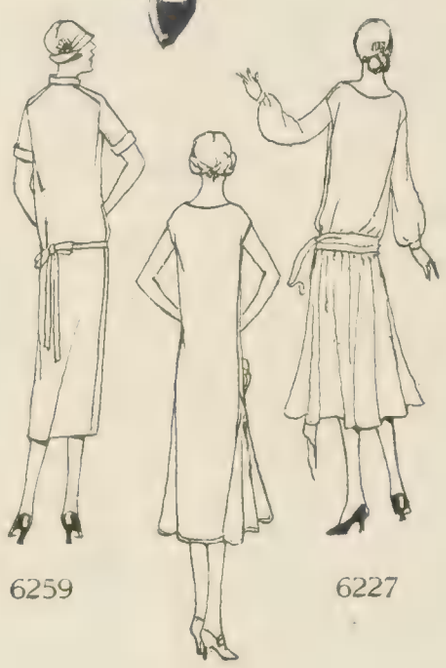
The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6291—Slenderness and height are given to this frock by the cluster of plaits at each side, front and back. Make this one-piece slip-over dress of crêpe satin, plain satin, satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or heavy crêpe de Chine, with contrasting, etc. Lower edge with plaits drawn out 2 yds.

36 bust requires 3¾ yds. 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is excellent for ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6191—The fulness of this one-piece slip-over frock forms a godet on the left hip. Only one underarm seam is required when using wide borders in silk crêpe, crêpe satin, etc., or, for certain figures, other wide materials. Narrower material requires both seams. The lower edge is straight.



36 bust requires 2⅛ yds. 54-inch bordered silk crêpe. Lower edge 54 inches.

The dress is attractive for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6297—The fashionable circular flare now appears outlined in scallops. This slip-over frock fits closely at the hipline. Make it of satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma or Georgette; or use printed crêpe de Chine, etc. Lower edge 2⅛ yards.

36 bust requires 3 yds. 40-in. crêpe satin.

TASTE THEM IN ALL THEIR GLORY IN THIS TOMATO SOUP!

The harvest for Campbell's Tomato Soup

Nature smiles her sunniest on the tomato. Upon it she lavishes her gifts. Within it she stores the food that invigorates. She enriches it with pure tonic juices and luscious "meat". She gives it a brilliant color and a skin of velvet.

But Campbell's have glorified the tomato—grown it on their own great farms to a new perfection, aided a host of other growers to produce a finer yield.

And then this rich harvest is transformed, at the deft hands of Campbell's famous chefs, into as tempting and delicious a treat as ever spoon brought to your lips.

Tasting Campbell's Tomato Soup is tasting tomatoes at their greatest glory.

I'm Captain Kidd with a pirate crew,
We sail the Spanish Main.
But when we're out of Campbell's Soup
We sail straight home again!

Tomato Sauce!

Housewives use Campbell's Tomato Soup for a great variety of their dishes to give extra zest and flavor. Try it as a sauce for meats, fish, sausage and salads and for added tastiness in spaghetti, rice, eggs or vegetables. Of course, it makes the most delicious Cream of Tomato!

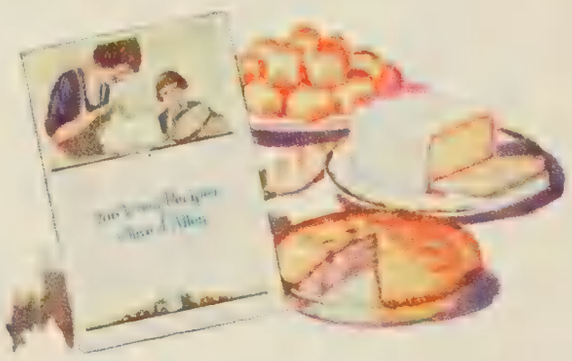
My new ways to cook these old favorites



SINCE I have found a way to fry without filling the house with smoke and unpleasant odors, I have been frying everything I possibly could. The result is that I have a greater variety of dishes to serve from our same old reliable favorites.

Delicious foods, too, crisp and brown outside and thoroughly cooked inside. Crisco is economical, too. It isn't absorbed by the food, so very little is used up in frying.

Crisco has made possible the delicious new ways of frying the foods you see pictured on this page. It has made possible, too, a brand new pleasure in frying for it is a real pleasure to cook with a fat as clean and sweet as Crisco is. Crisco, you know, is a vegetable shortening.

Delicious cakes, pies and muffins

I make all my cakes with Crisco. Crisco doesn't have to be kept on ice, so it is always ready for instant use. It makes perfect cakes and is so much more economical. I use Crisco for every purpose which requires shortening and find it always the same, giving uniform results no matter whether I am frying, making cakes, biscuits, pies or muffins. W. S. C.

Free! 200 Tested Recipes!

Miss Olive S. Allen, a real home cook of many years experience, gathered and tested hundreds of recipes from all over the world, from famous foreign chefs, from old fashioned home cooks; from luxurious hotels and little inns; even from trappers and hunters. From these she selected the best two hundred and put them in this little cook book. Fried Tomatoes

Remove stem from tomatoes and cut them in half the broad way. Sprinkle with salt on both sides. Dip in flour. Put enough Crisco into cold frying pan to partly cover tomatoes when Crisco is melted. When Crisco is hot, put tomato in and fry first on the flat side. When brown, turn with pancake turner and fry on the other side. Delicious with broiled steak.

Peach Surprises

2 cups pastry flour
1 teaspoon baking powder
1 teaspoon sugar
10 peaches
¼ teaspoon salt
3 eggs
½ cup milk
1 tablespoon melted Crisco

Beat eggs. Add Crisco, then milk. Sift dry ingredients together. Add and beat until smooth. Peel peaches. Cut in half removing stone. Dip each half into batter and fry in deep Crisco heated to 375 to 385 degrees F. or when a small piece of bread browns in 40 seconds. Fry until peach is soft. Test with a toothpick. Serve with a meat course or with whipped cream for dessert.

Deep fried Cauliflower

1 medium sized cauliflower
Yolks of 2 eggs
¾ cup flour
½ cup milk
¼ teaspoon salt

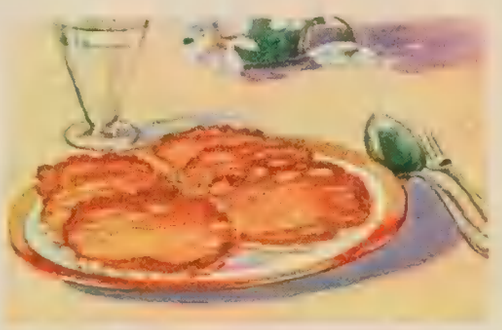
Wash cauliflower and separate the flowers. Boil until tender (with 1 teaspoon salt in the water), then drain. A slice of lemon boiled with it keeps it perfectly white. Beat egg yolks until light. Add milk, salt, and flour. Beat smooth with egg beater. Dip each section of cauliflower into batter Drop in hot Crisco heated to 385 to 395 degrees F. or when a piece of bread browns in 20 seconds.

Fry until brown and serve with following hot sauce:

White Sauce:

3 tablespoons Crisco
⅛ teaspoon pepper
3 tablespoons flour
¼ teaspoon paprika
½ teaspoon salt

Rub to a paste over fire. Add 1½ cupfuls boiling water. Last add 1 teaspoon lemon juice.



Panned Corn and Peppers

2 cups green corn
2 green peppers
⅓ cup cream
Crisco (enough, when melted, to cover bottom of pan)
¼ teaspoon pepper
½ teaspoon salt

Cut from ears of fresh corn enough to fill two cups. Chop peppers. Add salt and pepper. Mix together. Put Crisco in cold frying pan. When melted, put in corn and peppers. Cover and cook slowly about 10 minutes or until corn is tender. Uncover and cook until thoroughly done, and just before serving add cream. Will serve four people.

Corn Cakes

2 eggs
1 teaspoon salt
2 cups fresh green corn
Crisco (enough, when melted, to cover bottom of pan)

Cut corn from ears. Beat eggs light. Add to corn with the salt. Stir all together. Put Crisco into cold frying pan. When hot, drop corn mixture by spoonfuls into hot Crisco. Keep them far enough apart so you can turn them easily. Fry until brown. Turn and brown on other side.

They will be easier to fry if you add one tablespoon flour but they will not be so good.

All measurements level. Recipes tested and approved by Good Housekeeping Institute.

ATTRACTIVE WHOLESOME FRIED FOODS—without smoke

1 All you need for deep frying (in this case cauliflower) is an ordinary saucepan, a wire strainer and a 3 pound can of Crisco. And, of course, all you need for delicious pan frying is Crisco and your frying pan.

2 For all frying put Crisco in cold pan and heat slowly. Remember, Crisco will cook food before it is hot enough to smoke. If you have no thermometer, use the bread test given in the deep frying recipes above.

3 In pan frying use enough Crisco to half cover the food. It need not be wasted for you can strain it back into the can and use it over and over. Crisco does not take the taste of foods; not even cauliflower, which has a decided flavor.

4 Notice that Crisco foods, both pan fried and deep fried, are free from grease with a brown outside and a well cooked inside.

Crisco is trade-mark for a superior shortening manufactured and guaranteed purely vegetable by The Procter & Gamble Co. Cincinnati, Ohio, U. S. A. © 1925 by The Procter & Gamble Co.

Cooking at the Table Is Less Work and More Fun

By Ruth B. More

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

After you have discovered how easy it is to cook with electrical devices you will want more menus and recipes. And we have them ready to send you: recipes for delectable dishes that can be made conveniently at the table and menus for breakfasts, luncheons and suppers.

Let us help you to electrify the rest of your housekeeping, too. Our Home-Making Department has prepared a list of necessary and desirable electric equipment for the home, together with an estimate of cost. It will help you plan your electric purchases and select the equipment best suited to your needs. We'll gladly send you both these leaflets if you will just send a two-cent stamp to cover postage with your request to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N.Y.

A FEW pieces of electric cooking equipment are among the possessions of practically every family in this country, and yet few families use to any extent this simple and at times very jolly means of preparing their daily food.

The usual pieces of electric equipment for cooking at the table are chafing-dish, grill, toaster, waffle-iron, egg-cooker, percolator and the small electric stove of one or two plates.

In cooking at the table, let several guests or members of the family assist. No other custom develops such intimate charm and ease of manner.

There is, however, one word of warning which must be heeded if electric cooking equipment is to be safe for cooking-at-table meals. The ordinary single circuit will not usually heat more than two pieces of equipment at once. If more than two pieces are used, the third must be attached to a plug from another circuit; otherwise fuses may be blown out. Oftentimes the lights of a room and the floor plug in the same room are on a different circuit. This makes it possible to use two and three pieces of equipment if the table is lighted by candles.

There are several other ways of adjusting this condition, but it is advisable to have an electrician look over the wiring and fuses if you contemplate using more than two attachments on any one circuit. If stronger fuses are used, it may be necessary to have heavier wiring put in; otherwise the fuse may not act as a safety device between your house and fire.

THE following menu may be suggestive to those who wish the first experiment with this pleasant kind of service to be simple:

Grapefruit Cocktail, mint-flavored and garnished with crystallized mint leaves
Club Sandwiches
Ice-Cream with Crushed Peanut Brittle
Small Cakes or Wafers Coffee

A club sandwich, combining as it does a variety of foods, is almost by itself a well-balanced meal if its ingredients are thoughtfully selected. Club sandwiches, preceded by some concoction of fruit, accompanied by ice-cream with crushed peanut brittle, with a bit of cake thrown in, and a cup of fragrant coffee make a luncheon or a supper that will satisfy the most ravenous appetite or delight the fastidious nibbler. Though the contents of a club sandwich may vary at the will of its composer, there are certain combinations which are especially pleasing to the majority of consumers. For this menu a sandwich consisting of toast, lettuce, tomatoes, onion, cream cheese, sweet pickles, bacon and mayonnaise has been selected. Cold sliced chicken is a welcome addition.

WHILE one member of the party is setting the table, others may prepare the food. The lettuce should be washed, then wrapped in a linen towel until ready to be served. After removing the skins, cut the tomatoes in slices about one-quarter of an inch wide and arrange them in a bowl, together with the lettuce leaves, thin slices of Bermuda or Spanish onion, cubes of cream cheese and slices of sweet pickles. The butter for the toast will spread more easily and much more quickly if it is creamed. When the sliced bacon has been placed on a grill, the bread cut for toast and the mayonnaise placed in a bowl, the preliminary preparations for the club sandwiches are complete. The coffee may then be measured and put into the percolator, ready to be "perked" when the time arrives.

Boil the eggs, perk the coffee, toast the rolls—everything quickly made right at the table and piping hot for a comfy breakfast!

The peanut brittle should be crushed or ground into fine particles, ready to be sprinkled over the ice-cream just before serving. Meanwhile the table has been set.

If this menu is served in the evening, candles will also add charm to the setting, and are practical as well as esthetic, for the electric equipment may be consuming the full amount of power and no burned-out fuses must mar festivities.

The percolator, cups and saucers, cream and sugar may be conveniently placed on the tea-wagon or service-table near one of the guests who will serve the coffee. The process of frying the bacon should be started as soon as the fruit is eaten and a few moments before the toast is begun. At first glance the thought may arise, "Will not the bacon make a lot of odor?" Of course it will—the most tempting, appetizing, hunger-stimulating odor imaginable. Place the food on the table so that when it is passed the sandwich is logically built up. First a piece of toast, then lettuce, tomato, mayonnaise and onion, followed by bacon, lettuce, mayonnaise and toast again.

As soon as each one has buttered her toast, the plate of lettuce and tomatoes should be passed. The guest places a leaf of lettuce on her toast, then two or three slices of tomato. Then the mayonnaise is passed and spread over the lettuce and tomato. The onion and bacon follow and are placed on top of each other. If chicken is used, a thin slice or two of light meat is now added. Then another leaf of lettuce and a little mayonnaise are added before the roof of this delectable edifice is put on. The cheese and pickles are then passed and placed at one side of the plate.

Thin slices of veal or of roast pork may be used in place of chicken. Slices of lean ham may be used instead of either, and the bacon may then be omitted.

Other suggestive menus (unfamiliar recipes are given at the end of this article):

BREAKFAST MENU

Orange-Juice
Soft-Boiled Eggs, prepared in the egg-cooker
Rolls, split and toasted on the toaster
Grape Conserve
Coffee, made in the percolator

Softly glowing candles are beautiful and practical too. Don't make too great demands on the current, and when several electric devices are connected at the same time, avoid blowing the fuse by using candles

LUNCHEON OR SUPPER MENUS

Cream Oyster Stew, made in the chafing-dish
Ginger Waldorf Salad, with Cheese-Sticks, toasted in toaster or grill
Glorified Rice with Raspberry Jam
Coffee, made in the percolator

Lobster Newburg, made in the chafing-dish
Crisp Sallines or Toast, toasted on the toaster
Endive Salad with French Dressing
Fruit Compote with Gingersnaps
Coffee, made in the percolator

RECIPES

GRAPEFRUIT COCKTAIL WITH CRYSTALLIZED MINT LEAVES

Mint-Sirup

- 1 cup granulated sugar
- 4 tablespoons water
- 2 or more drops of extract of peppermint

The drops must be added with care to secure just the strength desired, and no more.

Boil the sugar and water until it forms a thread (230 to 236 degrees Fahrenheit) when dropped from spoon. When cold, add extract of peppermint.

Crystallized Mint Leaves

- 1 cup granulated sugar
- 4 tablespoons water
- ½ cup mint leaves

Wash and remove mint leaves from stem. Boil sugar and water until a heavy sirup is made—that is, until a hard ball is formed (254 to 260 degrees Fahrenheit). Dip each leaf separately into the sirup, then roll in granulated sugar. Dry on waxed paper.

Remove the skin from each section of grapefruit. Cut the fruit into small pieces and marinate in mint-sirup. Chill and garnish with crystallized mint leaves.

GINGER WALDORF SALAD

- 1 cup diced tart apple
- 1 cup diced celery
- ½ cup broken walnut-meats
- ¼ cup French dressing
- ½ cup mayonnaise
- Garlic dressing
- ¼ cup candied ginger cut in slender shreds

Fold together the apple, celery, nuts and ginger. Marinate with French dressing. Serve on lettuce leaves with mayonnaise dressing into which have been sliced two garlic beans. Do not allow this to stand long before serving, as the nuts will discolor it.

CHEESE-STICKS

- ½ to 1 cup grated Parmesan cheese
- 6 slices day-old bread
- ½ cup melted butter

Slice bread one-half inch thick. Dip in melted butter, then in grated Parmesan cheese. Toast on both sides in pan of grill. Have ready a plate with a paper napkin. Place sticks on napkin to drain slightly.

GLORIFIED RICE

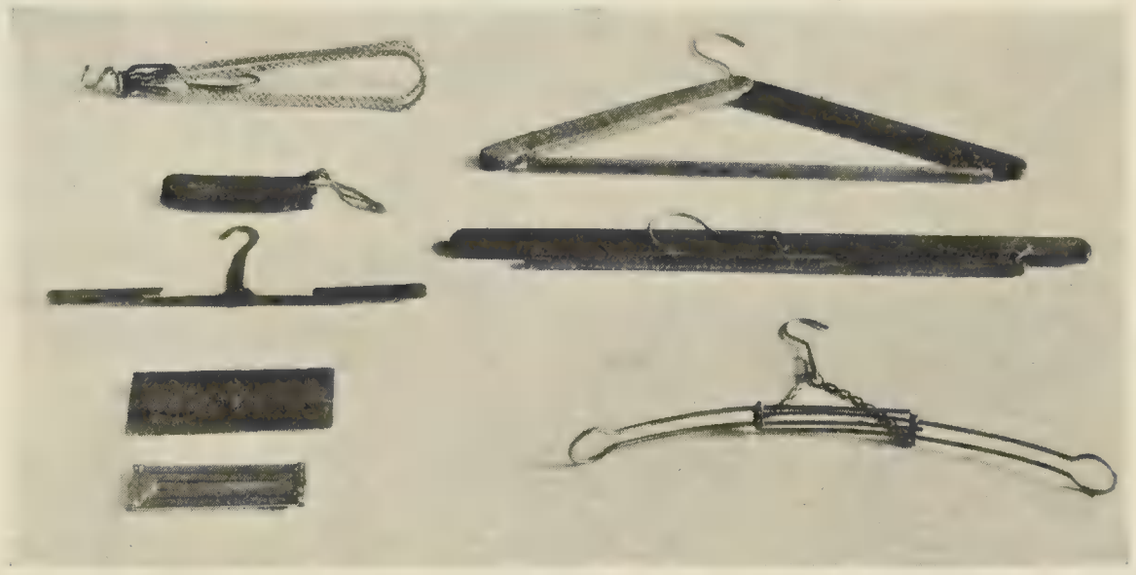
- 2 cups boiled rice
- 1 cup whipping cream
- ¼ teaspoon vanilla
- Pinch salt
- Raspberry jam

Whip the cream and to it add the vanilla and salt. Just before serving toss rice lightly into cream mixture. Add teaspoon of raspberry jam to each serving.

LOBSTER NEWBURG

- 3 tablespoons butter
- 1 cup mushrooms
- 2 egg-yolks
- 4 tablespoons flour
- 1 pint milk
- 1½ cups lobster-meat, shrimps, or each may be combined with oysters

Place the butter in the blazer and add sliced mushrooms. Cook for five minutes, add the flour and then the milk. Cook until thick and smooth. Add the lobster-meat broken in pieces about the size of an oyster. Mix egg-yolks with a little of the sauce and stir lightly into the lobster mixture. Cook only long enough to set the yolks. Lastly, season mixture to taste with lemon-juice, a dash of nutmeg, Cayenne pepper and salt.



MAKE CLOTHES CLOSETS CONVENIENT

By Beulah Blackmore

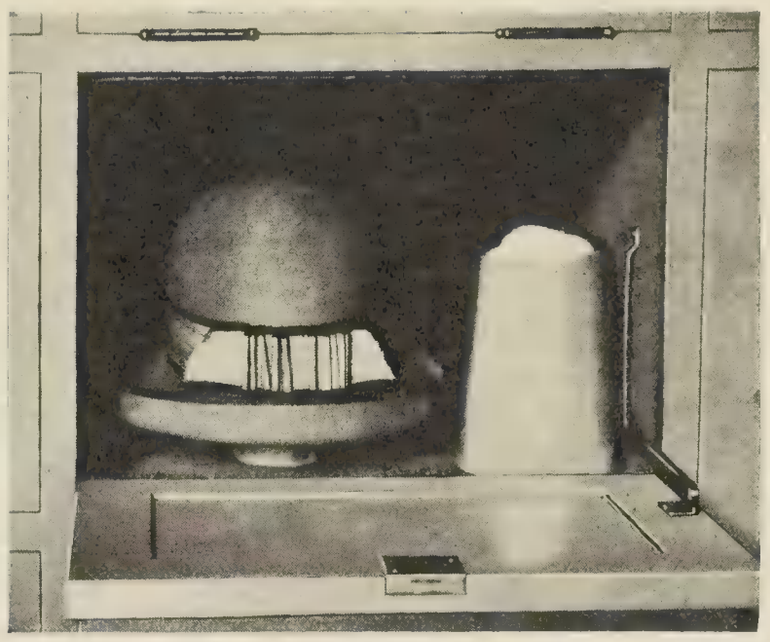
Head, Department of Clothing and Textiles, the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

Snap clothes-rods into a vertical position if space is scarce

Folding hangers, padded hangers, or simple wooden or wire ones can be used—but get them smooth and wide enough with rounded edges

Sliding rods make clothes more accessible and easily seen

Dress up your clothes-closet and increase its usefulness. A rack to keep your shoes tidy or a sliding clothes rod improves the appearance of closet and clothing. And there are many other conveniences you can install. Send two-cents for postage to the Home-Making Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and ask for our timely pamphlet, "Interesting Closet Devices."



"A PLACE for everything and everything in its place" is an old maxim dear to every housewife, yet how difficult it is without continual reminder to make all members of the family regard it.

Many busy housewives have discovered that when they can arrange convenient and very accessible nooks and closets the time-consuming occupation of "picking up" is reduced to a minimum. Also, convenient and adequate places for clothes will lengthen their period of usefulness, improve their looks while they last, save pressers' bills, and satisfy the desire for orderliness.

Blessed is the architect or builder who places a window in each clothes-closet! Fresh air and an abundance of sunlight are the natural enemies of moths and other insects.

Air and sunlight also freshen garments which have been worn. If a window has not been built in, the next best substitute in a closet is an electric light.

A closet should be as nearly dust-proof as possible. If practical, the floor should be made about two and one-half inches above the level of the adjoining room floor. In clothes-closets used by children all conveniences should be placed low enough to be within easy reach.

Low hat-stands in a hinged cupboard or dust-proof boxes keep hats in good condition

Provide a capacious bag for your shoes, shoe cloths and brushes

One of the first requirements of a convenient clothes-closet is a large number of clothes-hangers. A hanger should be very smooth with rounded edges and wide enough so that it will not make unsightly marks or impressions on a garment or catch into the thread of linings. If a garment is very heavy, or a gown very flimsy, and only worn occasionally, it is often desirable to pad the hangers with soft tissue-paper to avoid marking.

Many dresses are now hung on hangers by loops placed at the waistline. This brings the annoying difficulty of keeping the loops on the hanger. Rubber bands twisted a number of times around the ends of the hangers, making a little ridge of rubber at each end, will prevent the loops from slipping off the hanger.

For camp use or if there is a temporary shortage of hangers, a satisfactory substitute may be made by twisting a roll of newspaper tightly, bending the roll slightly, and suspending it by a string. A portion of a barrel-hoop covered with paper may also be used.

A small number of skirt and trousers hangers should also be provided, as it is inadvisable to hang skirts or trousers on the ordinary dress-hanger.

Garments should not be placed one on top of the other. The most practical contrivance for hanging garments which are on hangers is a pole placed lengthwise or crosswise in a closet at a height to accommodate a full-length dress. A broomstick, a curtain-pole or a brass rod may be used for this. Curtain attachments may be used for attaching the pole if there are no cleats on which to rest it.

For the closet which is very narrow and deep small sliding rods such as are used in clothing stores may be installed. There are also several patented devices on the market for hanging a number of garments in a very small space. Hooks of various kinds and lengths may be secured, but these are usually uneconomical of space. For the hanging of sweaters old embroidery-hoops may be suspended by a string from a hook. Garments not often used should be covered with an easily arranged garment-bag.

The most simple arrangement to care for shoes is a shelf nine inches wide, placed about twelve inches from the floor. This allows space for cleaning under the shelf and places the shoes at a convenient height away from the dust.

If such a shoe-shelf seems to occupy too much space in a narrow closet, it may be placed higher on the wall and slanted toward the floor. A narrow cleat three-fourths of an inch thick is then placed three inches from the edge of the shelf attached to the wall. The heels of the shoes are caught into this cleat and the shoes rest at an angle.

Another arrangement for the care of shoes is a shoe-case. The most convenient place to hang this case is on the inside of the closet door, and it should be tacked firmly in place.

For party or delicate shoes, bags which draw up at the top may be used. Shoes so cared for are always ready for packing into dress-suit case or trunk. There are also several patented metal devices for holding shoes, such as narrow metal cleats or racks attached to wall or door.

Shoe-trees are of course practically indispensable for keeping shoes in shape. One may secure various kinds. Some come in pairs, others are single, simple ones to hold the shoe in shape. Those which, besides holding the shoe in shape, are provided with a hook to hang the shoe are convenient in some closets. A shoe-tree should never force the shoe out of shape.

Closed shelves, like cupboards, or shelves with drop doors are a great convenience for hats, but a closet must be unusually large to accommodate this type of shelf, as the swinging or dropping of the door will take considerable space.

If open shelves are used, they should be about fourteen inches wide to hold a hat-box. Shelves much wider than this are likely to become cluttered with unused articles and make one hesitate to investigate their depths for cleaning and airing; thus they become breeding-places for moths. If several shelves are needed and one is placed above the others, they should be graduated in width, the highest shelf being the narrowest. All boxes and packages placed on a shelf should be labeled on the end in view unless the contents are perfectly obvious.

If it is not desirable to keep hats in a box, then light-weight bags of large dimensions may be made to cover them. The crowns of hats should be stuffed with tissue or a cone of stiff paper used to keep the hat from resting on the brim. Every closet should be equipped with one or two low hat-stands.

A full-length mirror or a small mirror hung on the inside of the closet door is very conducive to the profitable study of the angle at which the hat should be worn.

Drawers in large closets are a great boon for tucking away small folded articles, though shelves may be substituted for drawers. While articles are more easily found if placed on shelves, they may also become dusty. If drawers are to be used for woolen articles, it is desirable to have them cedar-lined and made moth and dust proof. If drawers are used for storage in a closet in an unfrequented part of the house or in a house used only during certain seasons, they should also be made animal-proof by strips of tin tacked along all joinings.

Above all else, closets should be sufficiently lighted, conveniently arranged and have every part easily accessible. For probably there is no other thing in the house that expresses the standards of cleanliness of a person better than the arrangement and care of these hidden corners.

One hook up and one down, the lower for an extra skirt or two

"As a young mother, having given birth to eight children within nine years, complications setting in and my nerves badly shattered, I was fast losing my vitality. I tried eating Fleischmann's Yeast. I soon developed a fondness for it, and my health started to improve wonderfully. For clearing the complexion there is nothing like it. Within eight months I felt as if I could do the work of a longshoreman. It certainly did restore energy to my wasted body."

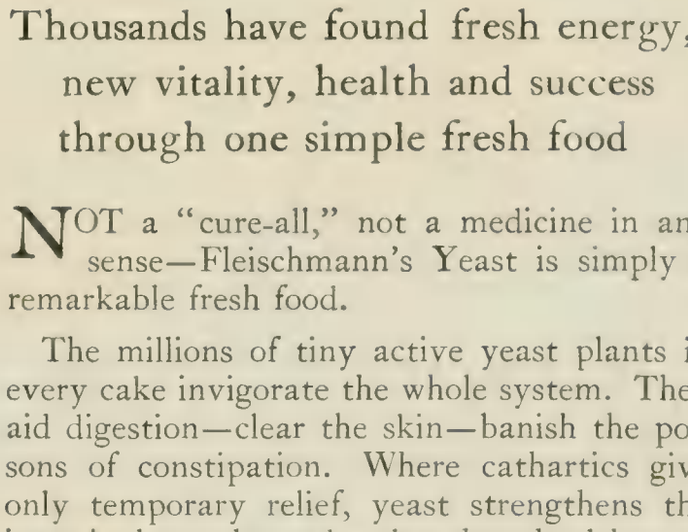
Mrs. Florence Murray, New York

"I had such severe indigestion that I could eat almost nothing—often could not sleep at night at all. I had tried every sort of remedy without real relief. I decided to try Fleischmann's Yeast; I ate it for two months. Today my digestion is absolutely normal; my appetite has returned—in a word, my health is perfect again. I owe all this to Fleischmann's Yeast, and I cannot praise it enough."

Miss E. Lapointe, Montreal, Quebec, Canada

"Two years ago I found myself very unfit physically. I was fagged and nervous, fearful of chronic ill-health. I tried Fleischmann's Yeast. Amazing! It has entirely eliminated that weak, fagged condition; made me feel and look wonderfully fit. I am now adding Yeast to the diet of my small son. He was so under-nourished looking, and ordinary tonics did him no good. He is responding beautifully—his skin and eyes are clear, appetite fine, and he is fast losing his emaciated appearance." Mrs. Virgil Hart, Cross Plains, Texas

Only Half-Living?

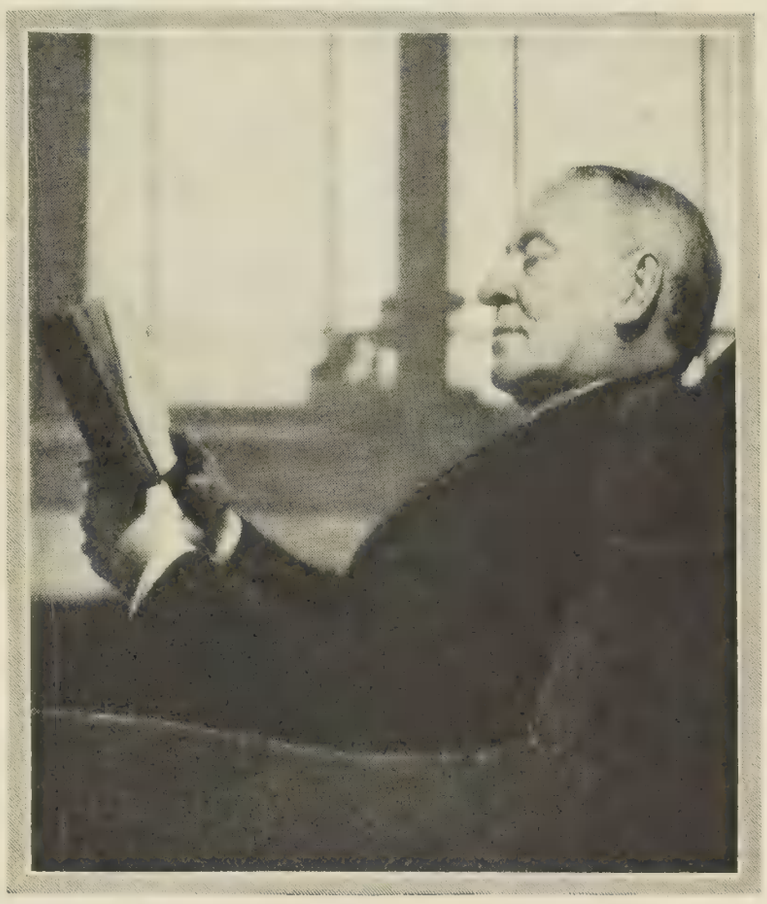


Thousands have found fresh energy, new vitality, health and success through one simple fresh food

NOT a "cure-all," not a medicine in any sense—Fleischmann's Yeast is simply a remarkable fresh food.

The millions of tiny active yeast plants in every cake invigorate the whole system. They aid digestion—clear the skin—banish the poisons of constipation. Where cathartics give only temporary relief, yeast strengthens the intestinal muscles and makes them healthy and active. And day by day it releases new stores of energy.

Eat two or three cakes regularly every day before meals: on crackers—in fruit juices or milk—or just plain. For constipation especially, dissolve one cake in hot water (not scalding) before breakfast and at bedtime. Buy several cakes at a time—they will keep fresh in a cool dry place for two or three days. All grocers have Fleischmann's Yeast. Start eating it today!



And let us send you a free copy of our latest booklet on Yeast for Health. Health Research Dept. C-20, The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington Street, New York.

This famous food tones up the entire system—banishes constipation, skin troubles, stomach disorders. Start eating it today!

"A severe airplane crash while serving as Flying Instructor during the war resulted in derangement of internal organs. My health failed rapidly for two years. Extreme gas pains, boils and other effects of aggravated auto-intoxication combined to make existence a thing of almost constant pain. Malnutrition helped lower my vitality. My wife started me on 2 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast daily. Within a week natural functions were normally resumed. Immediately I gained strength. Rest became possible and proper nourishment. Thanks to Fleischmann's Yeast, today I am in normal rugged health." Rex V. Bixby, Culver City, Cal.

"I am a minister. Under the pressing duties of a heavy Pastorate, in 1924, I began to go down hill. I was threatened with a complete breakdown. One morning a brother minister strongly urged me to try Fleischmann's Yeast. I sceptically consented. I did not notice any change for ten days, but one morning I awakened to find that my constipation was not so bad as formerly; after 16 days it had disappeared entirely. My nervousness and irritability were fast leaving me. I kept on . . . I was able once again to take up my pastoral duties." The Rev. Duncan P. Cameron, Detroit, Minn.

Grandma's Cookies

HOW little eyes light up at the sight of Grandma's cookies! Fully fifty years ago Grandma perfected her art of cookie-making with Pillsbury's Best Flour and they've been firm friends ever since. From the experience of hundreds of baking days Grandma has learned Pillsbury's Best is always uniform and dependable. And she uses it for all her baking—for bread and cakes, pies and cookies.

MENUS FOR SEPTEMBER

By Jessie A. Boys

These menus were planned to provide correct nutritional values within the means of an average household budget. They were edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics, at Cornell University

DON'T CALL—INVITE!

Make your family your guests at meals. Every summons to the table can be an invitation instead of the old call to the too-familiar menu. Introduce them to the deliciousness of baked apple roly-poly, stuffed turban squash, eggplant and tomato casserole, peach shortcake and the rest of the dishes we have starred. We'll be glad to send you the recipes. Just write to the Homemaking Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and ask us to send you the "September Dozen." But enclose a two-cent stamp for postage

THESE days of "taking thought" for the Winter are busy days indeed, and any expedient that will contribute to ease or speed of accomplishment is to be given consideration. Unusual devices for saving time are suggested as follows:

The dry ingredients for baking-powder biscuit or corn bread may be mixed and sifted and even the shortening mixed in and then put into a closely covered container, labeled with the amount of wet ingredients needed and stored in a cold place.

Butter, flour and the requisite seasonings may be melted together, cooled and made into balls of uniform size. One tablespoon of butter when melted will take up two tablespoons of flour, and when cooled will measure a slightly rounded tablespoon. It is an easy matter to take even half a ball from the ice-box, and in a jiffy the sauce is made or other ingredients thickened.

She who prizes beauty must obey Nature's law!

How MANY of you who envy the perennial beauty of some favorite of the stage know the simple secret of her perpetual loveliness?

No life is more arduous than hers, no environment more trying to the complexion. Still she comes before the footlights year after year, young and radiant because she has not transgressed Nature's simplest law.

Faulty elimination is the greatest enemy that beauty knows. It plays havoc with the complexion; brings sallow skin, dull and listless eyes.

When intestines fail to function normally, when they become clogged with digestive waste, poisons generate and spread throughout the system, destroying health and beauty, paving the way for sickness and disease.

Harsh drugs and laxatives should seldom be taken except at doctors' orders. They bring only temporary relief and make matters much worse later. How much wiser it is to prevent faulty elimination and establish regular habits by eating the proper food.

Bran is a bulk food which your own physician has recommended highly. Perhaps you have tried to eat ordinary bran and found it dry and tasteless.

But there is a bran that's really good to eat

Post's Bran Flakes is bran in its most delicious form. You can eat it every day and enjoy it. Served with milk or cream it is a splendid breakfast cereal. It makes the lightest muffins and the most tempting bran bread.

If eaten regularly Post's Bran Flakes will correct faulty elimination and establish regular habits. It provides the intestines with the bulk they need to function normally and at the same time brings to the body such vital food essentials as phosphorus and iron, proteins, carbohydrates and the essential Vitamin B.

Post's Bran Flakes is the best-liked bran. More of it is sold than any other kind. Millions eat it every day as an "Ounce of Prevention". Try it. Now you'll like bran.

ESMOND

BLANKETS

A NEW THOUGHT IN BLANKETS

Think a minute—how clean can you wash a blanket?

You can wash an Esmond Blanket as clean as your sheets! And as often as you wish. Esmond Blankets are scientifically made of the right material—selected curly cotton—for hygienic cleanliness. They are made the modern way—the Esmond way—"2-in-1," double weave and double warmth in single length, warmth without weight.

Esmond Blankets are moth-proof and fade-proof. They are clean and soft, made in color combinations and patterns to fit any scheme of room decoration. They are economically priced from $4.00 to $7.00 for you and $1.00 to $4.00 for Baby. Think that over and examine an Esmond Blanket at your favorite store. Have blankets for Baby and yourself that are clean and can be kept clean.

Through the centuries it has been proven that the double walled house is the only warm house—that an air space is necessary between the outer wall and the inner wall to retain the warmth in the house and keep the cold out. All good houses are insulated with an air space between the outer and inner walls. This is also the Esmond process of Blanket manufacture.

Send 10c for Esmond Doll Blanket. It will please your children and show what Esmond Quality is. The story of Bunny Esmond for children, free on request.

Esmond Blankets are woven two-in-one—two walls with an air space between.

Esmond Blankets are single blankets with the warmth of a pair. In the Esmond process, only one side of the yarn is fuzzed which makes the Esmond stronger, besides warmer, than a blanket made in the ordinary way with only one strand fuzzed on both sides. All Esmond Blankets have the air space between—it is the Esmond process.

SAVE DOLLARS AND HOURS

Hints from successful housewives

If you have discovered some clever little way to save time or labor or fuel or food or anything else connected with housekeeping, tell us about it—and if we can use it in these columns we will pay you five dollars for it. Write on only one side of the paper and address your letter to The "Savers" Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. (If you wish to have your suggestion returned in case we can not use it, please enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope)

SAVE SMALL CONTAINERS FOR CHILDREN'S LUNCH-BOX

I find the little screw-top jars that come filled with salad dressings, cold-creams and sandwich fillings are very useful for the children's lunch-boxes. They may be utilized for jelly, preserves, custards and other foods used in small quantities.—MRS. C. M. G., Columbia, Miss.

SAVE ON GIFTS FOR SHUT-INS

Glass jam containers may be colored by the simple bronze-paint method. One done in marigold yellow with a touch of black at the top would be attractive; another in larkspur blue with burnt orange at top and bottom. Fill with dates dressed with ground raisins and nuts dipped in chocolate.

Gather dainty grasses and paint in brilliant hues to give cheer after the sweets are gone.

Save your grape baskets and cover with plain red crêpe paper. In each basket put one steamed pudding in aluminum cup, pressed veal, a cluster of raisins, sweet red apples, oranges, and graham fig cookies.

For children in the charity hospitals fill the baskets with healthful edibles (including fruits), tiny dolls, tops and balls.

A year's collection of LITTLE DELINEATORS, with scissors, an unbleached-muslin booklet and paste, will entertain a small shut-in, while the adult DELINEATOR may be passed along to some grown-up who could not otherwise possess it.—MRS. M. C. MCK., Logan, Utah.

You need not throw away empty jelly and cold-cream jars. They make ideal containers for the children's lunch-box

SAVE THE LIFE OF FLOWERS

The life of cut flowers, particularly of roses, may be greatly increased if a damp oiled paper is put over them at night. Cover the flowers with the oiled paper, tying the sides of the paper to the top of the vase.—J. W. M., Detroit, Mich.

SAVE SEARCHING FOR RECORDS

My small children will spend hours playing the talking-machine, but formerly they took much of my time running to me with a record to ask me what it was. Recently I hit upon the plan of pasting an appropriate picture on each record. They quickly learned to identify the records by the pictures and no longer ask any help in finding what they want.—MRS. C. P. K., Bristol, Va.

SAVE LAUNDERING PILLOW COVERS

The toy box in the nursery was first painted, then covered with cretonne, but the paint was soon marred and the cretonne quickly soiled. Next I bought a very soft flexible black oilcloth and covered the box; then I padded an old blanket and covered that with the oilcloth. Only a moment is required to wash it and it is quickly fresh and clean. Nursery pillows were covered with the same material in different colors. The oilcloth can not be stitched on the machine. I use long-and-short stitches with wool, fastening the oilcloth on the pillow in this fashion, leaving a border with a raw edge about two inches wide.—MRS. E. A. G., New York.

SAVE TIME IN CARING FOR BIRD

Instead of cutting a paper for the bird cage each morning, cut six or eight papers, place them in the bird cage and each morning remove the top one.—MRS. A. D. W., Dallas, Tex.

SAVE THE SILENCE-CLOTH

When the children first begin to eat at the table there are bound to be accidents when the milk or other food is overturned. To protect the asbestos mat or silence-cloth I bought white oilcloth just large enough to cover the table and placed it over the mat and under the table-cloth.—MRS. H. A. H., Portsmouth, Va.

SAVE LOST RUBBERS

After her small son had returned several times from school with one rubber of his own and one belonging to some other child, one mother solved the problem by providing her youngster with one of the spring clothes-pins, on which his name was plainly printed. Thereafter when the rubbers were removed at school they were fastened together safely. Other mothers soon followed suit and order reigned among the rubbers of this school.—MRS. E. E. D., Lincoln, Neb.

SAVE TIME IN PREPARING CITRUS FRUITS FOR SALAD

In making fruit salad or cocktail one often wishes to remove the sections of the orange or grapefruit in whole pieces from the white membrane to which it is attached. If the following procedure is used much time and labor will be saved, and the sections may be easily removed without being broken up into small pieces. Cut the skin of the fruit lengthwise and crosswise so that the skin is divided into quarters. It can very readily be peeled off. Place the peeled fruit in a pitcher or pan of cold water and let it stand in the ice-box for at least two hours. The white membrane will peel from the sections of the fruit very readily and it will be found that the fruit will not break easily.—MRS. A. F. F. J., Reedsburg, Wis.

SAVE BUYING RUGS

Very pretty and durable rugs may be made from old chenille curtains and rope draperies. Ravel out the chenille and wind it into balls, then crochet it into round, oval or oblong rugs with a wooden hook.—MRS. G. E. H., Cory, Pa.

Protect your gums and save your teeth

Just as a ship needs the closest attention under the water-line, so do the teeth under the gum-line. If the gums shrink, serious dangers result.

The teeth are loosened. They are exposed to tooth-base decay. The gums themselves become tender and bleed easily. They form sacs which become the doorways of organic disease for the whole system. They often disfigure the mouth as they recede.

Prevent Pyorrhea with Forhan's

If used in time and used consistently, Forhan's will prevent or check Pyorrhea's progress. Forhan's is safe, efficient and pleasant-tasting. It preserves gum health and corrects tender gum spots, hardens gum tissues so they will offer proper support to the teeth, and keeps your mouth fresh and healthy.

If gum-shrinkage has already set in, start using Forhan's twice a day and consult your dentist immediately for special treatment.

Forhan's is more than a tooth paste; it checks Pyorrhea. Thousands have found it beneficial for years. For your own sake ask for Forhan's For the Gums. All druggists, 35c and 60c in tubes.

REENFORCEMENTS!

Wherever you go on your vacation, air and exercise are sure to whet your appetite. For the between-meals nibble, or if the food served where you are staying is not well balanced, take a few jars of reenforcements. With these and the recipes we'll send, you can whisk together delightful breakfasts and suppers or satisfying picnic luncheons

Write to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York City, enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage, and our leaflet "Vacation Eating" will be mailed promptly

A SUCCESSFUL vacation returns the vacationer to the business of life with a new point of view toward the job, whether it be home-making or banking. It leaves us eager to begin over again to try for the inner reward that only work well done can give and builds us up against the ravages of the year's work.

First, our vacations should include sunshine, all of it we can possibly press into the allotted time, storing up the sun's radiant energy in our bodies. If our years are spent in one of those sections of the country covered by the goiter belt, we should look for iodin as well as sunshine. This search will lead us to the seashore, and we can bathe in the salt water, breathe in the salt air, and eat all we can of the iodin-bearing sea food.

Second, we should exercise out of doors. Exercise is a very necessary part of a real vacation, and its effects are far-reaching. The sun-kissed vacationer, with a replenished supply of more actively circulating red blood in his veins, is going to find zest in Winter's work as well as Summer's play.

Third, let us allow time in each twenty-four hours for eight hours' sleep or rest. How much better if this might be spent on an out-of-doors porch! At least, in planning the vacation, let us try to get a room which gives the maximum of air. A tent has values for vacations that no room can ever possess.

Fourth, we should have well-chosen food each day, though this I recognize as very often the greatest difficulty of all. Our daily food on vacation should contain:

1. A pint of milk for each adult and a quart for each child. It may be on cereals, made into bread, eaten in custards or sauces or soups or chowders, but it should be there.

2. One fresh green vegetable, just as soon after it is picked from the garden as it is possible to get it, though this is not easy. Canned vegetables should be left for Winter use. Now is the time for fresh greens.

3. Another fresh vegetable besides potatoes. This may be carrots or radishes or celery or lettuce or beets or corn.

4. An egg each day. This, together with the sunshine, will aid in our re-creation.

5. Fruit twice a day. Oranges are always easy to ship in and the much-talked-of prune is a blessing.

6. All the other food which we need to satisfy healthy appetites created by sun baths, fresh air, exercise and free spirits.

7. From six to eight glasses of water a day. One reason why many vacations fail to give the needed refreshment is that constipation is sometimes brought about by any slight change. Drink plenty of water, eat plenty of fruits and vegetables, and, if possible, whole-wheat bread.

If the plan we have chosen does not give us the right food, with a little added time and money we can reenforce a poor dietary so that it becomes a satisfactory one. A jar of mayonnaise, a jar of peanut butter, a jar of cheese, a small can of milk, a jar of tart preserves or jelly to be kept on the shelf will help; a pat of butter, a loaf of bread or a box of crackers, a head of lettuce, a small cabbage, an onion, a tomato, a lemon, each can be bought as needed.

HERE is the type of meals which we should have each day on vacation:

Breakfast—Fresh fruit in season, an egg, bread, butter, a beverage. This breakfast may also contain a breakfast food, marmalade and bacon.

Lunch or supper—A simple meat dish or meat substitute, such as omelet, macaroni and cheese, or fish chowder; a salad of fresh lettuce and vegetables or fruits; a glass of milk or a cup of cocoa; an abundance of good bread and butter; jelly or other preserves; a simple dessert, with the opportunity to choose fruit if preferred.

Dinner—Meat; a liberal serving of a fresh vegetable, such as carrots, turnips, beets, spinach, beans, peas; potatoes; bread and butter; a dessert, with the opportunity to substitute fruit or crackers and cheese if preferred; opportunity to choose milk in place of another beverage. If fresh milk is not available, our desserts should be largely milk desserts, made from preserved milk. We should drink cocoa freely, and have an opportunity to drink coffee with half hot milk, the hot milk to be a diluted or reconstructed form of preserved milk.

If you are to be fortunate enough to have the fun of preparing your own meals during your vacation period, then follow the general rules for what you should eat daily; and if you are remote from sources of fresh supplies, learn the resources of the nearest market, have lettuce, onions, cabbage and oranges shipped to you by the crate, carrots, beets, turnips by the basket, tomatoes by the hamper. You can depend very satisfactorily upon various forms of preserved milk to meet all your needs and to incorporate into foods.

ASK US

Ask us anything you want to know about housekeeping and we will answer it personally. From our recent correspondence we publish the following questions and answers as being of general interest to all home-makers

QUESTION—Should clothes be soaked in plain water or in suds? Should the water be hot or cold?

Answer—Clothes should be soaked in slightly soapy, tepid water. Unless the soap itself contains something like kerosene or turpentine, a teaspoonful of either added to the water in which clothes are soaked helps to loosen the dirt. After clothes have soaked, they should first be washed clean in tepid water. Very hot water may set any stains which have been overlooked. It also has the drawback of tightening the pores of the fabric and keeping the dirt from falling out. After clothes are clean, they may be washed in hot water or boiled.

Question—Will you give me a few suggestions for decorating salads?

Answer—Fruit salads may be decorated with slices of maraschino cherries, either red or green, cut very thin or finely minced or with candied fruits treated in the same way. Sliced English walnuts give an attractive garnish. If the salad is not to stand long after it is made, finely-chopped mint sprinkled lightly over salads gives beauty and flavor.

Vegetables and meat salads may be decorated with peppers, both red and green, minced, cut in strips or rounds or other shapes. Hard-cooked eggs, sliced or with yolk and white sifted separately, may be used to give an unusual touch of both color and design.

Question—Is it necessary to give orange-juice to my children in the Summer? Oranges are hard to get here at this time of the year.

Answer—This is the golden time to use tomatoes to replace orange-juice in the diet, even for very tiny babies.

As Mrs Livingston Fairbank of Chicago sees it

"Today women are better groomed, just as they are healthier and more efficient than ever before. Their skins, particularly, are kept clear, fresh, youthful. Pond's two delightful Creams are responsible for thousands of lovely complexions."

Miriam Fairbank.

MRS. Livingston Fairbank, whose hair and eyes are of that lovely golden brown the French call châtaigne, and whose fresh complexion has the tone and quality of a girl's, is an outstanding social leader in the second largest city in America.

One may always recognize her winsome smile in her box at the Chicago Opera. One sees her at the Twelfth-night Balls which mark the height of the social season. And her Sunday evening musicales, at which one meets and hears a distinguished company of artists and musicians, mingling with the music-lovers of Society, are occasions of rare delight.

Mrs. Fairbank had just returned from Palm Beach when I encountered her on the Boulevard one March morning.

"How could you leave blue sea and oleanders for this—dust, soot and gales?" I asked her, gesturing at the atmosphere. "They're disastrous to one's skin. And the water, too, which seems to get harder every day. But you seem to thrive on it all!" I added. "You're like a Dorothy Perkins rose this morning. Did Palm Beach teach you a new secret?"

"No," laughed Mrs. Fairbank. "I didn't need to go to Palm Beach to learn how to care for my skin. When you've lived in Chicago as long as I you'll know you can have a perfectly good complexion—even a lovely one—right here, in spite of unfriendly elements."

"What do you do," I begged her, "to keep so unblemished in the midst of soot and dust?"

"I JUST use Pond's Two Creams," answered Mrs. Fairbank, "the very same two that I found so many of my friends were using and that are responsible for thousands of lovely complexions everywhere. A simple method—requiring only a few moments each day. The busiest women use it." And then she told me how:—Every day and more frequently than once if you have been out a great deal, cleanse your face, neck, throat, arms and hands with Pond's Cold Cream. Let it stay on a few moments. Remove every vestige with a soft cloth which reveals how much dirt the pure oils of this delicate cream have brought from the depths of your pores. Do it all over again. Now close the pores with a dash of cold water or a light massage with ice.

If your skin is dry, use more Pond's Cold Cream after cleansing, before retiring, and leave it on all night. Your skin will be softened, yet toned to elasticity, too. And how white and soft your hands! If your skin is oily, paradoxical as it may seem, Pond's Cold Cream, used lavishly and wiped off, will free the pores from all accumulated oils, as only such a light cream can do.

THE complementary step in the Pond's Method of skin care, is to smooth over the skin of your face, throat and hands, now cleansed and revivified, a gossamer of Pond's Vanishing Cream which vanishes instantly. It gives your skin a soft even-toned finish, a new lustre. It protects it—denying the power of wind and sun to coarsen and burn, of city soot and dust to scratch and mar the fineness of its texture. And it keeps the soft whiteness of your hands!

Now, too, your powder and rouge go on with a smoothness and blend with a natural charm that leaves no further need to worry about a shiny nose, or that blotchy, artificial look. So always use it before powdering and before going out.

Try Pond's for yourself. The unfailing results which have commended this method to Mrs. Fairbank and the loveliest, most perfectly groomed Society leaders everywhere, will also endear these Creams to you.

WHEN THE MILK TURNS SOUR

By Jessie A. Boys

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

The more acid the more soda. For slightly sour milk add one-fourth of a teaspoon for each cup. If it's quite sour, make it half a teaspoon or just the heat of Summer—and before you can drink it, the milk has turned sour. It can still be used in cooking though, as this article shows you

A SUDDEN THUNDER-STORM

Or try making it into cottage-cheese, which is delicious and healthful and is an increasingly popular food. We can send you directions for making cottage-cheese and recipes for some new and appetizing dishes

Write to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, and ask for "The Uses of Cottage-Cheese." Please don't forget to enclose a two-cent stamp for postage

THOSE accustomed to using sour milk and sour cream in cooking claim that the products are more tender and have a better flavor than when sweet milk and cream are used. This is true to a great extent. They also claim that it is just as easy to substitute sour milk for sweet milk in any recipe. This is not quite so true, but when one knows just how and is willing to experiment it is fairly simple.

The amount of soda varies according to how sour the milk or cream may be. If it is only slightly acid, one-fourth of a teaspoon of soda is needed for each cup. If quite acid, not more than one-half teaspoon of soda at most to each cup will be necessary. If milk and cream are very sour and old enough to have a bitter or a cheesy odor, don't use them.

It is safer and better results are obtained if the soda is stirred directly into the sour ingredient and one teaspoon of baking-powder is provided for each cup of flour and is to be sifted with it.

When sour cream is to be substituted for the fat in a cake or a quick bread, it must also take the place of the liquid as well as the fat. For example, if a cookie recipe calls for half a cup of shortening and half a cup of milk, the total of these is the measure of the cream to be used—that is, one cup of cream. Then soda is measured in proportion to this measure of cream and one teaspoon of baking-powder allowed to each cup of flour.

Another point well to keep in mind when mixing doughs and batters with soured milk is that the mixture should be stirred up somewhat thicker than is usually the case when sweet milk is used, because of the softening effect of the lactic acid of the milk upon a part of the gluten of the flour.

SOUR-CREAM CAKES

1 cup thick sour cream
⅜ teaspoon soda
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
2 cups flour
2 teaspoons baking-powder
½ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon vanilla

Stir soda into the cream until foamy; add sugar and stir until well mixed. Break eggs into mixture and beat vigorouly till smoothly combined. Mix and sift flour, baking-powder and salt, and stir gradually into the mixture. Add vanilla and beat well. Put into well-greased individual tins and bake twelve to twenty minutes in a moderate oven (380 degrees Fahrenheit).

SPICE-CAKES

To the recipe for sour-cream cakes add

½ teaspoon cinnamon
¼ teaspoon allspice
¼ teaspoon cloves

sifting these with the flour, or use half a teaspoon of cinnamon and half a teaspoon of nutmeg.

SUGAR COOKIES

1 cup sugar
1 egg
1 cup thick sour cream
½ teaspoon soda
Flour to roll (2 cups)
2 teaspoons baking-powder
½ teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon lemon extract
⅛ teaspoon nutmeg

Beat sugar and egg till foamy, then add the cream, into which has been stirred the soda. Add lemon extract. Sift the rest of the dry ingredients with the flour, and add to the first mixture. When well combined, toss half of the mixture on a floured board, roll and cut. To the trimmings add the remainder of the dough and proceed as before. After cutting, the surface of the cookies may be brushed with milk and coarse sugar sprinkled on. Bake about ten minutes in hot oven (400 degrees Fahrenheit). This amount should make three dozen thick cookies, two and one-half inches in diameter.

CHOCOLATE DROP-COOKIES

1 cup brown sugar
1 egg
1 cup thick sour cream
½ teaspoon soda
½ teaspoon salt
¾ cup nuts
1½ cups entire-wheat flour
1 teaspoon baking-powder
3 squares chocolate
¾ cup raisins

Beat the sugar and egg well, add the cream mixed with the soda. Melt the chocolate over hot water and add to this mixture. Stir well. Sift flour, baking-powder and salt. Use about one-quarter of a cup to coat the raisins and nuts, which should be cut and added after the flour has been well beaten in. Drop by the teaspoonful onto a greased sheet, and bake in a moderate oven, or at 300 degrees Fahrenheit. This mixture burns more readily than the sugar cookies and needs a lower temperature and careful watching. This recipe makes three dozen cookies.

CHOCOLATE CAKE (COCOA)

½ cup fat
1 cup sugar
1 egg
1 cup sour milk
½ teaspoon soda
½ teaspoon salt
2 cups flour
4 teaspoons cocoa
1 teaspoon cinnamon
2 teaspoons baking-powder

Cream the fat and add the sugar. Mix and beat till a foamy appearance has been obtained. Beat in the egg-yolk, then stir in the milk, which has had the soda thoroughly stirred into it. Mix and sift salt, flour, cocoa, cinnamon and baking-powder. Add to the first mixture. Fold in the beaten egg-white. Bake in a loaf-tin about forty minutes in a moderately hot oven (380 degrees Fahrenheit).

When THOMAS A. EDISON was known as "Little Al"

He accidentally splashed mud on a beautiful Paisley shawl ~ attempts to clean it failed ~ 65 years later Lux restored this treasured heirloom to loveliness

"MY Mother was out walking one day with her Mother who wore a beautiful Paisley Shawl about her shoulders.

"As they were passing a warehouse, a little boy jumped from a wagon to the sidewalk, immediately in front of them. The plank was loose and a big splash of muddy water literally covered the beautiful Paisley.

"Grandmother attempted to clean it, but such 'soaps' as she had were ineffectual.

"The little boy who soiled the shawl was then known as little Al Edison, now known as Thomas A. Edison. As near as Mother could remember, this incident occurred in 1855. In 1920 the Paisley was given a thorough Lux washing and restored to its original beauty—after 65 years!"

WHEN GEORGE AND MARY WISH TO MARRY

differ so much throughout the country that it is hardly possible to give specific help here. We know two young people who are renting a large old house on the outskirts of the town for twenty dollars a month. They spend another twenty on transportation in the shape of the upkeep of a very rattling old Ford, and it costs them on the average twelve dollars a month to heat the house. They are able actually to supplement their income by keeping chickens, sharing a cow with neighbors, planting a good garden. Two other young people of our acquaintance are paying, in a good neighborhood of this same city itself, seventy dollars for an unfurnished but heated apartment of five rooms and bath. Both couples have about the same income. It is hardly safe to allow an average of less than forty dollars a month for the rental of a modest, unheated house.

What it will cost Mary and George to operate a home.

For heat, light, water, fuel for cooking, telephone, supplies and small utensils, it is not safe to estimate less than twelve to fifteen dollars a month, unless the climate is a warm one. If any laundry is to be done outside the house and even occasional service to be employed for extra cleaning, this amount will need to be increased two to five dollars a month. An additional amount will be needed to cover additions to furnishings and replacements and repairs for furniture on hand. Except in warm climates, then, the most meager allowance for operating forty dollars' worth of shelter would be in the neighborhood of fifteen dollars a month. A fair allowance would be twenty dollars a month or twenty-five dollars a month.

What Mary and George may need to spend for development.

If it has been difficult to determine what amount of money these young people need for bare living, it verges on the impossible to say what should be allowed for development. The health factor alone, which includes medical and dental service and vacation expenses, will need to vary from almost nothing a year to rather large amounts. The training and habits and tastes of these young people will have much to do with the expense and the forms of recreation they must have. Ambition to own books, to buy magazines and papers, and to pursue some educational activity, and the contribution this will make to their sum total of happiness must be considered. The extravagance of personal habits, such as smoking, candy-eating, use of cosmetics, shaves and hairdressing must all be brought to light to see how they will balance up with the income. The obligation of these two to the community in which they live which takes the form of charities and benevolences and of club dues must be scrutinized. Finally, some conclusions must be arrived at as to how much for savings must be included if they are to have any feeling of freedom in the future. With no provision for savings as such, fifteen dollars a month is a very meager allowance to cover even modestly all these items. Twenty dollars a month is a safer average and twenty-five dollars will begin to bring real relief.

What it will cost to provide for each child.

If Mary is to be protected adequately when her babies are born, it is a safe plan to have not less than a hundred and fifty to two hundred dollars saved for medical and nursing care and hospital expenses. It is safer to have a fund of three or four hundred dollars.

For added equipment in the form of bed, carriage, bath equipment and toys, seventy-five to a hundred dollars may be counted on for the first child and twenty-five to fifty for the second or third child. These amounts may be taken from the equipment budget if necessary, but that hampers the family. For food and clothing, and added cost of operating and development, two hundred and fifty to three hundred and fifty dollars a year should be added for very little children; and three hundred and fifty to four hundred and fifty dollars a year for older children. When the family has as many as three children, and perhaps with the coming of the second child, a larger house may be necessary, then fifty dollars a month rent may be needed.

How the budget will look as a whole.

To provide Mary and George with food that is safe for health and satisfying; with clothing that will keep them decent with a little style; for shelter that will give them room for development in a decent neighborhood; for operating that will keep them comfortable and clean; for development—health protection, reasonable recreation and small savings—the following amounts are a safe minimum:

	For a Month	For a Year
Food	$30.00	$360.00
Clothes	30.00	360.00
Shelter	40.00	480.00
Furnishings	5.00	60.00
Operating	20.00	240.00
Development	25.00	300.00
Total	$150.00	$1800.00

To provide for Mary and George and a child or children, the following amounts may be regarded as a safe minimum:

For maintaining Mary and George	$1800.00
For baby	250.00
Total	$2050.00

Minimum added costs of each child at time of birth:

Extra expenses to allow for birth of each child	$ 200.00
Equipment for child unless purchased from furnishing budget .25	(100.00)
Total	$225 (300)

If Mary and George have two or three children, a larger house may be needed and ten dollars a month should be added to cover that item. The minimum cost to figure for maintaining a family of two adults and three children under comfortable conditions may be estimated as follows:

	A Year
For Mary and George	$1800.00
For baby	250.00
For older child	350.00
For grown child	450.00
Added rent for extra children	60.00
Total	$2910.00

IF PROVISION is to be made for any considerable savings this amount will need to be increased. It is needless to say that hundreds of thousands of families in this country are living on smaller incomes than this. To many such families these figures may look unnecessarily large. They have faced and adjusted themselves to the sacrifices which must be made where money is too scarce to provide the amount of comfort we have defined as reasonable. Mary and George too may be willing to sacrifice much to be together and have a family.

This they must decide for themselves. If they are wise, however, and they have children, the things last to be reduced will be the items for food, shelter and health.

On the other hand, to many families this amount will look pitifully small and they will ask "would you really allow your Mary and your George to try it?" Again Mary and George must answer for themselves.

Further to aid Mary and George, a series of articles will follow this, giving the details of the cost of food, clothing, shelter, furnishings, operating and development. From these details they may learn what sacrifices will least affect family welfare.

HOLD ON TO SUMMER

Health-giving greens and fruits—you need them all year round. And you can easily preserve them yourself, now. "The Complete Canner" tells you how. It gives you the most up-to-date methods, with easily-followed directions for canning, preserving, jelly-making and pickling, together with a few good recipes

The book costs only twenty-five cents and will be sent you at once if you write the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

Now comes the hardest work of all —to sit still and study!

There's just one thing an active child can't do—sit still! "Animal spirits" accumulate under restraint and explosions almost always follow.

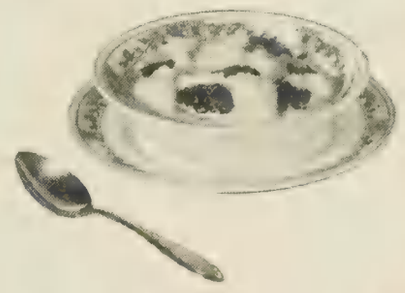
School imposes not only this forced, unnatural physical state, but hard mental effort. And the combination makes decided inroads on a child's energy.

With school comes a new, insistent need to keep an abundant energy supply constantly on tap. Every day a child's intake of energy should more than provide for his needs; thus building up a reserve fund for future and emergency use.

The great source of energy

Food, of course, is the one great source of energy. Food which is known to be high in energy value should be a major part of every child's daily diet.

But food can also be a thief of energy, if it is hard to digest. For then it imposes a tax on the stomach which consumes extra energy.



Mothers should realize the necessity of simple food, high in energy; nourishing and extremely easy to digest. They should realize the special necessity of such food for breakfast.

You can find no food which satisfies this need for energy and easy digestibility more perfectly than Cream of Wheat. For 28 years physicians and dietitians have recognized its value.

In its delicious creaminess is a wonderfully rich store of energy. And it is so easy to digest that it is regularly used for babies and convalescents whose digestion is very delicate.

Children need a hot breakfast

A good, hot energy-breakfast is the first vital need of the day for all school children. Send the children to school fortified—with a Cream of Wheat breakfast! With it you may be sure their energy supply is ample for the morning's needs. And there is no danger of burdening digestion, as foods less simple in form would do.

DISORDERS OF THE SKIN IN CHILDREN

instances does it persist beyond the first year, and it does not appear later in life.

Eczema of the scalp is sometimes called cradle-cap or milk-crust and is generally limited to the area around the soft spot on the top of the head. The oil-glands are very active in the scalp and many mothers fear to touch or cleanse the region of the soft spot, or fontanella, with the result that thick crusts or scabs appear with raw, tender skin underneath, which is very liable to become infected.

There is also a form of eczema which affects all parts of the body and is a disease or infection of the oil-glands themselves. This type is not influenced by the nutrition, food or proteins and is not apt to clear up at the end of the first year, for it is quite resistant to treatment.

Every one concerned in the treatment of eczema gets discouraged before the disease is cured. A physician who is either a specialist in children's diseases or in diseases of the skin should be seen in consultation with the family physician. A few points in the treatment of cases in general can be outlined, but individual cases may and often do require special diagnosis and treatment. If the cause can be ascertained it must be at once rectified. A very real danger in all these cases is that of infection, so that the utmost pains must be taken to have everything clean that comes in contact with the baby's skin, and to protect it from all injurious agents both internal and external. In the treatment of all forms of eczema the objects to be obtained are cleanliness and protection. This includes protection from the air. In the case of the face and scalp this can be done by the use of a mask which covers the entire affected area. The inflamed areas must be protected from scratching, rubbing and all external irritation. In the case of babies this can only be accomplished by mechanical restraint. Tie or pin the baby's hands down, using aluminum mittens or placing splints about the elbows so the arms can not be bent. One or two digs with the finger-nails will do great damage. Water is very irritating on the skin in these cases, and the crusts and scabs should be removed gently after softening with mineral oil. When a bath has to be given it will be less irritating if a small bag filled with bran is dragged around in the water for a few moments. Since the evaporation of the water on the inflamed skins is painful, the skin should rapidly be dried, not by rubbing but by gently patting with gauze or soft linen. In cases of cradle-cap a good tar-soap shampoo with plenty of lather cleanses the scalp, which after rinsing should be dried quickly and the crusts removed before the lotion or ointment prescribed by the doctor is applied. It is necessary always to remove the crusts and scabs on the face or body before any local treatment can be used effectively.

URTICARIA, or hives, is one of the commonest, most distressing and least understood of the skin disorders in early childhood. The skin in this condition shows red blotches which appear suddenly, spread over a large area, disappear and then reappear at some other portion of the body. There is intense itching, and scratching irritates it all the more and brings out more hives. The causes are many and manifold. It appears in some children when they eat eggs, in others after eating strawberries, fish, orange-juice or even chocolate. The bites of certain insects, such as mosquitoes, fleas, spiders and bedbugs, produce the same affect. Some drugs and serums will bring out an attack of hives in susceptible children.

Quite a number of babies will have very sudden and severe attacks of hives after eating an egg or drinking albumin water. This is the reason why doctors do not allow eggs in the baby's diet until it is at least one year old. The yolk of the egg does not have this effect, so the grated yolk of hard-boiled eggs is first used. The effect of the white can then be tried a little later. The treatment in these cases is the removal and avoidance of the irritating cause.

The skin of young children is very susceptible to infection from all kinds of germs. For this reason boils, pimples, etc., are very common. Soft and deep pillows are conducive to boils, as the skin thus becomes moist and the germs are planted and spread all over the head. The soft, delicate skin is easily chafed in the folds of the neck, arms and groin, and may become infected and cause much discomfort.

From all that has been said it will readily be apparent that the skin of a child should receive intelligent and watchful care, as it is most intimately concerned with its health and well-being. As the health of the skin depends on the health of the body as a whole, so disease and disorders of the skin affect the growth, nutrition and health of the child.

don't start a fight any more than they start a fashion. It's the barbers and the tailors and the modistes who dictate our fashions. I never thought of it before, but it's tradesmen that get us into fights."

This Homer combated fiercely, claiming that it was that very class which furnished the pawns in national or international struggles, led into it by those above them.

"Certainly," said Paul, "it's the swells that are hottest for fights, every time. Even we, I repeat, could be in a row here in this delightful court in no time at all."

"Please let us talk of something else," said Maria Alicia plaintively. "Talk of my macaw. Polly—Polly!"

IN HIS colored ring the baker's parrot stirred comfortably, looked down on the upraised faces, and muttered, quite clearly: "Oh, my, what a pretty girl!"

In the laughter which he had excited he joined as heartily as the guests, so heartily that he tipped from his perch and went down among the green and the lights of the flowerbed. There was a general movement to rescue him and a momentary confusion furthered by a burst of quite clear and varied profanity from the gorgeous bird. Maria Alicia lifted her hands and disowned him, but he was restored, ruffled and muttering, to his perch.

At the same time a sharp clear cry sounded, and Alla stood clasping her hand to her throat.

Paul was beside her in an instant, crying: "What is it?" She said nothing, but her pallor grew as the guests crowded about her. She tried to say that it was nothing, to excuse herself, but when Paul brought a goblet of water and she put out her hand, it was he who cried: "Alla, your sapphire! It's gone."

She said faintly: "I must have dropped it—will some one look, please?"

Paul cried roughly: "Nonsense. It has been torn away—the clasp is broken. It was there a moment ago—you spoke of it——"

They made a perfunctory search in which Paul did not join. He returned the goblet to the table, stood for a moment quiet, and then said clearly:

"Gentlemen! You all understand that Miss Resades's sapphire pendant has just been torn from her throat. You see what this means——"

There was an instant clamor of exclamations and questions, an indignant "No, by Jove, I don't see!" from young Gonzales.

It was Arkwright who stepped over to Paul and said: "Certainly we see. There is not one among us who will not agree to it."

"Agree to what?" cried Señor Gómez.

"To a search, of course." Paul's jaws snapped on the words.

On your Salivary Glands depend the Safety and Loveliness of your Teeth

How you can restore the normal alkaline flow of these glands

SALIVA should flow over your teeth to the extent of several pints daily. These alkaline fluids were intended by nature to counteract the acids that collect on your teeth from food.

But few people today have this normal salivary flow.

The salivary glands do not get sufficient stimulation from the soft, sweet foods we eat. They slow down more and more. And your teeth, unprotected, gradually decay.

The greatest modern dental authority in his latest book makes this conclusion, "A salivary stimulant should be used in order to promote and educate the activity of the salivary glands."

Pebeco increases the saliva

PEBECO contains no soap —no free alkali of any kind —no acid. Its base is the only safe salivary stimulant known. Its effect is accomplished by gently promoting the flow of your natural, alkaline saliva.

As soon as Pebeco enters your mouth the salivary glands flow more freely. You can feel the difference. Your mouth feels fresher.

With regular daily use Pebeco entirely restores the normal, protective flow of your glands. Their alkaline fluids bathe your teeth day and night and prevent the formation of bacterial placques or film. The acids of decay are neutralized as fast as they form.

FROM morning till night, as you smile and laugh and talk—people are noticing your teeth. Keep them shining and safe with Pebeco.

Every day your teeth grow cleaner and stronger.

Pebeco does its polishing carefully without using any gritty substance. It keeps your teeth beautifully white, your gums clean and soothed, your whole mouth normal and healthy.

Do not let your teeth gradually deteriorate. Learn to keep them white and safe with the tooth paste that restores the natural protective function of your salivary glands.

Send today for a ten days' trial tube of Pebeco. You will be surprised to see how white and shining your teeth can be—how fresh and wholesome your mouth will feel. Wherever you go you can be proud of your teeth, glad to smile and confident they are truly safe.

Then he saw it from her point of view

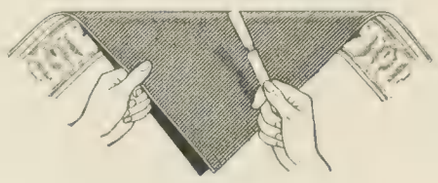
It was often a source of wonder to him, how she managed to accomplish so much. But he never knew the cost to her in effort, in time, in the freedom which a man has—and a woman wants. Until, one day, it was all made clear to him. She had found dirt in rugs which should have been clean. She had discovered that they must be beaten, regularly, frequently. (You, too, can prove this* . . .) And she realized how powerless she was, with the utensils provided her. Distressed, discouraged, she told him of her need for aids akin to those which contributed to his success. And then he saw it from her point of view! The result? A Hoover, of course. For what other electric cleaner do you know of that BEATS as it Sweeps, as it Cleans? All he paid down was $6.25. This included the remarkable Hoover dusting tools that fill every "dusting" need. The balance was distributed into easy monthly payments. You can purchase a Hoover on the same plan. See your Authorized Hoover Dealer.



The HOOVER

It BEATS . . . as it Sweeps as it Cleans

*TO PROVE RUGS NEED BEATING: Turn over a corner of a rug; with the handle of an ordinary table-knife, or something of equal weight, give the under or warp side 15 to 25 sharp taps and watch the dirt dance out from the nap depths onto a piece of paper. Feel the destructive character of this grit. This is the dirt your present cleaning methods have missed, and that beating has dislodged. Correct use of The Hoover causes this embedded dirt to be vibrated to the surface by the rapid, gentle beating of the Hoover brush, as powerful suction lifts the rug from the floor and draws all the beaten-out, swept-up dirt into the dust-tight bag.

"Bonar, are you insane? I never heard such insolence!" cried John Meyer.

"Are these your American manners?" cried young Gonzales.

"Bonar is perfectly right," cried Gómez in his great voice. "Carlos, have you no sense of what has occurred?"

"Sense!" cried Gonzales violently.

"Gentlemen, gentlemen!" Homer was struggling to make himself heard. "There is no occasion. The pendant, it is of no possible importance. My sister will not be willing——"

"It isn't only that," said Paul briefly. "Pardon, Homer, this is not your affair. You are the host. It is for us to settle."

A clear voice rose above their throaty tones.

"It is for me to settle!" cried Maria Alicia peremptorily. "Sit down, everybody. Be quiet—the salad is coming. When you are all gone, which God forbid to be soon, I will question the servants——"

"Mrs. Harden," said Paul firmly, "we are sorry——"

"It is such good salad—you force me, the hostess, to say so!"

"Please, please, Paul—" Alla was trying to say.

"Gentlemen!" Paul took command now and there was silence. "The ladies," he said, "will remain at the table. The gentlemen will come to the library and—we shall proceed as is usual in such cases."

"I shall do nothing of the sort," said John Meyer flatly.

"Diós mío! I should think not!" cried young Gonzales. "It is an outrage—an insult."

"I am ready to be searched," said Señor Gómez quietly.

"And I," said Arkwright.

"And I," said Paul. "Three against two, in any company, gentlemen."

Gonzales burst into a fury of exclamation and John Meyer shook his fist in the air. Paul and Arkwright and Gómez, moving toward the exit, shepherded these two along, violent in their protesting.

"Gentlemen," cried Homer, "I say that I have a vote in this. I vote no! No!"

"I have a vote," cried Alla's clear voice. "I vote no!"

"No, no, no!" shouted Soledad Gómez. "It is shocking, Carlos!"

"We all vote no!" cried Maria Alicia. "Sit down! My guests are maniacs. We are voting no——"

"On the contrary," said Sally Rice coolly, "I am voting yes."

"And I," said Mrs. Meyer, "vote with my husband. No. Ladies, this is outrageous."

A HIGH, piping voice broke on them from above their heads. Pedro was leaning from his balcony, his peasant's face terror-stricken.

"Gen'lemen — gen'lemen — I beg you — I pray you! Do not fight—I beg of you——"

Maria Alicia burst into high and beautiful laughter. In the same moment, young Gonzales struck out blindly at Paul, who parried and pinioned his arms. In an instant men were separating them, the women were crying out, a candelabrum was overturned——

"Gentlemen!" cried Pedro reproachfully.

"Diós mío!" cried Pedro's wife.

Two men servants entering the patio, far from being transfixed by the scene, seemed barely to notice it. They hurried to Homer and both spoke to him, said over more than once some message which they were painfully endeavoring to communicate:

"The hospital," they kept saying. "The hospital. At once, sir—at once——"

"Good God," said Homer, and shouted out terribly: "Gentlemen, for God's sake. The hospital is burning. They want every man of us. There are a hundred sick people in that place—come through the kitchen, quick—this way!"

Pedro's shrill voice rose in a wail of fear.

"One minute," shouted Arkwright above the man's cry. "What about this matter of ours?"

"You fool!" said Paul merely, and leaped toward the door.

Young Gonzales was close behind him.

They ran together down the slope, the others streaming behind. Standing at the door of the kitchen, Maria Alicia sent her clear voice after them. "Have them brought here, Homer—all of them! We'll be ready."

The six women worked with the servants. From closet and storeroom, extra cots and bedding were made ready in the upper rooms and the passages. Some one was sent after the men with sheets for stretchers. Water was set to boil. From the upper windows they could see the building, its west wing already a mass of flames. Smoke filled the house, the air outside, and the red flames reflected on the moving leaves of the pepper-trees. Down on the road they heard the clang and gallop of the village fire department, still in the era of horses.

Soon they saw them coming across the moonlit meadow, the first of the refugees, carried in powerful arms or laid on the improvised stretchers. Mexican men, Mexican women, Mexican children, a sprinkling of whites, half a dozen Japanese and Chinese, and then more Mexicans. The mission in the village had done its work well—these men and women, drawn from the poorer area of the neighboring city, had filled the west wing of the hospital where the fire had broken out. Ten, twenty, thirty-odd of the poor creatures were carried into the house. There was no other house so near, within half a mile. The cots were filled, the divans were used, the beds in the rooms of the guests were filled, the servants' beds were opened, the last half-dozen of the sick men were laid upon rugs in the patio.

The skilled and unskilled alike among the guests and the servants of the house worked together, doing the best that they knew, until the physicians came. Nurses, summoned from a neighboring town, arrived by motor. There was nothing to do but to make the sick ones comfortable where they were until daylight.

MARIA ALICIA'S guests, still in the bright array of the dinner whose excellent salad stood untasted on the table in the court, moved through the house all night long, taking direction from the capable men and women who came to have charge. All night long they ran on tired feet, quieting the terrified women, soothing the sobbing children, trying to explain to the men what had happened. In the court the six who lay on carpets were Mexican men and it was Señora Gómez who was helping there, and when she spoke to them in their own tongue one of the men looked up and smiled, and said, in Spanish, "Everything is right with me now," and slept.

Her husband, stooping to a Mexican laborer in the front passage, saw him open his eyes and listened as Maria Alicia's clear voice came down the stairs, and thereafter he sat by the sick man, talking to him gently in his own tongue. Passing among them all and becoming aware of something of this, Maria Alicia went calling for Pedro and his wife. She sent them back into the little black painted balcony, where they had been singing—days ago as it seemed—and bade them sing again. And when the soft voices rose through the house, she went about throwing doors wide so that all might hear.

The women of the village who came both hurrying and hesitating up the slope to the villa stood spellbound in the passage when, entering the house of pain, they were met by the cadences of "La Chaparrita." And when it was finished, from room after room there came a feeble clapping of hands, and there were voices that called: "Again! Again!" For hours Pedro and his wife sang or strummed or struck the castanets. And once a clear and beautiful voice came from below, and Maria Alicia herself stood there singing old Spanish love-songs.

TOWARD dawn the house grew quiet, and Alla, coming from the servants' quarters, where she had soothed to sleep a talkative old woman, slipped out on the terrace. The moon was like a flying car of silver, with white ragged cloud pennons streaming. Alla threw herself in a chair, and saw Maria Alicia and Paul standing by the terrace balustrade. Alla shut her eyes, too tired and miserable to care. But Paul saw her, and both came hurrying toward her.

Paul cried: "You're done out! Go to bed, Alla."

The Simple Charm of Childhood

Let it live through the years by starting now, in this way, with correct skin care

THE simple charm of childhood is a precious trust, placed by Nature, for safekeeping, in the hands of mothers.

It can be kept in constant bloom, through girlhood, into glorious womanhood . . . or, be left to fade.

Gentle skin care is the all-important factor . . . future charm, beauty, social success and womanly allurement depend on it often.

PALMOLIVE, and no other soap, is the rule in thousands of homes where there are growing children . . . its gentle oils of palm and olive are scientifically blended to protect the skin during the years when protection is most needed.

The safe rule to follow

See that the skin is kept clean, the pores open and free.

See that no harsh cleansing method is used. Palmolive soothes while it cleanses. Its ingredients are mild and gentle; lotion-like in their action. It protects from injurious irritation.

Wash gently with soothing Palmolive. Then massage it softly into the skin. Rinse thoroughly with cool water. In this simple manner is beauty and charm preserved and youth prolonged.

No medicaments are necessary. Remove the day's accumulations of dirt and oil, cleanse the pores, and Nature will be kind. Your child's skin will be of fine texture. Her color will be good.

As they grow older, let them use powder if they wish. But never leave it on over night. It clogs the pores, often enlarges them. Blackheads and disfigurements often follow. The skin must be kept clean, the pores open and active.

Avoid this mistake

Do not use ordinary soaps in the treatment given above. Do not think any green soap, or represented as of palm and olive oils, is the same as Palmolive. Palmolive is a skin emollient in soap form.

And it costs but 10c the cake!—so little that millions let it do for their bodies what it does for their faces. Obtain a cake today. Then note what an amazing difference one week makes.

Soap from trees!

The only oils in Palmolive Soap are the soothing beauty oils from the olive tree, the African palm and the coconut palm—and no other fats whatsoever.

That is why Palmolive Soap is the natural color that it is—for palm and olive oils, nothing else, give Palmolive its green color!

The only secret to Palmolive is its exclusive blend—and that is one of the world's priceless beauty secrets.

THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY (Del. Corp.), CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

Palmolive Soap is untouched by human hands until you break the wrapper—it is never sold unwrapped

CHILDREN are Play Laborers

A hard day's work by the beach, but little engineers building fortifications won't hurt clothes made of Indian Head. The Permanent Finish and fast colors remain as beautiful as ever. The surface will never "fuzz up," and the colors defy the merciless sun.

The smartest shops for children are showing dresses of Indian Head in popular colors for late summer and early school wear.

All day long in the brilliant sunshine children work hard at play, or at school. Big stains and dirt spots appear on their clothing; perspiration dampens their little backs—fine for the children, but deadly for their garments. When school begins, their clothes get grimy with chalk and school dust.

IN the past these were hard problems for mothers, but now the new Permanent Finish Indian Head furnishes an easy solution. Hard work or play will not affect its beautiful colors and its clear white, or destroy its Permanent Finish.

Permanent Finish Wins

This new finish gives Indian Head a charm never before seen in a cotton material. It has the cool, crisp appearance that used to be found only in the better grades of linen, yet at the same time it is slow to soil, slow to wrinkle, and easy to iron.

Practical and attractive, Indian Head has more than fifty popular uses for children's clothes, women's clothes, interior decoration, and embroideries.

You can get the Permanent Finish Indian Head in eighteen colors and white. Each color is absolutely fast—your money back if it fades. It is 36 inches wide, 50c a yard. White Indian Head comes in seven widths, 18 to 63 inches, from 25c to 79c a yard.

On every yard is stamped Indian Head Permanent Finish. Ready-made garments have an Indian Head label for your protection.

What colors do your children wear?

Send for our free booklet, "Your Color and Why." It is full of helpful information about colors. If you mention, when writing, your favorite color, we will send you a generous sample of the new Permanent Finish Indian Head. You can put the sample to any test you wish.

Permanent Finish

The young girl knows that her school dresses of Indian Head are smart, attractive and comfortable. The new Permanent Finish gives the appearance of lightness, but quality and weave are unchanged.

Today's fun will not mean a scolding and spoiled clothes tomorrow, when the clothes are made of Indian Head. The colors are fast and the fabric is easy to iron.

A THIEF IN THE NIGHT

"In what?" she inquired briefly. "I'm all right. Don't bother about me."

"I'm not," said Maria Alicia, "I'm dying. I'm going to wash my face in the fountain."

"Won't it all come off?" Paul asked.

"Yes, I shall probably wash my whole face away," she replied, and went into the house.

"Alla," said Paul, "this is the most wonderful thing that has ever happened to me."

"Who is so wonderful?" asked Alla.

"These people!" He sat down beside her on the foot of the wicker chair. "I've never felt this before—I've never seen anything that would let me feel it. I've lived a dead life," he added grimly.

She said nothing. She was thinking that if every such minute when she was with him could last forever life might not be such an affair of death for her.

"An old man named Páez," Paul was going on. "He told me of his son—he says I look like him—he doesn't know whether he's alive or dead. A Spanish woman, Señora Navarro—her mother is in another part of the hospital, she spoke of her mother as a woman speaks of her child. And the children—Alla—a little boy gave me a wilted flower he had kept in his hand through all this. He said, 'Please, señor, give it a drink. It's the first flower I ever had to myself!' "

"I know," she said gently. "I've been every one of those people to-night, one after another. I've fallen in love—or in pity—with half of them in there. Even the stuffy ones who wanted to tell me their lives——"

"Alla," he said, "I'd wondered whether Homer and Maria Alicia would be happy—could be happy—coming from lives so different, background, standards—everything different."

"Well?" she asked steadily.

"I've looked at her, and tried to see how Homer would feel toward her—when they differed, when they don't understand one another's ways——"

"Oh, that is how you looked at her!" cried Alla with immense vivacity.

"Well, nearly always I was looking at you," he owned. "I've known that I loved you, I've dreamed you might love me—do you Alla? Do you?"

"But if I do?" she cried. "I am from the southern part of this great country—and you are from the northern part! Tell me, is that not fatal? Will not every one tell you that that is fatal? And if——"

He leaned to her and drew her to him and kissed her. Then he said: "Alla! That was an international kiss. But could it possibly have been any better?"

The terrace grew gray and grew blue, and the pepper-trees stirred in the wind before the dawn. They sat there, talking of what the time had brought. Afterward they recalled that the matter of a sapphire necklace had not entered their thought in connection with that night.

YELLOW daylight struggled into the house and into the court, and as the sun came blazing above the mountains Maria Alicia led the women to the kitchen. The men had come up with supplies from the village, where the shops had not been closed all the night. There were two hours of preparing before all could be served. Then the ambulances began to arrive from the city hospitals.

Maria Alicia, still in her silver and blue jeweled gown, and Alla, with her broken necklace still about her throat, were in the hallway when young Gonzales came from the court carrying a crippled boy. Some one was with him, wheeling the boy's chair, which had been saved. It was Paul—and Paul and young Gonzales together helped the boy into the car. It did not at the time occur to either of the women that there was anything strange about this—not even when Paul and Gonzales hurried back to the house together. John Meyer came down the stairs carrying a child, and they noted a red burn on his arm. When Homer said to him, "Have that bandaged, man!" he asked, "Have what bandaged?" with an air of wonder. And it was Gómez who found some gauze and tied up the arm, Meyer protesting that it was nothing.

It was when the last of the patients had been put in the ambulances with the nurses, and the physicians were preparing to follow, that Maria Alicia first became aware of the dozen and more women in her house who were not nurses and who had not been her guests. Calm, capable women, who went about folding bedding and dragging away cots as if their efficient hands had spent their lives like this, serving the human race.

"Who are you—all of you whom I do not know?" Maria Alicia inquired.

One of them answered—a strong, erect woman, with the patient face of a mother:

"Why, Mis' Harden," she said, "we're all your neighbors down in the village. Every one of us has been expecting to call on you—but we didn't think we'd do it quite so informal."

Maria Alicia put out her hands.

"I'm glad to meet all of you," she said. "Stay for breakfast and tell me your names!"

They had breakfast to prepare for their families at home, but they all went away promising to come soon again to see her—and this Maria Alicia was urging!

It was a pallid and rumpled dozen guests who sat round the table in the court, where the servants were trying to clear enough space to serve them coffee. Maria Alicia, limp and shaken, all her pretty vivacity vanished from her face and manner, sat in her silver and blue and cried: "Those people—they were wonderful, they were brave. They are my people." But the Gómezes and Gonzales and Soledad reminded her that they were their people too. And Homer and Arkwright and Sally Rice said crossly that they'd like to know if they weren't their people as well. "Sure, they are," said somebody sleepily.

On a wicker couch sat Paul, with Alla in the circle of an arm. He said only:

"She says I can tell you——"

And Alla cried quickly: "But we apologize for getting engaged before the very last ambulance was loaded!"

Everybody wished them happiness rather absent-mindedly, Sally Rice first asking whether somebody's crutches had been put in. This matter was settled, and some more of like pressing importance, in the midst of the congratulations. An engagement seemed one of the minor issues of life.

Then Arkwright said, almost as casually: "By the way, I was an ass. I am one—I always will be one for what I did. It was I who grabbed that pendant—here it is, Alla. I was trying to test out whether we could start a fight. Didn't mean it to go so far——"

There was a pause. No one seemed overwhelmingly interested. Even Maria Alicia was evidently too sleepy to exclaim—or too uninterested.

"But we did start a fight all the same, didn't we?" said Gonzales at last.

"We ought to be shot for it, though," said Meyer.

"Not at all!" said Paul clearly.

"Well, I don't know—" began Gonzales hotly.

"Oh, shut up!" said Arkwright. "Don't do it again."

In his big voice Señor Gómez addressed them from a retired spot on the bottom step of the fountain-vase where he sat with his coffee.

"I call your attention," said he, "to the fact that it was the crowd in the Mission hospital that settled that fight. It wasn't us, with our manners."

"What manners?" asked Maria Alicia.

On his colored hoop the macaw awoke, took his head from under his beautiful wing and laughed raucously.

Maria Alicia looked up at him.

"It was Polly," she observed, "who fell from his perch and started everything but the fire."

"Not everything," said Alla and Paul as one.

Maybe your teeth are gloriously clear, simply clouded with a film coat. Make this remarkable test and find out.

Gums Like Coral

TEETH with that dazzling whiteness you seek

This NEW way will bring them quickly. Simply send the coupon. Make this unique dental test. See what a great difference a few days will make—it removes the film that invites "off color" teeth and unhealthy gums.

HERE is a simple dental test. A test that will work a great change in the color of your teeth, in the color and firmness of your gums.

You may not realize it, but yet be handicapping yourself immeasurably with a smile that lacks the attraction of glistening whiteness and healthy gums.

So, for your own sake, send the coupon. It means so much to you.

That stubborn and dangerous film — you must remove it

Dental science now traces scores of tooth and gum troubles, directly or indirectly, to a germ-laden film that forms on your teeth.

You can't see it with your eyes, but run your tongue across your teeth and you will feel it . . . a slippery, viscous coating.

That film absorbs discolorations from food, smoking, etc. And that is why your teeth look "off color" and dingy.

It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It lays your gums open to bacterial attack. Germs by the millions breed in it. And they, with tartar, are a chief cause of pyorrhea and decay.

You can't have pretty teeth unless you combat it. Highest authorities all tell you this.

Brushing won't end it

Ordinary dentifrices and cleansing won't fight film successfully. Feel for it now with your tongue. Note how your present cleansing method is failing in its duty.

Now new methods are being used. A dentifrice called Pepsodent—different in formula, action and effect from any other known.

Largely on dental advice the world has turned to it. Tooth and gum troubles hence are on the decline.

It removes that film. And Firms the Gums

It accomplishes two important things at once: Removes that film, then firms the gums. No harsh grit, judged dangerous to enamel.

A few days' use will prove its power beyond all doubt. Why cling to old methods when world's authorities urge a better way?

Send the coupon. Clip it now before you forget.

An ELIZABETH ARDEN Treatment
Photographed in Paris by Baron DeMeyer

No cream actually transforms the skin—no cosmetics successfully conceal its blemishes

But scientific care can help your skin to function happily, and so develop and preserve for you the lovely characteristics of a naturally clear fresh skin.

A LOVELY SKIN is, prosaically, a layer of active tissues. It excretes certain wastes through the pores. It must be fed, else it becomes too relaxed and impoverished to work. And it must keep working, else the wastes pile up and mar the skin with blemishes, coarse pores and sallowness. Correct care of the skin means simply keeping the skin cells beautifully busy.

The Elizabeth Arden Treatment is based on three fundamental steps: Cleansing, Toning and Nourishing. Cleansing—with pure melting Venetian Cleansing Cream—to dissolve and dislodge all those impurities which clog the pores, check their excretion and cause blackheads and coarseness. Toning—with Ardena Skin Tonic and Special Astringent—to close the mouths of the pores, tone and firm the skin, and keep the circulation through the skin tissues brisk and active. Nourishing—with Orange Skin Food or the delicate Velva Cream—to keep every skin cell full and firm, and so prevent or correct the wrinkles and lines of impoverished tissues. These three steps fulfill every need of the skin to keep it naturally lovely.

Follow the same three steps in your little Self Treatments at home. Just a few minutes each night and morning, using the corrective Preparations and method developed by Elizabeth Arden, will accomplish wonderful results for you. Elizabeth Arden recommends these Preparations for your care of the skin at home:

Venetian Cleansing Cream. Dissolves and dislodges all impurities in the pores, leaves the skin soft and receptive. $1, $2, $3, $6.

Venetian Ardena Skin Tonic. Tones, firms and whitens the skin. Use with and after Cleansing Cream. 85c, $2, $3.75, $4.75.

Venetian Orange Skin Food. Keeps the skin full and firm, rounds out wrinkles and lines. $1, $1.75, $2.75, $4.25.

Venetian Velva Cream. A delicate skin food for sensitive skins; nourishes without fattening. $1, $2, $3, $6.

Venetian Muscle Oil. A rich penetrating oil, restores sunken tissues or flabby muscles. $1, $2.50, $4.

Venetian Special Astringent. Lifts and firms the tissues, tightens the skin. $2.25, $4.

Venetian Pore Cream. Closes open pores, corrects their inactivity. $1, $2.50.

Venetian Amoretta Cream. An exquisite protective cream, gives a soft, smooth, natural bloom to the skin. An excellent powder foundation. $1, $2.

Poudre d'Illusion. Exquisite powder, fine, pure. Illusion (a peach blend), Rachel, Ocre, White, and a new becoming shade called Minerva, $3.

GROWING UP POLITELY

Teach your children that their hostess has conferred a great favor on them by inviting them to her house, and they must not leave without saying good-by and expressing their appreciation. If the mother dances, they should never fail to ask her to dance, and they should be sure to pay attention to your hostess's daughters if there are any. At public dances and school parties have your boys remember to ask their older women friends to dance; very often they do not accept, but the courtesy is pleasing.

Invitations, either written or telephoned, should be answered the day they are received. And do not fail to impress your children with their duty of writing letters of thanks promptly. Unacknowledged gifts create irritation in the donor, and belated gratitude is like eating food grown cold. Christmas time brings joy and excitement, and school children often look upon writing as a task, so that indulgent parents frequently do their writing for them. This is wrong. If your children go away to visit, they should also write at once on their return.

These suggestions are not new, but I have gathered them together in order to make a plea for their requirement at an early age and to emphasize once more Lord Chesterfield's remark: "Manners must adorn knowledge, and smooth its way through the world." And a parent's greatest aids, let us remember, are a child's instinct for imitation and the sure laws of habit.

HAPPILY MARRIED

the world are against the transgressor and they are many.

The happy home must be founded upon honor and built of sound timbers if it is to stand against the winds and floods.

Now I do not need to tell you that I am no angel. I have been no anemic half-man. I know what temptation means. Men and women who stand against it will need all the strength they have, and perhaps even a little more. What do I mean by "a little more?"

Well you know I do not have much to say about my religion. It has been a rather quiet and unobtrusive detail in my life. I have not even been a church member until recently, but I yield to no man in my respect for religion, and years ago I began to have that love in me which fulfills the law. To its demands I have given as freely as I could of my strength and substance. Nor have I neglected to seek help from the source of all strength. Have I received it? I dare not say that I have been so honored, but, anyhow, I have had faith and strength enough to keep my vows.

You will never forget the atmosphere which your mother created in the home which has been yours and mine. Simple as it was, the sacred light of beauty was there. It was loved and sought by many friends. That home had a voice, not of human lips, which spoke to one who entered it and seemed to say: "Here are peace and rest and comfort and perhaps even a greater treasure."

Whatever you have seen and felt in your home is the natural expression of happiness. Slovenliness and uncleanness are the voices of failure and discontent. Have you not observed that a happy spirit growing sweeter and cleaner, year by year, will clothe the body that holds it with a kind of beauty? The homely face of Abraham Lincoln became beautiful as his spirit developed and his ungainly physique assumed a majesty all its own. What is true of people is true of houses. A home will soon be beautiful, if its spirit is developing in the right direction; or unattractive, if its spirit is going wrong. It can not help being so. That spirit will inevitably find the art of expressing itself in dress, in color, in furnishings, in music and in its associates.

YOU may wish to know what it is that makes for the right spirit in one's home. Broadly speaking, it is a proper respect for beauty in nature, art and personality, for good books, good pictures, good music, good people, good talk. It is the love of noble things and especially of friendship. The art of being a true friend is not well understood. There is an old saying that one who tastes your salt is sacred. Give him your best and protect him even from himself. We were wont to serve wine in our home but only in moderation. It is bad to gamble, but if one is so foolish he should do it at his club—never in his home. Nothing is surer to break down its spirit. Gambling is built on the love of gold; it is an offshoot of the root of evil. It is essentially a cold business, and one of its hazards is friendship. It is the natural soil of dissension and bitterness. Often I have played for small stakes as a pastime, but never in my home. No one ever left it with a sense of loss. I have told some racy stories in my time, but never have I told one in my home. I have tried to keep it a clean place.

You will have observed that your mother and I had learned the gentle art of keeping peace. In the forty years of our wedded life a comradeship had grown up between us which was the subject of much comment. What a help and joy it was to me!

I remember a time when we were first married and we went to visit my old mother. We were sitting together in the twilight of a Summer day. I recall that my young wife had said something which displeased me, and I made a thoughtless and impatient remark. We were as sensitive as a pair of thoroughbred colts and were both hurt by what had been said. Then, as the light grew dim, my old mother talked to me of the gentle art of keeping step, of bearing and forbearing, and of the danger in hasty words. Of the things she said this I remember: "Every day, at least once, I want you to think of this: What can I do this day to show her that I really love her? What can I do to make him love me more? If you are ever angry with each other, don't speak, I beg of you, until the anger has passed."

It was a great lesson to us. In a sense we were remarried that night. I would not have you think that our relations became suddenly ideal, but from that day we made rapid progress in the art of self-adjustment.

We made our home as attractive as our means would let us. Every one should do that, for his home is his gate to Paradise. If extravagance can ever be justified, it is in making a home. My wife had good taste, and I was fond of books. I bought a wagonload of them at a shop in New York, and we sat up half the night waiting for them to come. We had fitted up a study opening off the back parlor and built a bookcase into its long walls. The books brought into our home a new atmosphere and source of inspiration. The best company began to feel at home there.

My life was a very active one. Often I was getting home late to a dinner which had been carefully planned and prepared for me. It was apt to be a spoiled dinner. Then there came a day illumined and memorable with revelation. Hard times had come to us. Our goods were mostly in storage. We were living in a little flat in Tarrytown. I was working on a novel. My wife had gone to New York for the day. It was a delightful Summer day. I sat at my task until one o'clock and got a bite to eat. I didn't know quite what to do with myself then. Oh, the loneliness of that little flat! I read a while. I sat and listened to the chirping of crickets and the drowsing of katydids. I worried. Suppose some evil thing should befall her in the big city.

I went to her bureau to look for a pair of nail scissors. What a treasure-box of dainty and beautiful things was that upper drawer! In what an orderly manner they had been laid away! Odors like the breath of dewy children of Mr. and Mrs.

C. H. Dickson, Jr., 7 Webster Place
East Orange, N. J.

The second generation of an Eagle Brand family

THE STORY of little Lois Ann and Charles Hugh Dickson really begins years ago, when their mother was a baby. She was given a healthy start by her mother on Eagle Brand Condensed Milk and grew up strong and vigorous.

So when Lois Ann was born and it was necessary to put her on a bottle, Mrs. Dickson was naturally delighted to have her doctor, a baby specialist, give her a formula containing Eagle Brand. Lois Ann and her little brother were both raised on it.

"The doctor couldn't get over how wonderfully well and strong the baby is. He said Eagle Brand is something almost every baby can start on," says Mrs. Dickson. "I am a strong believer in Eagle Brand in a baby's formula. It is wonderfully easy to digest and helps make hard flesh. Neither child was in the least flabby."

For 68 years Eagle Brand Condensed Milk has been the accepted baby food because it is so easily digested and so nearly resembles mother's milk. You can get it anywhere—always the same, pure, safe, uniform product.

Thousands of grateful mothers have had interesting experiences with Eagle Brand. Some of their stories are told in What Other Mothers Say, a booklet that also contains feeding charts for babies up to 2 years. This—with Baby's Welfare, a practical book by a doctor on the care of babies—gives information you ought to have. Both books are free. The coupon will bring them. HAPPILY MARRIED meadows came out to me. I looked in a box covered with red silk and embroidery. It held a package of letters bound together with the daintiest pink ribbon. I took it out of the box—a bundle of my old love-letters—so carefully stored away! Why should she treasure them? I sat down and read them over. How boyish, how sophomoric, how crude, they were!—how utterly artless! How much better I could say it now. Yet she loved those silly letters. They were dear to her or she would not have put them away so carefully, so daintily. I returned the letters to their resting-place and lay down upon the cushioned sofa. Oh, what a lonely place it was! I began to think of the past.

EIGHTEEN years had gone by since that evening when we had sat together at the feet of my old mother, in the twilight, and listened to her wise counsel. They had been hard years full of anxious toil and small accomplishment. I could see that, as a husband, I had been more or less of a failure. She had seen little of me save when I had returned to her, often at midnight, worn out by the burdens of the day. How many lonely hours, like these I was now spending, had been hers! True, I had tried to follow the good advice of my mother. I had brought my wife gifts, many gifts, bought in distant cities when in sheer loneliness my thoughts had turned homeward. I had gone to the limit in that matter, and yet I had given her not half enough of myself.

An idea came to me. She would be returning on the 6:10 train. She would be hungry and tired. I would have a dinner, fit for a queen, ready for her when she arrived! There would be fresh-cut roses on the table. I would broil a choice beefsteak basted with strips of bacon. I would have mushrooms and new asparagus and fresh tomatoes and lettuce and strawberries just out of the garden, and a pint bottle of cream and coffee—for she loved my way of making coffee. I went out for a walk, and then I did my shopping with the greatest care. The beefsteak was cut from the loin of a young steer and was two inches thick. I returned a little before five with my arms full of roses and ferns and smilax. My goods were lying at the door. I got the fire going and set and decorated the table as if it were to hold a wedding-feast. I made the salad and dressed the mushrooms and began my cooking. What fun I had anticipating her surprise and pleasure! The steak was ready, beautifully browned, under its melting crown of golden butter.

Put on as much butter as you think you need and then double the quantity. That was my rule in serving a steak. How delicious it looked, and its aroma was perfect! The mushrooms were ready. The strawberries were heaped in saucers of ancestral china and set upon graceful mats of smilax. The coffee was in the pot. The asparagus was steaming on a gold-rimmed platter. It was 6:20. She would be coming in a minute or two. I went and looked out of the window to see if she was near. Five minutes passed. I began to be anxious. What could have happened to her? I drew a chair to the window-side and sat watching, a quarrter of an hour and still no sign of her.

"Good heavens!" I said to myself. "Isn't that like a woman? A man works himself tired to please her and she——"

I went to the stove. The steak was getting dry. The mushrooms had shriveled. The asparagus had a dejected look. I was irritated. The clock struck seven. I didn't care what happened now. My exertions had wearied me and I threw myself on the sofa to rest. Gosh! What a rankling, bitter sense of baffled effort filled my soul!

At a quarter after seven the bell rang. It was growing dusk. I arose and opened the door. There stood my adorable wife with a sweet smile.

"Hello dear!" she exclaimed as we kissed each other. "How are you?"

"About all in!" I answered. "What in the world kept you so late?"

"Met an old friend and we sat down to talk in the station. Why, what is the matter? You look so cross."

"Anybody would be cross who had been treated as I have. Just look into the dining-room," I said.

She followed me with exclamations of delight through the dining-room and into the little kitchen. "Look at the dried beefsteak," I went on sadly. "Look at the mushrooms that are like India rubber. Look at the asparagus that has turned cold and stale. Look at your spoiled husband. If there were a man's page in the paper, I would write a letter to it on the subject of neglected husbands who spend their days in loneliness and their strength in preparing dinners doomed to lie on a cooling stove until they are ruined."

We fell into each others arms and laughed, and then we put the food on the table and sat down and had a wonderful hour together. She declared that it was the finest dinner she had ever eaten in spite of its staleness. I—well I was a wiser man after that, for I had tasted the bitter cup which is so often touching the lips of women.

I LAID aside my novel to join the editorial staff of a great morning newspaper. We were living in New York. My wife fell ill. Her mother and a well-known physician were attending her. I returned to the apartment from my task one morning at two o'clock. A serious change had come over the patient. I could see it in her face. I went out and found one of the best physicians in the city and brought him to the bedside. It was none too soon. My wife was being mistreated. Her trouble was peritonitis, her condition serious. The doctor told us what to do. Through that night and until nine in the morning I was dipping and wringing hot cloths. It was that timely help which carried her over the danger-point.

> The white wonder of dear Juliet's hand
> And steals immortal blessing from her lips!"

True, but never so sweet are they as in the night of pain and utter discouragement. Then, indeed, you get the full sweetness of the lover's tongue and a blessing from tender lips truly immortal.

I know, for I had had my turn of sickness and suffering and had learned what a good wife can do to keep a man in courage when it is growing faint. Together we had suffered failure, the pinch of hard times, the anxieties of sickness, the peril of great loss. A man and wife who have not stood, side by side, through such troubles may perhaps be fortunate, but they have missed the priceless thing which, if borne with good courage, makes a man and woman one and inseparable and gives them a peace and power beyond all measurement. We had stood the final trials of the thing called love and had entered upon a new era in our wedded life.

Success came to us swiftly, unexpectedly. It enjoyed our company as we enjoyed it. We were turning forty. The spirit of youth was still in us. Is it any wonder that when a degree of wealth had come to me I threw it at her feet and said: "It is as much yours as mine. I want you to go to the bank with me and leave your signature. Henceforward your check shall be honored, like my own, whenever it is presented." Always, after that, she had no need of asking me for any treasure which she desired.

She was wont to claim that an allowance would have suited her better, as her privilege had made her extremely careful. That was strictly true. Why should a man wait until he dies to trust his wife implicitly?

SO NOW you know how simple is the secret of our happy life. We had no more love for each other than have most boys and girls who marry. But we managed to keep and increase our love instead of killing it and mainly by being honest with each other. For all that I claim no credit. I would not have told you all these things save that you and others have made me believe that it ought to be told. If a time has really come when honor between men and women is in need of my humble recommendation, I give it freely.

I am lonely but not cast down. I know her spirit. It is still the same spirit that walked beside me. If I were to rest dejected in the shadow of my loneliness, I know what this beloved Martha would be saying. She would be out of patience with me. So I go on, as of old, seeking, day by day, the things we loved together; companionship and beauty and a full use of the strength of mind and body.

The one room exclusively a woman's

And so the kitchen should reflect cheer and charm as well as provide comfort and convenience

The only room in the house which a woman does not share is the kitchen. It is the one room where she may have her own way without consulting others.

Perhaps this is the very reason the kitchen is so often last to get its due. Yet every woman has her dreams of what this room should be!

She would have it furnished as completely and carefully as the family living room—with every convenience to save an aching back and tired feet.

But above all, it would be a charming, restful place, with dainty, feminine touches to cheer her work day along.

Don't think that such a kitchen is beyond your means! With a surprisingly small outlay, you can enjoy this convenience, this fresh attractiveness in your own kitchen.

Domestic science authorities have studied your kitchen needs and have designed just the furniture to make it an easy, pleasant place to work. Hoosier Equipment!

First, of course, and the main unit of every modern kitchen, is the Hoosier Cabinet. It is the efficient center from which thousands of households are directed. And it is far from being an extravagance; for you can have a Hoosier on such easy terms you will never feel it!

Next, your need for extra storage space is splendidly filled by Hoosier movable units. One style has deep shelves for dishes, utensils and supplies; the other is fitted as a broom closet. You may use them as an extension of your cabinet or in other suitable places. The units, too, you may have and enjoy on the easiest of payments!

An added touch of cosy cheer is given with the dainty Hoosier Breakfast Set of table and chairs. For breakfast nook or rest corner, it is both decorative and practical.

You can get Hoosier furniture in White or French Grey Enamel, golden oak, or painted to match your special color scheme. Whatever your choice, you have a tastefully appointed, charming room.

Don't go on "putting up" with shabbiness just because your kitchen is old! New Hoosier furniture will work wonders—and without tearing out or building in! And for new kitchens Hoosier is regularly installed as affording more facilities and greater beauty than your carpenter can build in.

The Hoosier Easy Payment Plan will revolutionize your kitchen!

The best part of a Hoosier kitchen is that you will never know you've spent the money! For buying Hoosier furniture is now reduced to the easiest, simplest terms and a very small first payment brings what you need. As you use it you can finish paying in terms to suit your best convenience. The Hoosier store in your town will gladly tell you of this special plan, or write us for details.

"Well, there are cookies in my trunk—but they're for children who thank the Lord for what they are, not talk about what they wish they was," Aunt Mary remarked. "And I wish they'd get through pushin' bears! That growl makes me nervous!"

"Get Albert," some one shouted outside.

"He's got to ride Entry," another voice answered. "I'll get him when he's through."

A sudden burst of band music told them Entry had started.

Ten minutes later there was a great flutter of excitement around the wardrobe-table. Albert, the helpful old elephant, now harnessed to the mud-stuck bear-cage, had shoved himself against the tent and thereupon on the inside scattered over the wet ground all Mrs. Sunny's keep-sakes!

Texas hurried down on her knees to help collect them—a tiny book, a gold horsehoe pin, a satin post-card, some pictures.

Suddenly, with a snap-shot in her hand, Texas stopped short—stared at the picture—and up at Mrs. Sunny.

"Why, where did you get this? Whose is it?" the little girl asked in amazement.

A flush of pink came up in Mrs. Sunny's cheeks.

"It's—it's somebody I used to know a long time ago," she said. "He sent it to his cousin Car'line where I lived—and I—I took it. His name's on the back."

"And do you know him?" Texas cried. "Why, Mrs. Sunny, he's—he's a friend of mine, for a very certain special reason! And besides that, he bought a red necktie on purpose to please me!"

She turned over the little square picture. Across the back of it, in small old-fashioned writing, this was what she read:

"Jason Fobes. 1837 West Dale Street, St. Louis, Mo."

THE Crandle boarding-house lived along as usual. Breakfast continued to be served from seven till nine—lunch from twelve till one-thirty—dinner at six promptly. Friday continued to be cleaning-day, on which Mrs. Crandle continued to pin her skirt up behind and Peralee continued to serve corned beef and cabbage.

Mrs. Crandle was a person who not only made rules but kept them, which everybody in her household knew and respected. Consequently, along with other things that continued, everybody also continued with care to keep entirely away from the subject of the circus child and her grandfather.

And that was how it happened that Mr. Jason Fobes, who, it may be remembered, had been absent from the table the evening Mrs. Crandle had expressed herself about it, never heard or knew any later chapter of the grandfather story.

As Mr Fobes went here and there in his various red neckties, he often remembered, with a tug at his heart, that morning when a little arm had been around his neck—a soft cheek against his. He often wondered what that little girl had meant about a "special reason" for having sat beside him and he thought of her more often than any one would have supposed.

He had tried long before to forget about little houses and gardens where people loved each other and made each other happy. He had dreamed of it once—as every one dreams of such a thing once—but of his dream nothing was left but an old-fashioned tintype of a girl of eighteen, with a ruffled dress, lace mitts, curls pinned around her head. He had dreamed of a little house with Lucy there and himself to take care of her—but that was so long ago it seemed to him now like a dream some one else must have had, not he. Just a bookkeeper on a high stool, just a cranky little lodger at Crandle's—that was all Jason Fobes had been for years and years and years.

But somehow that little sunny-haired girl had brought all his dreams back again. Perhaps it was her own dream of a little house and garden with her grandfather—perhaps it was because, when he had dreamed that dream of a cottage and Lucy, he had dreamed, too, of childish arms around his neck, which never had happened until Texas had come that morning.

At any rate, the Crandle boarders noticed that he smiled now and then. They whispered about it when he wasn't around, and said his red neckties were affecting his disposition.

Mr. Fobes himself didn't know he had changed—he only knew he wanted Lucy's picture out of his trunk where he could see it again. And somehow he found himself knowing that though a dream be only a dream that never hopes to come true it is far sweeter company than no dream at all.

He would sit by his window and remember the funny little way Lucy's nose had wrinkled when she smiled, and he would wonder what all the years had done for her.

MRS. CRANDLE let these strange symptoms pass, but one morning something happened just one count too much. The mail-carrier brought a letter addressed unmistakably to Mr. Jason Fobes! The postmark was Winona, Minnesota, the address penned in a round, precise hand, as though it had been written with great care.

Mr. Fobes had lived in her house thirty years and (with the exception of a Christmas letter from his cousin Caroline) he had received no mail since the day he had come there.

She held the letter to the light. It was quite a long letter. The paper was folded thickly, the envelope square and pink, but that was all she could tell—which kept her in fidgets all day as she watched the clock for Mr. Fobes's coming-home time.

She prepared her dinner early so she could meet him on the porch and pin him there till he should open the letter and explain it. She wondered if he was expecting it or if it would surprize him as she had been surprized, but when at last he came his face told her as well as she needed to know that he didn't have any better knowledge of it than she did.

"There!" she said. "Since half-past ten this morning this has been annoying me! Mr. Fobes, if you've got any relations in Winona, Minnesota, I don't know about it—and I hope nobody else would be writin' you pink letters at your age!"

Mr. Fobes held the letter gingerly and looked on both sides of it. It was addressed to him! Mrs. Crandle planted herself fillingly in the doorway, but Mr. Fobes, to her complete and entire disgust, deliberately passed her—and went on up-stairs.

She watched him go in and then returned to the kitchen for her only redress—cutting down his piece of pie.

In his room, behind his door, on the edge of his hard little single bed, Mr. Fobes opened his letter. He looked at the signature first. It was "Texas." The corners of his lips drew up in a smile. He straightened the red necktie and moved over to his chair in the window. The little girl who had brought back his dreams! She must have found the grandfather in Winona, Minnesota!

It was with a warm feeling of belonging to some one that he settled back in a streak of left-over sunlight to read the letter. The dinner-bell clanged in the hall below, but he didn't hear it. He was reading:

DEAR MR. FOBES: I have thought of you often, and thanked you for changing your neck-ty. I didn't have any grandpa after all, so Joe and I came back to the circus and I am a star now because mother is resting. When I came back somebody was here who wasn't here before, and I love her very much, and as I love you very much too, wasn't it funny that the elephant spilled the box? When I found your picture fallen out of her keepsakes, I was so surprized I couldn't believe it.

Mr. Fobes drew his brows together in a puzzled sort of way and kept on reading as the dinner-bell insistently clanged again.

When I told her you were a dear friend of mine and told her about the neck-ty, she was so surprized she couldn't believe it either, so she told me all about you. She says she will always keep your picture, but never tell you where she is, so I thought I might as well tell you now as any time as I can not keep secrets. So will you please write and ask her to forgive me for telling. She keeps our wardrobe and my mother says she is a little jar of peach preserve. I think so too. Her name is Mrs. Sunny Peck, but she says you only called her Lucy.

I hope you weren't late to your office that day and I would like to hear from you myself also. I wish you could see me on the cloud swing. It earns money for mother and I love to go in the air so well I can't wait till every day comes. The people clap and clap and I bow a hundred times. I hope all the boarders are well. Your loving

TEXAS.

P. S. I enclose a sheet of towns to tell where we will be when you write.

Mr. Fobes held the letter so long he forgot what it was, or what it said, or who had sent it. Lucy! He was back again in a little green boat on a little green river, with trees

Fascinating new way to make money at home

How people all over the country are discovering a new joy in living, a means of expressing and developing their personalities and earning handsome incomes through Membership in the National Organization of Fireside Industries. Nothing is more fascinating than decorating Art Novelties at home and few occupations pay so well. New members now invited to join.

A home studio pays well

Beautiful designs are applied to lamp shades and pillow tops.

Batik is easy to do

FOR the man or woman who would like to earn extra money in spare hours or establish an independent business, there is probably nothing that offers so great an opportunity as the Decoration of Art Novelties.

That is why the men and women all over the country who are engaged in this work as Members of the "happy family" of Fireside Industries are so wonderfully enthusiastic about it. This new way of turning pleasant hours into dollars through work that seems like play, is, as one woman expresses it, "just like a delightful dream come true."

Splendid earnings in spare or full time

High prices are gladly paid for these exclusive, hand-decorated Art Novelties, and the field is unlimited, for all sorts of interesting articles can be decorated, such as candlesticks, picture frames, wall plaques and book shelves; gaily painted wooden toys; copper and brass novelties; hand-painted furniture, such as gate-legged tables, sewing cabinets and Windsor chairs; enameled lamp bases, hand-painted parchment lamp shades, table runners, pillow tops, piano scarfs and other textile pieces decorated in Batik; hand-colored greeting cards, and many other articles too numerous to mention here.

Many of the Members of Fireside Industries conduct Home Studios, while others have opened regular Gift Shops. But aside from the money that members earn, this joyous work gives them a new means of self-development, an opportunity to express their personalities in art, a method of awakening their sleeping love for the beautiful; in fact, members are enabled to become fully alive to the better things in life.

No Special Ability or Experience Required

Many people have the impression that some special artistic ability is required for decorating Art Novelties. To the contrary, most of the Members of Fireside Industries had never had any artistic training whatever.

The complete plan of operation that this organization gives to its members, its wonderfully simple and fascinating course of instruction, the personal guidance of Mr. Gabriel Andre Petit, Director of the Art Department, and the help of the members of the staff, as well as the many co-operative advantages, all combine to make success easy and certain. Anyone who is willing to make a conscientious effort cannot fail—in fact, your complete satisfaction is GUARANTEED.

The work is so simple that almost anyone can do it, for it is merely a question of following the very simple instructions. In addition, each member receives a complete Outfit, without extra cost, which contains all the supplies and materials needed for the lessons.

Another important element in the success of the men and women of Fireside Industries is the co-operative buying privilege that enables them to secure merchandise for decorating at membership rates. It is impossible to describe here, however, the complete plan of operation and all the helpful features. As many say, they had not dreamed that such a wonderful plan existed.

NOW—An Opportunity to Join

Write for the Fireside Book

Here is a remarkable opportunity for you, whether you want extra money, a pleasant hobby, or a way to express and develop your personality. No special qualifications are required. It makes no difference where you live or how much time you may have to spare. If you think you might be interested in decorating Art Novelties at home for pleasure and profit, you are invited to send for the beautiful book of Fireside Industries, which will be mailed to you FREE and which explains the plan in detail. HARPER'S for SEPTEMBER

DR. HARRY E. FOSDICK'S
New Monthly Department
"Religion and Life"

will be the most important event of years in the world of thought. Dr. Fosdick stands preëminent in the movement for a revivified and indispensable religion, and his articles in Harper's—a series of twelve—will deal with this deepest need of man, not as a matter of ritual, or doctrine, or institution. Rather as an urgent present power desperately wanted by men and women everywhere, to help them live triumphantly amid the challenging and baffling problems of this extraordinary universe.

Dr. Fosdick defines religion vigorously as the most exciting thing in the world. When men are conventionally pious they are intolerably dull, but when they become genuinely and vitally religious they are the most thrilling members of the community.

CHRISTOPHER MORLEY'S "Thunder on the Left"

It is difficult to speak calmly of such a masterpiece as "Thunder on the Left." In it Christopher Morley, author of "Where the Blue Begins," has triumphantly fulfilled the promise of that other magical book. This new work of soaring gleaming beauty treats of the true spirit of living and of life as it must be lived. It is alive with passion and clouded with the misty brightness of a dream.

Imaginative intensity, thrilling suspense, tragic significance, and heart-breaking comedy combine to make it a story of which you will be proud to say, years hence, "I read it when it first came out in HARPER'S."

bending over the bank, and Lucy dipping her fingers in the water, telling him good-by. That had been forty-eight—forty-nine years ago!

THE dinner-bell clanged again. Mr. Fobes started to his feet, looked at his fat old silver watch, took off his coat and hastily poured water into his wash-bowl.

He was in the act of scouring his face when Mrs. Crandle knocked sharply at his door.

"Mr. Fobes," she shrilled, "dinner will not be held for any one!"

He opened the door and looked out—his face an odd study in smiles.

"You can clear mine right off, Mrs. Crandle," he said in a chirping little voice. "I won't be at table for two or three days!"

Mrs. Crandle gasped. Thirty years of Mr. Fobes excepting Friday nights! What was the matter with the man?

"What are you saying, Jason?" she burst out. "What ails you?"

"Nothing, Mrs. Crandle," he chirped. "I'm all right! I'm just going on a little trip for a few days, that's all."

He pulled an antiquated, dusty, brown satchel from the top shelf of his closet.

"For land's sake, where are you going? What for?" his landlady demanded.

"Haven't looked up just what town I'm going to," he chuckled, "but I'm going to see a—a couple of lady friends of mine."

Mrs. Crandle shut the door in his face. The man's head was twisted!

THE plump conductor who had been on that Missouri passenger train the day little Texas went seeking a grandfather was off duty every Wednesday and Saturday, and it was with much excitement one Saturday five weeks after the little affair on the train that his wife pressed his best suit while he shined his shoes on the back porch.

"Four o'clock, the letter asked you to come," his wife said. "It's half after two now, so you better get dressed. I wish it was me that was going! How I'd love to get a sight inside one of those elegant houses!"

"Well, it better be elegant the way I'm shinin' my shoes for it!" her husband answered from the back porch. "And you don't wish it was you any more than I do! When a fellow don't know where he's going, nor who to see—he'd a dang sight rather not go!"

"But as long as you wrote him you'd be there," she said, "don't be late!"

"Of course I told him I'd be there," he replied, between vigorous strokes of the shoe-brush. "What else could I tell him? Where's the letter? Was it four or four-thirty?"

His wife, plump as he was, hung the coat over a chair-back and reached to a shelf for a letter—rich paper, addressed in a wide hand. She read again, aloud:

MY DEAR SIR:

You may recall having met me on board the St. Louis Special on Tuesday the tenth of June. Your name and address were given me by the railroad company, and I shall appreciate greatly your finding it possible to call at my home Saturday afternoon at four. Kindly let me know that I may expect you. Yours truly,

KINGSLEY FITZGERALD.
(Per Donald Cuffly, Secretary.)

"Yep," the conductor remarked, coming in with the shoes in his one hand and the brush in his other. "Four o'clock, that's right. Well, if I knew what the old greaser wanted, I'd be better satisfied! Judging from his looks and talk on the train, it won't be anything sociable, anyway."

"Well," his wife said plumply, "I'm glad of one thing. We'll get to know how it turned out. Ever since you told me about that little girl I've been wondering what happened to her, poor little soul!"

"Hm—" the conductor grunted, struggling into his vest. "Yes, the old man was pretty dang small, and I don't know but what I'll up and tell him so—though at that I wouldn't have envied her if he had claimed her for relation. I wouldn't have wanted him:"

His wife held his coat.

"But that's an elegant letter," she said, her voice taking on a much-impressed tone. "It sounds awfully rich!"

"Rich, maybe, but he hasn't got me bluffed," her husband replied.

"Of course not," she said in a motherly way. "And you look just handsome in your good suit. Talk right up, no matter how stylish the house looks! You won't be too warm with your vest on, will you?"

"Warm!" the conductor sniffed. "Well, that old codger will freeze me up quick enough, if I am!"

She kissed him good-by and watched him fondly from the parlor window—then got out the Fitzgerald letter and read again the address it gave, to see just exactly where her conductor was going.

He wasn't entirely sure of the place himself, but he had a note on an envelope in his pocket and knowing at least that it was west he took the west-bound car at the corner.

IT WAS five minutes earlier than the appointed time when the conductor, who had last seen Kingsley Fitzgerald disappearing in the crowd at the railroad station, arrived at the gates of Fitzgerald Mansion which were swung wide open, lindens bending over them. The conductor had expected a home of wealth, but nothing like this!

"Great goslings!" he said to himself. "And he passed up that little kid as cold as a turnip! He could have kept ten of her in this place without even knowing it!"

He drew his shoulders up straight as he went through the gates and along the magnificent drive. On the side veranda, which was screened and hung with green awnings, some one was sitting. He heard voices as he approached. He saw it was Mr. Fitzgerald himself with a young woman in white and a servant receiving orders.

The conductor pulled down the corners of his vest and walked up the wide steps—the young woman hurrying to open the door for him as Mr. Fitzgerald acknowledged him slightly and motioned to a chair.

"Certainly, John," the master continued to the servant, "the building of the pergola is to be continued as I told you, overlooking the lake, and the swimming-pool must be tiled fifty feet square—but everything child size, understand me? Child size! When Kingsley is older we will rebuild, but tell the men everything is to be in a child's size now."

Mr. Fitzgerald turned to the guest.

"Good afternoon," he said in that same brusk tone the conductor remembered. "Miss Kent," he addressed the young woman who had returned to the embroidering of a child's frock, "this is the conductor of whom I told you. Miss Kent is my granddaughter's governess," he explained.

The conductor put his hat on the table and leaned toward Mr. Fitzgerald.

"Then she's here—the little girl is?" he asked eagerly. "She found you?"

Mr. Fitzgerald smiled slightly.

"No," he answered. "It's an astonishing thing—but we haven't been able to trace her. She seems to have lost herself completely. I shall not give her up, however."

The conductor glanced around the porch, at Miss Kent, the children's books——

"You have another grandchild?" he asked, politely puzzled.

Mr. Fitzgerald laced his aristocratic fingers about the arms of his chair.

"No," he said. "I have only one, but I choose to be entirely ready to receive her at any time. I asked you to call, thinking you might cast some light on the subject. Will you be good enough to tell me exactly what you remember?"

The conductor looked down for a long minute at his well-polished shoes. Miss Kent's swift needle went in and out—Mr. Fitzgerald waited. There was no sound but the purring of two electric fans in the ceiling, the rustle of the pages of a book with gay pictures on a little table.

"So you—can't find her," he said at last slowly. "Poor little soul! I can see her little hand on my knee so plain and those big eyes looming up—her telling me so trusting how long she'd waited to have a grandpa—and how glad he'd be to see her. I didn't understand, sir, that day—no matter who she was—how you could pass her by——"

"I asked whether or not you remembered any details of her conversation," Mr. Fitzgerald interrupted shortly. "Did she say where her home was?"

The conductor thought seriously again.

"No," he said at last, "she didn't. They were already on the train when I took up my run and only said that they were going

The famous Valspar boiling water test

A Birthday, and the youngsters had a party. The clever young host had an accident—but proved himself equal to the emergency. He likewise proved the waterproofness of a Valsparred floor!

Parties hold no terrors for homes where Valentine's Valspar is used. Children can play to their heart's content and Mother need not worry about injury to her beautiful floors, furniture or woodwork. For Valspar is proof against household accidents. It's the one varnish for all surfaces.

And there's no limit to Valspar's possibilities. It is wonderful the way it freshens up the home. Dull, shabby furniture, worn floors, soiled, discolored woodwork, become bright and new-looking under its rejuvenating influence.

Use Valspar on anything that needs varnishing—indoors and out. For it's weatherproof, too! Easy to apply—it brushes freely and evenly, and dries hard overnight.

And don't forget that Valspar is also made in a wide variety of beautiful colors. Any color you want in Valspar-Enamels and Valspar Varnish-Stains.

to St. Louis to find her grandfather. Then, when they mentioned your name, I recalled it from your luggage, as I told you."

Mr. Fitzgerald shifted in his chair slightly.

"You didn't ask or tell her anything after you spoke to me?" he asked.

"I didn't see either of them again," the conductor told him. "I was going back—but I couldn't find the heart to do it."

Somehow now that he saw the old aristocrat in the midst of this luxury—now that the occasion brought to him memory of the stubbed little toes, the wistful eyes, the eager stories of the grandfather she'd waited for—it made him even more resentful than he had been before. He felt no awe now of multimillionaire or the mansion he lived in.

He assured them that there was not a suggestion that he could give them—and then, in no uncertain terms, he expressed the opinion that had been gathering in his mind since the moment he had stood at the end of that coach on the tenth of June and had seen that brief drama take place.

Miss Kent hastily left. Cuffly came to the door and speedily went away again. The white poodle frolicked out from the house, but promptly turned tail and hurried back.

But Mr. Fitzgerald sat perfectly still and listened. The conductor finished entirely, brought out a striped handkerchief and wiped his much-perspiring face, murmured to himself that he guessed he hadn't shined his shoes for nothing—then the multimillionare touched a bell.

"Bring the gentleman some iced grape-juice," he said to the servant who answered. Then he turned to the conductor.

"Sir," he said quietly, "had you said all that to me six weeks ago I should have had you forcibly removed. To-day—I thank you for saying to me what I have never had the candor to say to myself!"

MEG did not get stronger. At first she went every day to the lot with Texas, then every other day, then every other day only when the lot was very close to the cars.

And little Texas grew all the while more a part of the spot-light, more like a flower blooming in the wind, more radiant when it came time to work, more gracious every time she came back with the applause from the big top sounding in her ears.

Doctor Mifflin had swung a hammock from his tent to the band-wagon for Meg and she would lie there smiling as the folks passed her in their wooden slop shoes on the way to the ring. She would call to them with gay little words, she would laugh at the clowns around the door, and listen, her eyes misted with love, to her own little girl's marvelous success.

"Is it fun for you, Sugar Plum?" she would smile. "Do you like it?"

And little Texas would pucker her lips and throw kisses to the whole world.

"Mother, dear," she would say, "I can't wait till the music starts."

They put away for Meg every penny that was earned and Doctor Mifflin said that, though she didn't get stronger, she would be stronger when they could go somewhere where she could have wonderful air and be away from the travel that was wearing, no matter how gentle they made it for her.

"We take turns, don't we," the little girl laughed one day when the act was done and she, all dressed, lay flat on the ground by Meg's hammock, Jim's monkey sitting across her knees, solemnly picking a dandelion to pieces. "I used to stay out by the back door and wait for you—now you stay out and wait for me! Think of that, mother! I never thought in the whole world I could be like you. Do I really work well, Mama Meg? Do I really seem like you?"

"Very much like I did when I was your age, dear," Meg told her. "I was twelve, too, when I began, though taller than you. My mother cried every time I went into the ring. I used to wonder why—but now—I know."

Texas unceremoniously dislodged the monkey and sat up and looked at her slender young mother.

"But you don't cry, Mama Meg, do you?" she demanded. "When my dress is like a rainbow, and I know my tricks so well—you wouldn't cry, Mama Meg?"

But, even as the little girl talked, tears came up in Meg's eyes, causing two little arms to scramble around her quick—the monkey squealing pettishly at being so thrust aside.

"I'm afraid I do cry, darling," Meg faltered. "Mothers always cry when babies grow out of their arms."

THE afternoon show was just closing, the bell across the hippodrome track clanging for the Roman races. Texas, on her knees on the grass, cuddled against Meg's shoulder and was whispering loving little words in her ear when Bum Casey came shuffling on to the scene—to inform Texas that a gentleman was waiting to see her in the menagerie.

"But I don't know anybody," Texas demurred.

Bum, however, only knew that the man had asked for Texas, so Meg brushed a daub of marshmallow sugar from the little round nose and told her to run along and see who it was.

The very next minute she came chattering back, her eyes glowing, her hand tucked in that of a little old man in new pin-stripe trousers, his hat under his arm, his hair thin and gray, his necktie red—and precisely tied.

The monkey on Texas's shoulder gibbered at both of them as Texas, in pink-cheeked excitement, tried to tell a dozen things at once. When they reached the hammock, she glanced warily around the doctor's tent toward the dressing-room.

"Mother, just think of it! This is Mr. Fobes," she said breathlessly. "He's come to marry Mrs. Sunny and we've got to surprize her something wonderful."

"To marry Mrs. Sunny, dear," Meg exclaimed, sitting up to smile at the little man whose cheeks suddenly grew very red. "Why, what do you mean?"

"Now, I hadn't said—" he stammered, "I hadn't thought—I hadn't figured on Lucy saying——"

Meg instantly felt his embarrassment.

"Just sit right down, Mr. Fobes," she urged. "I'm so glad to meet the gentleman who was kind to my little girl. Texas didn't know what she was saying, of course."

"But I do know what I'm saying, mother," the child insisted. "Mrs. Sunny told me if she ever sent for Jason she'd marry him—didn't she, Jason—I mean Mr. Fobes?"

"And Mrs. Sunny sent for you, Mr. Fobes?" Meg asked.

"Why no, she didn't," Texas dimpled, "I did. She doesn't know it at all. But I thought a wedding would be such fun, because Aunt Mary has white satin flowers for a bride's veil in the trunk, and I could wear my——"

But Jim's monkey brought the wedding plans abruptly to a close by suddenly leaping from Texas's knee straight at Mr. Fobes, who sprang up from his chair, began shaking his coat violently—and tried to free himself, preserve his dignity and keep out of sight of the dresing-tent all at once.

Meg hastily secured the monkey, while Texas leaned against the hammock rope in shouts of laughter.

"Oh, Mr. Fobes, what a funny dance you were doing," she bubbled.

Meg reached for Texas's hand to silence her, and then the little girl saw that her mother was looking over her head with odd expression of suspense—she saw that Mr. Fobes was looking beyond her too, his dim old eyes bright with sudden tears, his hand held out tremblingly—and suddenly she saw Mrs. Sunny, like a pale little rose in a soft pink dress, her gray hair pinned in tiny curls around her head, her fingers caught together in a helpless sort of way.

Texas stepped toward Mrs. Sunny and held a hand out to each of them.

"Lucy," she said, her head on one side in her odd little way, "don't you know who it is? It's Jason come after you."

Then Mrs. Sunny wrinkled up her nose and smiled.

"Jason needs somebody to tidy him," she said. "What's happened to his collar and tie?"

Mr. Fobes smiled too, and wiped the corner of his eyes with his thumb.

"I left my grip in the ticket-wagon," he said. "Maybe we'd better get a clean collar, had we?"

Damp diapers

To guard against the chafing they will cause

Over a million mothers use this safe baby powder

"ALL napkins should be removed as soon as wet or soiled, and the parts kept scrupulously clean and well-powdered."

DR. L. EMMETT HOLT

WHEN baby is wet, he himself will announce that fact to you, by crying.

Crying is the only way a baby has of telling you how uncomfortable he is—and how the damp clinging diaper is stinging his tender skin.

Dr. L. Emmett Holt, America's great authority on the care of infants, says that to prevent chafing where it most frequently occurs, where the parts are so frequently wet and soiled, "the utmost pains should be taken that all napkins be removed as soon as wet or soiled, and the parts kept scrupulously clean and well-powdered."

The powder must be incomparably pure. It must have been guarded all through the process of its preparation from the slightest possibility of the entrance of any foreign matter. And it must contain nothing but healing, soothing elements.

THESE are the reasons why over a million of the young mothers in America already know that Johnson's baby powder is safe to use.

Johnson and Johnson are well known to everybody as the makers of Red Cross absorbent cotton and Johnson and Johnson sterilized gauze. And they are even better known to physicians as the makers of hundreds of other articles for the medical profession. Everything they make must be surgically clean, antiseptically safe. It was to them, therefore, that physicians turned when they wanted a baby powder they could depend on and could recommend.

Johnson and Johnson have been preparing that baby powder ever since in their great laboratories.

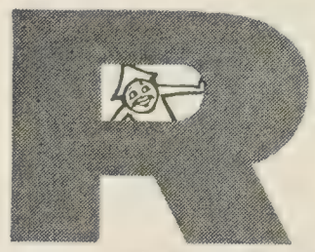
The function of Johnson's Baby Powder is to guard against chafing from damp diapers and the infection caused by moisture lurking in the creases of the skin. It is wonderfully absorbent. And it has the faint sweet odor that will keep baby sweet and fresh all through the day.

It should be used invariably after the daily bath, and after every changing of the diapers.

To enable all mothers to know for themselves the goodness and purity of this beneficent powder, Johnson and Johnson are now offering free, to the readers of this magazine, a small can of it together with their concise little book on the care of baby skin, "The Faith of a Baby." Just send them your address on the coupon below.



Johnson & Johnson, New Brunswick, N.J.

Texas and Meg watched the two cross the sunset meadow, Mrs. Sunny touching his arm shyly to show him the way.

Texas wrapped her checkered apron around Jim's monkey in a grotesque little skirt.

"Mother," she said thoughtfully, "it must be lovely to be a bridesmaid. I hope Mrs. Sunny won't forget who started this wedding."

A GREAT deal of Kingsley Fitzgerald's business had been put aside or trusted to Cuffly during the weeks since the finding of his grandchild had been his uppermost thought, but in the last week of July a cotton corporation in which he owned controlling interest really demanded his presence in Springfield, Illinois.

There was great excitement in the kitchen the morning Mr. Fitzgerald sent word that he would like to have his cook, Mrs. Becker, ready at seven the following morning to accompany Mr. Cuffly, Mr. Zylder and himself to Springfield. His explanation was merely that he wished to have her oversee the making of some kitchen fixtures at a small mill in Springfield. He didn't admit, even to himself, that he felt the need of her calm presence.

It gave Becker, the butler, a slightly disconcerted feeling to see his wife setting forth with trim black hat and suit and grip in the most elegant limousine in St. Louis as one of a multimillionaire party—but he assisted her into the car as respectfully as if she had been a Fitzgerald herself.

When they arrived at Springfield, they found the town turned into a carnival—paper streamers flying, tent shows holding forth on the corners and the streets so crowded they were half an hour getting to their hotel.

Mr. Cuffly had had their rooms previously arranged for, and Mrs. Becker immediately went about ordering Mr. Fitzgerald's lunch. It was from one of the maids that she found out what was causing the buzz in town. It was circus day!

"Now there!" Mrs. Becker chirped all to herself, "that's just exactly what Mr. Fitzgerald needs to take him out of himself! He wouldn't go, though—unless somebody just made him. Let me see——"

She bustled to the elevator, down-stairs to the lobby ticket-stand and twenty minutes later when she arranged her employer's luncheon-table in his private suite there were placed conspiciously with the silver two reserved seats to the Great Melbourne Shows.

"Hm—" he said as he sat down—"what's this?"

So Mrs. Becker explained.

"If you and Mr. Zylder go, sir," she urged, "it will do you a world of good! I dare say, Mr. Fitzgerald, sir, you'd even come back with an appetite!"

"Very kind of you, Mrs. Becker," the multimillionaire said, bowing slightly, "very thoughtful. But a circus is something I invariably avoid. The heat and noise of it displease me."

Mrs. Becker's disappointment was obvious, but somewhat lessened when it was finally arranged that she and Cuffly should go instead.

Mr. Fitzgerald and Mr. Zylder hired a car and drove about town, then returned to the hotel and waited the return of the very tall secretary and the very short cook. It amused Mr. Fitzgerald that the two had gone together.

"Zylder, I begin to feel like a man with a family," he said. "It's an odd thing—change of mind—isn't it?"

It was dinner-time when Cuffly and Mrs. Becker returned, Mrs. Becker bearing with a guilty look a red balloon on a bobbing stick. Cuffly had taken the performance in a dignified way, but Mrs. Becker was overflowing with it.

"And Mr. Fitzgerald—a little girl!" she said rapturously, "—like an angel! They say there ain't another person in the world can go up in the air like she did, and I believe it! Why, Mr. Fitzgerald, I thought my heart was going right out of my shoes! And I had the good fortune, Mr. Fitzgerald, to sit right by the door where she passed and I couldn't resist it, Mr. Fitzgerald—I reached right out and caught hold of her hand! She was that near to me—the blessed lamb! And I said, 'That was wonderful, dearie,' and she smiled right at me—'Oh, thank you!' she said like a beautiful little angel!"

"I made Mrs. Becker change seats with me when the clowns came out," Mr. Cuffly remarked. "I thought it was my duty to Becker in his absence. No telling whose hand she would have been holding next!"

"No, indeed, sir!" she said to her employer. "You know I behave with the greatest decorum! But that little girl somehow put my mind to our little Miss Kingsley, sir, so pretty she was, and just about a size! I only said a word to her—thinking of our child! There isn't anything new between you and Mr. Zylder, I suppose?"

"No," Mr. Fitzgerald said with a breath that was almost a sigh, "I regret to say there is none, Mrs. Becker, but in appreciation of your interest, I want to assure you we are leaving no stones unturned!"

Mrs. Becker gathered up her balloon, her fan and bonnet.

"Now, couldn't you and Mr. Zylder see fit to go to the circus to-night, sir?" she presumed to suggest. "I do so feel it would cheer you up, and you could see the wonderful little girl in the air, sir!"

"No, thank you, Mrs. Becker," her employer replied in a tone of definiteness. "No, indeed. As I told you before, a circus is something I prefer to avoid."

And Mrs. Becker hastily left as she saw Cuffly making preparations for Mr. Fitzgerald, after the somewhat strenuous day, to go immediately to bed.

IT WAS doubtful if anything—even the well-remembered explosion of the kitchen stove—had ever caused as much disturbance as the going away of Jason Fobes. Mrs. Crandle had not been able to find out a thing about it and at the breakfast-table, following his gay and sudden leave-taking, she openly announced (as much for the effect on the other boarders as for her own satisfaction) that his disregard for her peace of mind in the matter should cost him his place in her household upon his return.

"When I shelter people under my roof," she said with spirit, "I certainly consider that they owe me certain explanations! When I have sewed Jason Fobes shirt-buttons on for thirty years, I do say I should be more than a business convenience."

But his going away was as nothing to his return, which occurred five days later just at lunch-time. If a stage had been set and timed for him, the curtain should have gone up exactly when and as it did! The boarders were just seated—Mr. Fobes's place vacant and the one next it where Texas had sat. Chairs were just hitching into comfort and napkins fluffing out when the door pushed open and Mr. Fobes, in light gray, with pansies in his buttonhole, beamed in upon them.

"Well, hello everybody," he greeted gaily. "Glad to find you just as I left you!"

Mrs. Parsons, as usual, engineered the response. "Why, good afternoon," she twittered. "Do come in and sit down, and tell us where you have been! Another new suit! Now, Mr. Fobes! Mr. Fobes!"

She shook her finger at him playfully, then observed some one behind him in the shadow, observed that some one's hand was in his!

"Why—why, is somebody with you?" she asked in polite surprize as Mr. Fobes stepped aside and drew some one in beside him—a little lady whose hands fussed with a lace handkerchief in her Alice-blue pocket and tucked at shy curls peeping out from an Alice-blue bonnet.

Mrs. Crandle appeared in the doorway just in time to hear her oldest boarder's answer to her most talkative one.

"Yes," he said proudly. "I brought Mrs. Jason Fobes!"

There was a rustle of silence as every head turned to Mr. Fobes and the little Alice-blue bride—then Peralee's black face appeared in the kitchen door unceremoniously behind Mrs. Crandle, her eyes fairly popping.

"Good night, Mistah Fohbes!" she burst forth. "Y'all done git wedded? Well, ain't she a lil' doll!"

The gentlemen boarders remembered themselves and rose, grinning broadly; out of sheer excitement the lady boarders rose too, while Mrs. Crandle bustled into the china-closet for the best napkins, then just caught little Mrs. Jason Fobes in her arms and kissed her.

"There, you dear thing, come in and sit right down and get acquainted. Mr. Fobes, congratulations! I'm sure I don't begrudge anybody one mite of happiness, and all is forgiven between us—but if you had told me, as you should, I could have had pink crêpe paper strung up to the lights. Well, I can get the parlor flowers out any way."

So amidst the pretty confusion of introductions, congratulations and the array on the table of the variegated wax roses, Mrs. Sunny Bill Peck found herself entirely Mrs. Jason Fobes—the center of bubbling attention and the object of her husband's open adoration.

After five minutes Mrs. Crandle ushered a glowing Peralee in from the kitchen bearing a huge fluff of uncut lemon pie which was placed before the shy little guest of the day.

"There! That's your wedding-cake," Mrs. Crandle announced in a tone that dared any one in the world to dispute it. "There's no reason I can see why a weddin' needs cake any more'n pie. A bride can cut pie and give it out as handy as cake, and most folks like pie better. Of course, if Jason had confided in me ahead," she said meaningly as she wiped the pie-knife and put it before the bride, "I could 'a' been prepared with trimmed cake or anything."

"Well, it isn't too late to tell us now where you've been, Mr. Fobes," Mrs. Parsons put in. "Do tell us all about it. Mrs. Fobes wouldn't mind, would you, dear?"

Mrs. Fobes smiled up at Jason.

"Of course not," she said. "Jason, tell the folks where we were married."

Mr. Fobes patted her hand.

"Well," he said, "it'll surprize you folks all right. Lucy and I were sweethearts fifty years ago." He said the fifty as though fifty made it so much more precious than just one or two. "But I might never have found her again if that little circus girl hadn't come here to breakfast."

Two or three of the boarders glanced apprehensively at Mrs. Crandle, but she was smiling serenely.

"Go on," she said. "I can stand to hear it as well as anybody."

"Nobody can figure out how things happen odd as they do—but Lucy was part of the same circus the little girl told us about, and that was how it happened. We were married yesterday morning in a church at South Bend, Indiana, with the circus folks all there and little Texas for the bridesmaid. She sent her love to all the boarders——"

"And sent you each a pressed daisy from the wedding-bouquet," Mrs. Fobes added softly.

"And this morning," Mr. Fobes went on with pride he didn't try to conceal, "Mrs. Fobes and myself found a home just out of the city, furnished as complete as we want—and we hope you'll all be out to see us—you, too, Mrs. Crandle."

"A home!" Mrs. Parsons echoed rapturously. "Oh, how sweet! What's it like, Mrs. Fobes?"

"Well," the little bride said happily, "it has a front porch and a garden of flowers and a few nice chickens and an—an apple-tree."

"Did that child's grandfather find her?" Mrs. Crandle asked abruptly.

"Why, the little thing found out she didn't have any grandfather," Mrs. Fobes told them. "She's working in the circus now to take care of her mother, bless her beautiful heart!"

"Didn't have any grandfather!" Mrs. Parsons exclaimed. "Why, Mr. Fobes, didn't any one ever tell you he came here after her?"

"Indeed he did," Mrs. Crandle informed them, "but it was on Friday, Mr. Fobes, so you missed it. The grandfather and another gentleman spent an entire morning here discussing it and that child's grandfather is a multimillionaire, Mr. Fobes."

"But why—why didn't she find him when she came here?" Mrs. Fobes asked excitedly, "or why hasn't he come to find her?"

Mrs. Crandle jerked at her apron uneasily.

"Well, the truth is," she confessed, "it seems to be my fault. I didn't hear anything the child said about herself that morning—so I just told the old man I didn't know anything about where she went to—and I didn't see any sense in asking his name or address—so afterward we didn't have any way to find him!" She sniffed softly and put the corner of her apron to her lips. "I—I felt terrible about it," she quavered. "I've—Ive tried hard as I could to think up a way to fix it."

"Why not write the child about it, Mr.

This Will Make a Great Difference in Your Life

This NEW way solves, exquisitely, woman's oldest hygienic problem—and provides security, poise and immaculacy impossible under old conditions . . . by providing three unique features unknown before!

A BRIDGE, a dinner, a dance . . . a filmy frock to be worn . . . a motor trip that will last for hours!—these no longer come as problems.

Under old conditions, the average woman spent almost one-sixth of her time in self-consciousness, so many of her activities were ill-timed. Now she lives every precious day, unhandicapped.

Modern science has discovered a new way in personal hygiene. A way that contrasts the uncertainty of old methods with a security that is absolute.

Women have changed their hygienic habits. Eight in every ten women in the better walks of life employ this new way.

These new factors assure immaculacy, every hour of every day

This new way embodies three factors of importance . . . plus many others.

It is different in material from any other product obtainable for this purpose.

It absorbs 16 times its own weight in moisture! It is 5 times as absorbent as the ordinary cotton pad. And thus assures a true protection.

It is as easily disposed of as a piece of tissue . . . and thus banishes the embarrassing difficulty of disposal . . . and laundry.

It is deodorized . . . and thus supplies a feeling of security that old ways denied.

AND . . . it is obtainable everywhere, at every drug store, every department store—virtually at every corner—to meet emergencies.

You ask for them by name, and without hesitancy, simply by saying—Kotex.

Test Kotex, please

If you have not tried Kotex, please do. It will make a great difference in your life, in your viewpoint, in your peace of mind and health.

60% of many ills, common to women, according to many leading medical authorities, are traced to the use of unsafe and unsanitary makeshift methods.

Hygienic authorities charge almost 80% of the lack of charm, poise and immaculacy, expected of women in this modern day, to the same mistake in hygiene.

Thus on every count, millions are turning to this new way.

A fair test will prove its advantages beyond all question. No other method will ever satisfy.

Obtain Kotex today at any department or drug store. In many you'll find them ready-wrapped on a display table, and ready to take out without even having to ask.

You'll appreciate these 3 factors

(1) Utter protection—Kotex absorbs 16 times its own weight in moisture. 5 times that of the ordinary cotton pad, and is deodorized, thus assuring double protection.

(2) No laundry. As easy to dispose of as a piece of tissue—thus ending the trying problem of disposal.

(3) Easy to buy anywhere.* Many stores keep them ready-wrapped—help yourself, pay the clerk, that is all.

CELLUCOTTON PRODUCTS CO., 166 West Jackson Boulevard, Chicago

No laundry—discard as easily as a piece of tissue.

KOTEX
DEODORIZED

Kotex Regular: 65c per dozen
Kotex-Super: 90c per dozen

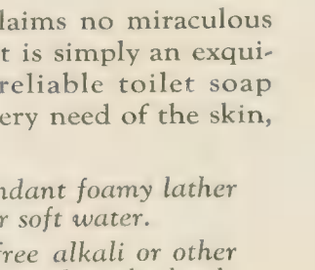
Still youthful and lovely at fifty

BUT the daughters of today—will their complexions be smooth and unblemished at fifty? The rush of modern times, the promise of marvelous results from quick beauty treatments, the very heavy use of cosmetics—all combine to ruin the skin long before the age of middle life.

More than ever, today's girl needs the careful cleansing of her skin with a pure soap and warm water. For over thirty years fastidious women have relied upon Resinol Soap to protect and preserve the freshness of their complexions, and the modern girl will find no worthy substitute.

Resinol Soap claims no miraculous healing powers—it is simply an exquisitely pure and reliable toilet soap which satisfies every need of the skin, because:

It gives an abundant foamy lather in either hard or soft water.



It contains no free alkali or other harsh properties, and is absolutely non-irritant to the tenderest skin.

It has no heavy perfume or strong odor—just the delightfully distinctive fragrance which comes from its Resinol properties—those properties which make its rich color and give protection to the skin.

It rinses easily and leaves the skin so refreshed and invigorated that you know it has been cleansed to the depths of each tiny pore.

Resinol Ointment is a ready aid to Resinol Soap. In addition to being widely used for eczema, rashes, chafing, etc., thousands of women find it indispensable for clearing away blackheads, blotches and similar blemishes.

Fobes?" the insurance agent suggested. "Maybe she knows where to get hold of him—or how to."

"Of course she doesn't," Mrs. Parsons interrupted in a superior tone, "or she'd have done it when she came here on purpose. I wouldn't tell her about it and get her all worked up unless we can find him first."

"No," Mr. Fobes said, considering thoughtfully, while his wife just slipped her fingers into his and watched him anxiously. "It wouldn't be right to tell her after she's got her grandfather all out of her head once. What we want to do is find out if this really was her grandfather—isn't that right, Lucy?"

"Oh, yes, Jason," she nodded eagerly, "if we only can. Those two are so alone—and Meg is so weak. How can we find him, Jason?"

And there was the problem. How could they? Then in the quiet of every one thinking, waiting, with only the sniff-sniff of Mrs. Crandle's tears, Peralee with a plate and dripping dish-rag in her hand shoved the door open.

"The gen'min wid' de gran'pappy say he one ob dese tuhneys ob de law," she offered placidly. "Mistah Fobes, ef somebody git all de tuhneys ob de law, dis hyah one maght be imongst 'em. Ain' dat so?"

Mrs. Parsons half rose.

"Why, Peralee!" she exclaimed. "Why didn't you tell us that? That's a grand idea."

Peralee shuffled her feet across the rug.

"Nevah figahed it out 'till dis hyah minute," she said.

The insurance agent laughed.

"Yes, fine idea," he said with amused sarcasm. "There are exactly three thousand one hundred and eighty-four attorneys in St. Louis."

Mr. Fobes folded his napkin briskly and looked at his silver watch.

"Then we better get right started, Lucy," he said as he rose, and reached for the hand of the little woman at his right. "It may take quite a few days to call on three thousand one hundred and eighty-four!"

Mrs. Crandle came forward, the end of her apron crumpled in her hand.

"Oh, Mr. Fobes, could you really do it?" she asked chokingly. "I'd be ten years younger if some one could only find that man! But Mr. Fobes, that's an awful undertaking! Can you ever do it? How can you?"

The other boarders had risen too, and were gathered around the little man with the light-gray suit and purple-pansy boutonnière.

"No reason why I can't, if Lucy'll help me," he said crisply. "I've taken a month off, and if lemon pie can be a wedding-cake—I don't see any reason why calling on lawyers can't be a honeymoon, eh, Lucy?"

"Why of course, Jason," she agreed. "I'll tell you what we'll do! We'll take them by the alphabet! We'll write down every attorney in St. Louis in alphabetical order and just begin with A and go straight through! We ought to do thirty A's this very afternoon!"

They lost no time about starting. All the boarders followed to the door. Peralee and Mrs. Crandle followed to the gate—and thus Mr. Jason Fobes and Lucy began their quest.

"By the way, Mrs. Fobes," Mrs. Crandle called, "just for my own satisfaction, you write on pink paper, don't you?"

"Why, no," Lucy smiled, I never had any pink paper."

Mrs. Crandle's face took on a look of utter blankness—but before she became completely overcome, Lucy stopped and turned back a step.

"—But Little Texas does," she added.

IT WAS a weary little bride and a foot-sore groom who took a crowded street-car home to the outskirts of St. Louis at the end of the second week of their honeymoon. The chickens had pecked lonesomely around the gate every day for two weeks, the breeze talked lonesomely to the apple-tree, but every night at the little white kitchen table, over tea and fresh berries, the little house had ceased to be lonesome and made up for what it had missed in the daytime.

Lucy tucked her arm in Jason's this second Saturday night of the first two weeks as they turned from the street-car corner down the block to their own cottage.

"How far are we down the alphabet, dear?" he asked her. "To-day when I went to the last J—to a Mr. Theodore Judd—he said he thought there were more lawyers in St. Louis than in any other place in the world. He said, Lucy, he never had understood himself how so many men could be lawyers! He said he didn't see how we ever could find one among them all—and if it wasn't for that little girl, Lucy——"

Lucy smiled up at him.

"That's it, Jason," she said. "It seems like when our house is so pretty and we're so happy, Jason, there isn't enough we could do for her! I can't believe it's really us, Jason—can you? All my life, Jason, I've wanted little blue bowls to cook in!"

They found a pile of letters on the door?" step. It had been Lucy's idea to write all the "K" and "L" lawyers, and ask the question by post. Jason followed her into the tiny kitchen and while she tied on her apron he sat on the window-seat and opened the mail—opened every letter with hope and put it aside with disappointment.

"Jason," Lucy sighed, "sometimes it almost seems like that lawyer told you—that we can't do it! To-day on the street I almost gave up and then I thought of that little pink letter Texas wrote you and——"

"Say," Jason interrupted, "there's a pink letter in with these! It must be—sure, it's Texas!"

The preparation for supper was put aside, and the other lawyer letters as Mr. Fobes moved over and made room in the window-seat for Lucy, as he read aloud:

DEAR TWO PEOPLE:

As long as we miss Mrs. Sunny so much and of course Mrs. Crandle misses Mr. Fobes. I guess this wedding was too bad on almost everybody's account but yours. I will tell you all the news.

Jim's monkey ate too much and is very sick. The camel mama stepped on her baby and we had to leave it behind yesterday in a grave. It was very sad. There are three beautiful new pelican eggs. Every one was glad when I read them your last letter, but in answer, Mr. Fobes; please scuse me from saying what was the speshal reason I wanted to be friends with you. I think I better not tell you. Mother is very happy but not as well, but nothing hurts her and the doctor says some day she is going to be better. I am making you a towel with pink lace that is pretty. Aunt Mary says the stitches are disgrasful, but I think they look like triming. Mr. Melbourne who owns our circus died yesterday in New York City, so Papa Saunders feels very bad. It was a funny thing that Mr. Melbourne and the camel died the same day. Your loving bridesmaid,

TEXAS.

There was a lump in Jason's throat and in Lucy's when he finished. He put the letter rather abruptly aside and turned to the remaining lawyer letters in silence.

"Well, dear," he said when the last one was opened "they all have the same answer. It seems we've been from one office to another, and one building to another, and one telephone to another, till there can't be any more of them!"

"Yes, it does seem so," Lucy smiled tiredly, "it does! And we aren't half through yet! But if there was a chance left in the last lawyer's office in the world it would be worth trying, if it was to make that little thing happy, wouldn't it, Jason?"

"Yes, Lucy," her husband said, "it would. While you're fixing up supper, how'd it be if I write all the letter M's?"

"That'd be fine!" She smiled and dropped a kiss on his bald spot as he took out his fountain pen and reached to the window-shelf for paper.

The chickens pecked around the door, a little wind rustled the apple-tree, there was a light in the window, the scratching of a pen—and the sound of a spoon mixing muffins in a blue bowl.

GRAY dawn was just coming in the state-room window one morning, two weeks after Texas' letter to Mr. Fobes and Lucy, when the child awakened sharply as though something had called her.

In the opposite bed Meg was sitting up, her hand against her head, her face flushed, her breath coming quickly. Instantly Texas was beside her.

"Mother dear," she whispered, "what is it? Does something hurt you?"

Meg reached for the little girl's hand.

"Mother can't see, dear," she said, trying to keep back the tremor in her voice. "I wonder, Texas, could you get to the doctor?"

In her bare feet and her trailing nightgown Texas ran into the hall. She found the porter of the bachelors' car at the door, and while the train sped on through the gray fields of early morning, while the little girl waited breathlessly on the platform, Doctor Mifflin hastily pulled trousers over pajamas, found his case and hurried outside to follow her. He was half the car behind her when he heard her cry out as she opened the door. Meg, still and white, lay on the floor.

Doctor Mifflin, in his strong arms, put her on the bed and quieted Texas with a word, as her mother's eyes gradually trembled open.

It was hard for the little girl to be still and know Meg was all right when she lay there with colorless hands, colorless lips, scarcely breathing at all—but as dawn changed from gray to rose, rose to gold, Meg's strength returned a little, till she could tell the doctor all about it and take Texas's cold little hand in hers.

The doctor held the little girl in his lap.

"Texas," he asked, "could you get along without your mother and let me send her away where some one can take care of her? That's the only thing that will put color back in her cheeks for you!"

Texas fought the tears back from her eyes.

"Yes, doctor," she said sturdily. "I'll stay here and be such a good acrobat we'll have a million dollars! Can you find any place that will make my mother well?"

Doctor Mifflin caught her by the shoulders and kissed her soundly.

"That's my wonderful Meg and Texas," he said. "That's what makes me proud of you. I'll find a quiet place to-day, and to-morrow I'll take Mama Meg myself."

So he left them with the sunrise breaking through their window, the train coming to a stop by a meadow across which, slim and black, the poles of the circus tents already stood against the sky.

The doctor sent Torchy to stay with Meg all day—though Texas didn't leave her until they heard the music for the afternoon show coming across from the big top.

The little girl clung to Meg's hands and kissed them over and over—tears she couldn't keep back falling hot on Meg's fingers—and from the meadow as far as she could see the car-window she waved and looked back and looked back and looked back.

Meg's face, too, was wet with tears for the little girl so brave, so sweet and fearless.

Texas slipped into the dressing-tent quietly and sat so still for madame to fix the curls that the others watched her, wondering. All herself she put on the pale pink tights, the little shoes, stepped into the rainbow dress and reached the one big hook. Then she sat silent and pale as a little shadow, and waited for her music.

When at last it was time, Aunt Mary watched her across the open space to the big top.

"Somethin' ails that little girl," she said to Gipsy Jean. "I'm goin' to get Joe up here to take her home and put her to bed when she's done."

The show was in Virginia. The big top was suffocatingly crowded.

Texas carried through to her whirlwind finish, did her arrow drop to the ring, opened her arms wide to the people and threw her kisses again and again. She stopped a minute at the back door to steady herself, to push back her damp curls, then started across to the dressing-tent—an appealingly beautiful little thing, a delicate flower with petals just a bit wilted. Joe was by the dressing-tent door, sitting on the ground against the end pole.

"Joe, it's pretty warm to-day." Texas smiled—then put her head on one side seriously. "Joe, it's very warm."

Joe motioned with his head to the other side of her.

"Somebody's waitin' to see you," he said briefly.

Texas glanced up. She had noticed only Joe.

A tall old gentleman was standing there—like some picture, Texas thought instantly, that she had once seen of a king. He carried an ebony stick and a silk hat in his hand—and was looking at her so searchingly it frightened her a little.

"How do you do?" she said hesitantly. "Did you want to see me?"

"You are Kingsley Fitzgerald?" he asked.

She smiled.

"Why, yes," she said. "How do you know that?"

"I am Kingsley Fitzgerald, also," he said bluntly. "I am your grandfather."

Her ride home seemed like a year

THAT one ride home with him was enough. They were wedged quite closely together in a very crowded train. And the more he tried to make conversation, the more irritated and uncomfortable she became.

She was never so glad to be at her home station. Her ride had seemed to her like a year's trip.

And how happy she was that she had never accepted his invitations to go dancing!

You, yourself, rarely know when you have halitosis (unpleasant breath). That's the insidious thing about it. And even your closest friends won't tell you.

Sometimes, of course, halitosis comes from some deep-seated organic disorder that requires professional advice. But usually—and fortunately—halitosis is only a local condition that yields to the regular use of Listerine as a mouth wash and gargle. It is an interesting thing that this well-known antiseptic that has been in use for years for surgical dressings, possesses these unusual properties as a breath deodorant.

Test the remarkable deodorizing effects of Listerine this way: Rub a little onion on your fingers. Then apply Listerine and note how quickly the onion odor disappears.

This safe and long-trusted antiseptic has dozens of different uses: note the little circular that comes with every bottle. Your druggist sells Listerine in the original brown package only—never in bulk. There are four sizes: 14 ounce, 7 ounce, 3 ounce and 1¼ ounce. Buy the large size for economy.—Lambert Pharmacal Company, Saint Louis, U. S. A.

LISTERINE Throat Tablets are now available. Please do not make the mistake of expecting them to correct bad breath. Rely on the Liquid, Listerine. Containing all of the antiseptic essential oils of Listerine, however, they are very valuable as a relief for throat irritations—25 cents.

Sweetest lil' fellow

It's a pleasure to comfort a lovable mite of a baby! And a science! The little body is so indescribably tender and delicate that it must be handled with exquisite care.

After his bath, roll baby up comfortably in soft, warm towels and pat him dry. And don't forget his daily powder bath, his dry shower with Mennen's... It keeps skin clean and comfortable for hours.

Mennen's was the first Borated Talcum. And mothers consider it the safest. It has been the choice of doctors and nurses for over half a century because it is scientifically prepared to combat the three foes of baby's skin.

Like millions of thirsty little sponges, Mennen Borated Talcum quickly absorbs all irritating moisture—all the perspiration, urine and bath-water that lies hidden in the deep folds of baby's skin.

Soft, pure Mennen Borated also forms a smooth, silky film over the body, guarding baby's sensitive nerves from the agony of friction—from the continual rubbing of damp clothes and woolly blankets.

And in this cooling, soothing talcum are blended five mild, healing elements—all gently antiseptic — which ward off infection and keep the roly-poly body always healthy and contented.

Each can of Mennen Borated Talcum holds millions of flecks of comfort, happy days and peaceful nights for you and baby. Dust it on the little fellow after every bath and change of diapers, before each nap and whenever he grows restless.

When baby presents a new problem—and any baby can puzzle a young mother to the point of distraction—Aunt Belle's Baby Book is a never-failing source of reference... Just use the coupon.

SHALL YOU PUNISH YOUR CHILD?

The educative reward carries none of the competitive spirit with it. It is gained by the child's projecting himself into the life of the child beside him and helping him to a greater happiness and a higher achievement.

Nick was no artist, but Dante, two seats down the row, undoubtedly was. The school offered no prize to Dante, but suggested that the children raise the money to enable him to study art. Nick smiled the smile of one who knows what he knows and from then on haunted the wood-working shop at school, until the instructor wondered if he ever went anywhere else and the janitor threatened to sweep him out. He made little wooden rabbits whose ears twitched itchingly and whose tails bobbed delightfully when you pulled the string. They were mounted on red and yellow wheels that carried them swiftly.

At the fair he sold them to eager buyers and turned the money over to the treasurer of the art fund with a triumph no craftsman's medal could have inspired. No material reward could have brought that light to his eyes nor summoned the affection that shone in Dante's when they fell on those little rabbits carved out of bits of waste wood and perfected in hoarded moments.

Life is a series of high and low places with stretches of level grayness between. When we mount the heights we believe we are being rewarded with joy and when we wander in the depths we are sure we are being punished. We believe that these influences of joy and sorrow effect a growth of spirit and in our groping way we try to administer them to the children.

Handle punishments and rewards as though they were edged tools. Test them. Will they make the child happier and more unselfish? Are they free from irritation and revenge and dominance? Will they free the spirit of the child or hamper it with grudging and fear? Does the child understand and accept them?

If not, shun them. Your help does not lie in them. Search a little farther and find the gentleness that turns away wrath, the kindness that calls out love and the understanding that draws children to you. For unless you draw them closer by your teaching, it were better they go untaught.

ONE INCREASING PURPOSE

the property. Sir Henry and Lady England had been calling on Lord Staverton, at Staverton Park, when this information had been given; and "property being the drain instead of the source that it is now," Andrew had added, "you can guess what that means."

Sim, at this first meeting, had taken a great fancy to the pair. Sir Henry, a man of about sixty, was of the type beneath whose picture any generation, Sim had thought, would have written: "Portrait of an English Gentleman." His wife's picture, Sim had said to himself, would have exactly partnered it: "Portrait of an English Lady."

Two daughters of the England family were the next that Sim met; and this also was at Staverton Park and on the following night, a Saturday, when they and he (the only outside guests) came up to join the house-party at dinner. Lord Staverton, who was a widower, was wonderfully tender to his very old mother, the hostess of the evening, and she was enormously proud of her famous son. It was his habit on these occasions to keep his whole party, and not the men only, seated about the table for general conversation when coffee was served; and it was in this pleasantly easy half-hour that Sim noticed an attribute in the two England daughters that struck him as, in his expression to Linda, "uncommonly nice."

The two had presented themselves to his notice as girls in their final 'teens, very alike, notably pretty, and with an engaging air, unusual in their day, of quite frankly enjoying their invitation. They had the air of high pleasure merely in the fact of being alive, a feature wherein they differed sharply from Lord Staverton's married daughter (who, unusually, had suffered herself to be her father's guest on this occasion) and from a friend she had brought with her to support her through the ordeal, both of whom looked as if they would a great deal rather be dead. The daughter, Lady Millicent Fell, prominent in gossip journalism as Lady Tony Fell, wife of Captain the Honorable Tony Fell, sat opposite Sim; her friend was on his left. This lady who had been introduced to Sim by Lady Tony as "Fly Jennet, the writer, you know," was thin to the point of emaciation, shingled as to her hair, shorn as to her clothes, ate scarcely anything, spoke not at all, and at the earliest possible moment planted in her mouth a cigaret-tube (which stretched half across the table), drafts from which she inhaled in volumes that caused the cigaret to splutter like a firework and exhaled, through her nose, in such very minute quantities as to suggest that like the most modern engines she consumed her own smoke. Sim, at whose other hand was Linda, had made but one effort at conversation with her.

"I'm afraid I am the worst possible person to be put beside you," his effort had been. "I read hardly anything. What do you write?"

Miss Fly Jennet, who was flicking a bit of fish around her plate, addressed the fish and not Sim. "I don't write—I gesture."

"Ah!" said Sim; and tried again.

"Do you know B. C. D.'s novels?"

"I thank God," said Miss Fly Jennet to the fish, "I do not."

SIM tried no more. He gave himself to Linda's jolly rattle and to watching the obvious pleasure with which the England girls were enjoying themselves. The "uncommonly nice" incident came when, during the sitting round at coffee, Lord Staverton spoke down the table.

"Well, mother, I think it would be nice if some one were to entertain us, don't you?"

"Why, very, very nice, dear," agreed the very old lady. She beamed down the table. "Now, who will? Miss Jennet, my daughter tells me that you recite quite wonderfully and that——"

Miss Fly Jennet, without removing the tube from her mouth, announced, "I don't care to."

The very old lady flushed. Sim was looking at the elder of the England girls and saw her flush quite painfully also. Lord Staverton's mother caught her eye. "My dear, your mother was telling me—little French ballads, I think she said——"

The girl jumped to her feet. "Of course I will, Mrs. Miller. They're silly little things, I'm afraid, but we know them by heart, my sister and I, and if you would like it——"

Her sister as spontaneously and unaffectedly jumped up. A piano was in the great room and they went to it, and, one playing, the other stood beside her and they gave in delightfully fresh voices a delightful little French song, one of the series of old national jingles, familiar to the French as are our own nursery rhymes to us. More were called for, more as prettily and delightfully given.

Uncommonly nice, Sim thought; and uncommonly rare, Linda agreed; and quite astoundingly rare was the reason the sisters quite simply gave for leaving early when, later in the evening, dancing in progress, they announced their intention.

The very old lady was going to bed, and the two were thanking her for their evening as Sim remembered children used to be taught to thank their hosts after a children's party. "But, my dears," the old lady was saying, "though it's late for me, it's nothing for you. They keep this up for hours yet."

"Why, we've scarcely begun," Linda joined in.

The younger girl said: "It's ever and ever so kind of you, but we just must go. As it is, it will be well after eleven when we get in and it's Saturday, you see."

"Saturday?" questioned Linda.

The elder girl explained: "Why, father never likes any of us to be frolicking into Sunday."

Miss Fly Jennet, who lolled her cadaverous body against the wall near by, allowed her cigaret-tube to fall from her fingers and laid her head back, mouth open, petrified.

Observance of Sunday to that extent was petrifying to wider circles than that represented by Miss Jennet. It further interested Sim in the Englands, and on an early occasion he rode over to call. Thereafter he came to see a great deal of them.

The two girls, as he found, were called Rose and May. There was another girl, younger, Violet—"My English nosegay," as Lady England once said of them—and three sons, Henry and John and Willie, whose ages ran from sixteen to somewhere short of thirty and who all happened to be at home, from school, from Cambridge and from the army, during the period of Sim's visits. Why, when watching these people and when in the atmosphere they created about him, came there to Sim a sense of being in the atmosphere of—what? He could not define it, but he felt that something different was around him.

A DAY came when a chance incident threw up to him a clue.

Sim's friend, the author B. C. D. Ash, happened to be visiting in the neighborhood. He not only knew the Englands but, astonishingly, appeared to like calling there. "They're about the only family in the world I'm not frightened of," he explained to Sim.

One rainy Saturday these two happened to be lunching at the Englands' and B. C. D. was reminded by the weather to tell of a Summer-end, the wettest and coldest he had ever known, which he had spent entirely alone in a tiny chalet perched high up in the French Alps. He had done everything for himself there, he told, cooking on a spirit-stove and freezing whenever he was not out tramping. His sole neighbor was a woman who had, as he expressed it, "the most shocking teeth and the loveliest eyes in Haute-Savoie." She had fled from her husband who ill-treated her and she lived about a hundred yards from B. C. D. in a tumble-down cabin with a goat and some chickens. He got friendly with her, he explained. She smoked a huge wooden pipe and they used to smoke and talk together.

"She got to know that I used to sit, frozen with cold, writing every morning," B. C. D. went on, "and one particularly vile day in she came to me with a hot brick she'd warmed in her stove for me to put my feet on. You know, I thought that was the kindest action I ever had come across."

There was a general assent.

"Why, it was more than kind," Rose England declared. "It was just exactly what we call——"

She was nodded at by some of the others. "Yes, yes," they declared, "I was just going to say it."

"—exactly," Rose went on, "what we call K. O. H. kindness."

"And K. O. H.?" Sim asked.

May England joined in. "Why, K. O. H. kindnesses are the sort that spring just out of simple goodness of heart—Kingdom of Heaven kindness."

"Don't you think it's rather good?" John England said. "Don't you think it's rather—well, that things like bringing that hot brick just are Kingdom of Heaven kindness?"

John was a man not much younger than Sim himself, and a soldier—yet he said what he had said, albeit with a slightly laughing air, quite naturally, as though he had been stating some matter-of-fact thing.

"I think it's just perfect," Sim agreed. "K. O. H. kindness—I shall remember that."

He thought it better than perfect. He was immensely struck by it. He sat silent for some little time, then he began telling of old blind Yeoman, the seats he was making and why.

They all were interested.

"What brought it to my mind," Sim said, "was that K. O. H. of yours. The idea of putting seats for weary travelers at the top of the hills, I'd call that——"

They were delighted with him. "You've got it exactly," he was told. "Mother, he must be given the freedom of the family. The idea of seats like that—yes, that's just what K. O. H. kindness is."

"What K. O. H. kindness is." His thought as he rode home to Old Ballards was:

"K. O. H.; Kingdom of Heaven; that is the secret of those people; that is the secret of all that abounding happiness they have, of their uncommon affection for one another. It is not religion, an abstract, that is in their house—it is K. O. H., a positive, a living, human thing—divinely human—it is the spirit of the Kingdom of Heaven."

He arrived at Old Ballards and Margaret Yeoman, who had heard him, met him at the door, in her hand a telegram. It had come for him an hour before, she said.

He opened it. It was from Charles:

"Old Gand dead. Perhaps you'll come this time."

CHARLES'S hand when he had written the telegram, writing one also in precisely similar terms to Andrew, had trembled so that he could hardly form the words. It had come at last! He had grown to believe that old Gand never would die. In Charles's mind that very old man was as stable within the house as was the roof above it. He suddenly was dead, and the immediate visible effect upon Charles was precisely as if the roof suddenly had crashed in. He went about shaking.

But Alice's own hand that took the telegrams from him also shook.

Charles said, stuttering: "I don't see why you should go with the telegrams. Why can't a servant go?"

Her own voice would have stammered if she had not, by a tremendous effort, controlled it. She said: "I would like to go. I feel that I would like a little fresh air. I shall not be ten minutes."

She went. She almost ran down the drive, the telegrams fluttering in her hand. She was terrified of the house. She was not terrified of the dead in the house—she was terrified of the living, Swiss Jule, who stood beside the dead.

That very day she had been with Conrad Bryne in the drawing-room, on the sofa, in his arms. She had been saying to him, "Well, I am desperately worried about it," and it was with those words, she was convinced of it, that the horror had begun—she was sure that as she pronounced them she had heard old Gand's door open up-stairs; but criminally she had taken no notice.

"Well, I am desperately worried about it," she had said; "our letters are gone."

"Darling, don't worry. They're just mislaid. They'll turn up."

"But, Conrad, how can they be mislaid? I kept them, I keep telling you, in that box, all tied together with a piece of ribbon, and the box was locked."

"But it was still locked when you went to it."

"I know it was—that's the mystery."

Conrad Bryne was not taking her worry very seriously. He was certain, on the facts, that his letters to Alice had not been removed from their hiding. He stroked her face. "Darling, surely that proves it." He smiled down on her. "Let me be a lawyer stating the facts. The box, my lord, is an enormous old-fashioned wooden chest. It is absolutely stuffed with old clothes of the defendant's husband——"

She smiled. He was soothing her. "Conrad, how ridiculous you are!"

"Absolutely stuffed, my lord. The defendant's husband never will get rid of his old clothes and the chest will scarcely shut for them. The defendant has the only key and it is a curious old-fashioned key. She should have burned the letters, my lord——"

She murmured, "But I loved them, my lord," and he stopped and long they kissed—and the door, without premonitory noise, was opened and Swiss Jule stood there.

"Pardon," Swiss Jule said, and slightly bowed. "Pardon, I came for my scissors. I have looked everywhere for them. As I turned the handle of the door, I remembered it was in the bathroom I had them. Pardon."

And he bowed again and was gone.

Alice, whose hand was on her heart, was first to speak. "Oh, Conrad!" She pressed her side as though it wrung her.

He got up. He was very white. "He didn't see," he said.

"He must have seen."

"I think he didn't. My eye was on the door and I saw it open. We were apart before he clearly had the room."

"Conrad, if he did see——"

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Conrad, if he did see, he will tell."

He came to her and took her hand and patted it. "He didn't see."

Conviction was not in his voice. She withdrew her hand. "Oh, Conrad!"

He crossed the room and stood looking from the window. Suddenly, with a snap of his fingers, he turned and came to her. "I'm a fool. If he saw, let him tell. I'm a doctor, am I not? I was examining your throat, feeling pulse, getting something out of your eye."

He was afire with a heat hot as if it had been virtue indignant.

"I'll go straight to him now and——"

"Conrad, for God's sake, no!"

He would have carried out his word, but pity for her alarms overbore him. So he kissed her confidently. "Run straight up now and reassure yourself about those letters. That's two frights you've had to-day. I've cured one. Tell me to-morrow that I was right about the other."

He scarcely had gone, she still was on the sofa collecting herself sufficiently to go and look again for the letters when she heard feet on the stairs.

Swiss Jule, inflection or emotion of no kind in his toneless voice, said: "Pardon, Patient has passed."

Patient passed! Old Gand dead!

She managed, "Dead?"

"Yes, dead. Patient has passed at last."

Her mind was reeling. It staggered tipsily between relief at the blow which had not come and stunning at the unexpectedness of the long-expected. She said, "I will come with you," and she advanced and followed Swiss Jule up the stairs.

THEY entered the room. She never before had seen death—she could not believe that she saw it now. Her mind seemed a blank. What had happened to her just before this? She remembered. She was in the presence of something much more terrible than death. She looked across the bed at Swiss Jule, and because she found Swiss Jule steadily regarding her she looked swiftly away again.

She said: "But—" and stopped. Whichever way her words shaped, a terror stood in the path of her speech like a sword. She tried again. "But Doctor Bryne saw him, he was perfectly normal then, not ten minutes ago."

"Longer than that."

Straight into the sword! How long had they been together in the drawing-room? She had no idea.

But she must defend this. "It couldn't have been more than ten minutes. He was asleep then, when the doctor left him."

Swiss Jule let the time question go. "Yes, Patient passed in his sleep. Patient is gone from us at last!"

She perceived now that Swiss Jule was affected. He was wiping his eyes.

"When? Just this minute?"

Affected or no, Jule's voice still was his toneless and deliberate voice. "Much longer than that. It would be nearer twenty minutes ago."

"Twenty minutes! But Doctor Bryne was here then?"

"Yes, I came in to tell him. You will remember that I came in?"

Her heart went ice.

"You said you had come to look for something—for your scissors."

"I saw that you were busy."

She looked full at Swiss Jule. Swiss Jule dropped his eyes and smoothed the pillow.

"But if he was dead?"

She was trembling. Swiss Jule smoothed away at the pillow, but she could see that it needed no smoothing. His voice came in a murmur, addressed to the pillow, soft as his touch upon it. "Well, there was nothing the doctor could do, was there? I saw that you were busy, so I just went off. When I I came again, thinking perhaps you would have finished, he was gone."

She must have this out. "Finished what?"

Still smoothing away, still to the pillow: "Oh, how should I know, Mrs. Paris? That's not for me to know."

O menace! She dared not dare again. She walked to the window. She noticed for the first time that the blinds were drawn and she went from one to another pulling them where they were not at their full extent. It was Saturday, Charles's day at home for lunch. Charles! He would be in any moment now. She heard her voice say: "I will go and draw the other blinds. It will break the news to my husband."

"So it will," Swiss Jule agreed. His voice was changed. It suddenly was fuller, warmer, a human note was in it. She looked at him. He straightened himself from his stooped pose above the pillow and the face he turned toward her also was changed.

"Mrs. Paris," he said, "I would like to say, if you will permit me, that of course this is not like an ordinary death, is it? Any time these two years it might have happened and better if it had. It has been a strain on you, Mrs. Paris, one way and another. That I know, if I may say so."

She was arrested. She took at once the note he offered her. "A strain, yes, in many ways," she said. Was it this death has wrought this change in him? Had he indeed seen nothing in the room down-stairs? She desired above all things to placate this man and she went on: "You have been very devoted, Jule, we all recognize that."

He bowed. "I was fond of Patient and Patient was fond of me, that I do know, Mrs. Paris."

Alice agreed. "I am sure he was." She somehow did not quite like this frequent "Mrs. Paris" in his words, a kind of edging rather closely to her. But all else was infinitely reassuring. "I am sure he was," she repeated.

Swiss Jule smiled gratefully. "He spoke just before he died."

"He spoke?' She somehow was newly alarmed.

Swiss Jule nodded, sadly smiling. "Dear Patient, yes."

"But you said—in his sleep?"

"He just woke up and opened his eyes and had a sudden little rally (I've seen it happen before like that) and spoke, and then closed his eyes again and passed away."

"What did he say?"

Swiss Jule looked embarrassed and said he was embarrassed. He gave the little shred of a different cough. "Well, it is difficult, awkward, for me to say, Mrs. Paris. It was about me."

"About you?"

Again the cough. "About leaving me some money—that is what makes it so awkward for me to say, you see."

"But you don't tell me."

Swiss Jule looked down and fumbled the sheet between his fingers. "Why, you see, Mrs. Paris, I knew that the last will Patient made was before I came here, and these last two years he never was able to make any change in it, much though he wanted to."

"What did he say?"

Swiss Jule twisted the sheet. "Oh, nothing of any consequence, Mrs. Paris. Just that he wanted to show his gratitude."

Alice hated this man, but she was afraid of him. After all, that Jule should be recompensed was natural enough. "I can quite understand that, Jule," she said.

Swiss Jule looked up, warmly pleased. "Oh, thank you, Mrs. Paris. Well, what he said just before he died was that he wanted me to have a thousand pounds."

ALICE was amazed. A thousand pounds seemed to her an incredible, a monstrous sum.

"It is extraordinary," she exclaimed.

"Well, I only just mention it, Mrs. Paris, you understand, being his last words, you see. Of course, if I had had a witness, it would have been different, but not having a witness—well," Swiss Jule shrugged his shoulders, "there's nothing more to be said, is there?"

"I don't quite see there is. No."

Swiss Jule suddenly straightened his pose. "But there is, though, Mrs. Paris." The diffidence, the awkwardness were gone. His voice, with his straightening, had a straightness of ring. "There is just one thing to be said. A thousand pounds is a lot of money to feel you might have had and must lose just because there wasn't no witness to his last wish. So there is just one thing, Mrs. Paris—knowing me as you do, Mrs. Paris, I suppose you couldn't say that you knew Patient said I was to have a thousand pounds?"

There was that in his tone, in his swift change of manner, which caused Alice to clench the fingers of her hands. "Say I knew it? However could I say I knew it?"

"Well, of course, you couldn't in one way. When I say, though, knowing me as you do, what I mean is—" he looked penetratingly at her—"what I mean is me knowing you as I do, Mrs. Paris." He stopped and Alice said nothing. "Perhaps you hadn't thought of that?" Swiss Jule said.

Alice's fingers that had been clenched now were terribly constricted. "What is it that you mean?"

"Why, I have said it, Mrs. Paris. Me knowing you as I do, you couldn't say, I suppose, that you were here when he died and were witness to what he said?"

"I absolutely do not understand you."

Swiss Jule said like a rap: "I think you do."

He was declared. She knew him now. The mask was off his face. She must fight.

Like a rap again: "I think you do."

God, yes, she must fight! She took all her courage in her hands: "Are you being insolent?"

"Why should I be insolent, Mrs. Paris? I'm just giving you—an offer. Could you have been witness to what Patient said, that's all I'm asking?"

"I feel that you are being insolent."

"I'm just asking you, could you have been witness?"

"You have had your answer."

"I'll take it then." A common sound was coming in his speech. "I'll take it then, Mrs. Paris. It doesn't matter so much to me. If I'm to lose a thousand pounds I've got the worth of it, I reckon."

Alice said nothing. She was shaking.

Swiss Jule went on. "There's little trifles he always kept under his pillow. I could keep them, I suppose?"

"It would be for my husband to decide."

"That's just what I thought." Swiss Jule put his hand beneath the pillow. "I'll show Mr. Paris and ask him." He drew forth his hand.

A packet of letters tied with blue ribbon was in his hand.

Alice caught at a chair and sat down heavily.

She scarcely knew her voice when she was able at last to speak. "Ah, you are a thief," her voice said.

"There's worse words—to a woman—than thief," Swiss Jule said.

They remained then silent for quite two minutes, the dead man between them.

Alice got up then, very slowly, as if her limbs were jointless, nerveless, and very slowly went toward the door.

As she reached it: "Mind you, I've never been one to make trouble," Swiss Jule said.

Alice dragged on.

"There's no trouble here that I can see, Mrs. Paris."

Alice turned and presented to the other an ashen face. "There's ruin," she said. "You know it."

"There isn't. There's nothing."

"What do you mean now?"

"There's two places, Mrs. Paris, for these letters. One's in the fire and you shall see me put them there, and one's in Mr. Paris's hands, and that I don't want any more than you."

"What is it that you do want?"

"It's just to have you witness that Patient said what I said he said."

Alice said, astounding herself: "Of course he never said it. Of course you are a liar as well as a thief."

Swiss Jule shrugged his shoulders. "Oh, any one can call names." As if suddenly the names had sunken into him, his face became venomous. "But it's dangerous for you, Mrs. Paris." He started and had a listening attitude. "There is Mr. Paris coming up. Mind you, I'm asking nothing of you. Your word may not get me the money—how do I know it will? I'll take my chance of that. I'm not robbing you—I'm not robbing any one. It's coming out of Patient's pocket if it comes, and glad he'd be to know it, I'm sure." Charles was on the landing. "You've got to choose, Mrs. Paris, and quick—or I shall."

CHARLES came in. He looked ghastly. His hands were shaking. "What has happened? The blinds—" He looked at the bed. "Is he dead?"

Alice said: "Yes, dead, Charles."

Charles went over to the bed and peered. "Good God, dead? Good God, dead?" He turned to Alice. "When?"

"Just now, just a little while ago."

He turned and stared again. "I must have been coming along from the station. Good God, I must have been just walking along." He put his hands to the sides of his head. "Good God, dead!" He began to kneel and before his knees touched the floor was up again. "I don't know what I am doing." He bit his left thumb. "I can't think." He turned about. "How did it happen? Who was here?"

Swiss Jule looked at Alice. Alice did not speak.

Swiss Jule said: "Me and Mrs. Paris, Mr. Paris."

He said to Alice: "You were here?"

Her voice, scarcely to be heard, said: "Yes."

"Well, well, what happened, what happened?"

"Charles, he just passed away."

He muttered: "Passed away! Good God, passed away!" He said: "In his sleep?"

Alice looked at Swiss Jule. Swiss Jule was standing before the fire with his hands behind his back. Alice said: "In his sleep, yes."

Swiss Jule brought his hands before him. The packet was covered with his fingers, his thumbs behind it. "Just a minute before, though, Mr. Paris, Patient had opened his eyes, and Patient spoke."

"Spoke?"

"Quite clearly, Patient did, didn't he, Mrs. Paris?"

Alice said: "Yes."

"What did he say?"

Alice said: "He thanked Jule."

"Ah, nothing else? Nothing about us? Nothing about me?"

"Nothing, Charles. He thanked Jule." She wiped her face with her handkerchief. "And he said that out of his money he wanted Jule to have—" she wiped her face again, "—a thousand pounds."

Swiss Jule turned and attended to the fire.

IMMEDIATELY upon the death of old Gand events of very great moment arose and followed one after the other in the lives of that small world (the persons of this book).

It was five of the afternoon when Sim was handed the snarl that was Charles's telegram, and it was the snarl that caused him within two hours to be on his way to London. "Perhaps you'll come this time." The snarl caused in him an immense compassion for Charles. K. O. H.—the Kingdom of Heaven. He had come straight from a house where was established the spirit of this most happy kingdom, and in Charles's telegram he saw with his mental eye the desolation of the heart where only bitterness and turmoil were, no peace. Poor, poor old Charles! There was no sort of practical use in going to Charles at once, that night; but nevertheless Sim rushed his preparations for the journey.

He had an hour to spare in London before a connection on to Blackheath was possible. From Barton Magna he had sent a telegram to Andrew as well as to Charles and so he took Mayfair Street on his way.

Andrew was alone; Linda was out. Sim went past the servant who, admitting him, gave him this information, and into the study where he was told Andrew was. Something strange was in Andrew's manner, Sim thought. Something stranger yet he found in Linda's room, unexpectedly, he saw before he left.

HE OPENED the study door. Andrew was standing before the fire, hands in pockets, head bent. He appeared to be in deep thought.

"Niggs!"

Andrew very slowly raised his head. He looked at Sim, but did not seem to realize his presence.

Sim came forward.

"Niggs, old man, how goes it?"

"Oh, pretty good, Sim."

He roused himself, but his face remained iron hard, his voice stony. He extended his hand. "I quite forgot you were coming, Sim."

"It's only a dash in. I must go in half an hour. Poor old Gand, eh, Niggs?"

"Ah, yes, poor old Gand."

The tone was that which touches, perfunctorily, a bygone recollection, remote, of no concern.

"But poor old Charles, I'm thinking most," Sim said. "This will rattle poor old Charles, Niggs."

"I suppose it will."

Sim then spoke at some length of the circumstances that had brought him up. Andrew, if he listened at all, listened without comment of a single word. No subject can run single-handedly for long. Sim stretched himself. "Oh, well!" he said and dismissed it. "How's Linda?"

"Linda is all right."

"Out on the spree somewhere, of course?"

Andrew said: "You may be perfectly sure of that."

ONE INCREASING PURPOSE

His tone, extraordinarily hard, caused Sim to look at him, surprised. He spoke again and the words came with a suddenness and with a hardness as of a pent emotion suddenly escaped. "Does it occur to you," he said, "that straight on the top of this news was not precisely the night for her to go out?"

Sim was entirely surprized. The idea never had come to him; that Andrew should present it was astonishing. "Why, no," he said. "No, it doesn't, Niggs."

"It occurs to me—" said Andrew. He shut his mouth like a trap—and immediately there flashed before Sim's mental eyes Linda at the station seeing him off to Barton Magna and her strange, sudden exclamation: "Sim, sometimes Andrew looks at me and I've a feeling——"

He said: "Niggs, old man, I absolutely do not see it. Old Gand's death in all the circumstances is little enough to any of us. It's nothing at all to Linda——"

The trap opened. "Would you say my wishes equally should be nothing at all?"

Sim got up. "I say, old man, I don't much like this."

He had put a hand on Andrew's arm. Andrew turned to look at the clock behind him. His action shook away the hand. "If you are going to catch that train——"

"Niggs, you're not having some tiff with Linda?"

"You'll miss that train."

"I've time yet. Old man, it's not for me to butt in——"

Andrew said: "It is not." He held out his hand. "Good night, Sim."

THE door opened. Linda, a glittering evening wrap about her, stood there.

She began: "I didn't—" She saw Sim. "Oh, Sim!" She came to him very impulsively and gave him her hand. "Sim, you are staying the night?"

Her voice, all her gesture, had a pleading note. Her hand was very cold, he thought. He held it while he said: "I'm booked for Charles. He is expecting me. I'm this minute off."

"Oh!" she said and dropped his hand and turned to Andrew. "I didn't go on to the dance. I changed my mind. I've come back."

Andrew said: "So I perceive."

Sim saw her eyelids flicker, as though she winced. She turned to him. "The car can take you on. It's waiting. I'll see you in."

"A message for Charles?" Sim asked of Andrew.

"Tell him I'll phone him first thing in the morning."

"I will. Good night, old man."

"Good night, Sim."

Descending the stairs, Linda said nothing. At the foot she turned to him. "Sim, I've had a hell of a row with Andrew."

"Linda!"

"Oh, hell's own row!" She was smiling, but it was no smile that he had ever known from her.

"Linda, you can't have had. Not a real row."

Even the pale smile was gone. "We have, Sim."

"But it's impossible—you and Niggs. Whatever about?"

"Oh, things. I can't tell you now. I wish you had been staying the night, Sim."

He thought of Charles. But human help, most clear to see, was much needed, too, in this poor lovely creature, always so radiant, so forlorn now. "Would you like me to stay, Linda?"

She seemed to consider. She put out a hand to him. "Sim, do you remember my saying to you when I was seeing you off to Barton that I wished to God you were not going?"

"I remember it well. It troubled me."

"I didn't know how truly I spoke. I said it because I had caught Andrew looking at me sometimes—frighteningly. Well, I was right in what I thought. Since then, it's happened."

He put his other hand to the hand she had extended to him. "But, Linda, you amaze me. Frighteningly? Happened? You can't possibly tell me you are frightened of Andrew?"

She tried to speak, but her lips quivered. It utterly distressed him.

"Linda!" he said. "Linda!"

She said: "Not frightened of him, Sim—frightened—of losing him."

"Losing him! Linda, he worships you."

She shook her head. "Sim, Andrew doesn't love me."

He stared. He could have thought her mad.

"Linda, you must be crazy. Not love you! You make me laugh."

"Ah, don't laugh! Sim, what Andrew loves— Do you remember what you said to me at the station when I asked you what you thought of me?"

He smiled at her. "I remember it perfectly. I said 'the jolliest, the loveliest——' "

She stopped him. "That is what Andrew loves."

He still smiled. "Whatever is the difference!"

She said, "All Andrew loves is just the surface, Sim—just what you call the loveliness—just this—" she made with her hand a gesture, touching her face, indicating from head to foot her person. "Just that—" she pointed to where across the hall a great wall mirror stood and showed her. "Just that—the picture."

He took her hand and ran his fingers softly up her naked arm and smiled at her. "It is absurd," he said. "How can he love the lovely picture that you are and yet not love you who are the lovely picture? Why, Niggs would tear his heart out for you, you know he would. Go right up to him now and be the lovely Linda that you are and see."

She seemed to be considering. "I think you are right. Yes, go now, Sim. But you'll come back? Come, now you are in London, and stay a day or two, Sim."

"As soon as ever I can leave Charles," he promised.

She stood a moment, still considering. She suddenly raised her face to his.

"Kiss me, Sim."

He stooped and kissed her, patting her shoulder. "Our lovely Linda."

"Dear Sim," she said, and turned from him and went up the stairs.

PERTURBED, he also turned, taking himself now from where distress had not been looked for to where he knew most well that he would find distress.

He did.

He found Charles, as he had expected, aggrieved at the outset at the lateness of his arrival. Charles opened the front door to him and his first words, prefaced by no greeting, struck the measure of his aggrievance. "The servants have all gone to bed," he said, taking Sim's hand and immediately releasing it. "So has Alice. I never imagined you would arrive at this hour of the night."

"I thought I would come at once. How are you, Charles?"

"There wasn't the least need."

"Well, I dare say you'll find there will be a lot of little things one way and another. Anyway, there are you and Alice to look after. This is a bad business for you, old man."

Charles led the way into the dining-room. "I'm accustomed to bad business," he said.

"Poor old man! But Charles, it is going to be better for you now in a good many ways."

Charles said sharply: "You say better for me. That just shows how little you've thought, you or Andrew or any of you, about what a tie it has been or about where I am now it's—" he snapped his fingers, he was moving about, his hands and his face going all the time—"snapped. Perhaps I'm—" he snapped again—"snapped too. How do I know where I am? I'm in the dark. I always have been in the dark."

Sim watched him, pained for him. "You mean about his affairs?"

Charles faced him across the table, and to the increase of Sim's pain for him actually leaned forward and struck the table while he spoke. "I'll tell you where I am. It will surprize you. I'm grieved, I'm sorry that that old man is gone. Now I look back and I see how he relied on me and trusted me and I tell you that I miss him."

Sim was shocked at the state he was in. It was clear that his nerves were raw as if they were sticking through his flesh. He went quickly round the table to him. "Poor old Charles—this has been a shock to you—no wonder. Sit down, old man."

Charles, suddenly limp, suffered himself to be directed to a chair at the table. He dropped into it and dropped forward his head on his arms. "I can't think," he said.

"You're thinking too much, old man. You leave all the thinking to me."

Precisely as the door suddenly had opened when he was with Andrew, now when with Charles it opened. Precisely as Linda had come, now Alice entered.

Her hair was down. She wore a wrapper. She looked very ill, Sim thought.

Her eyes at the level of Sim, she was about to greet him when her vision took in Charles, bowed on the table. "Oh, Charles!" her words were, and she went to him and stooped over him.

The note on which she spoke, her quick movement to him, was tenderly maternal. It touched Sim. She appeared to him in the few moments they now were together to be somehow and for some reason deeply sorry for Charles with the sorrow of one who was herself responsible for what she saw.

But her own state called for sympathy.

"I came down for Charles," she presently was saying. "I thought you could not be coming, Sim. I was listening for you. I think I must have fallen asleep." She shuddered violently.

Charles by this time had agreed with a suggestion from Sim that bed was the best place for them all and, quieter now, was going to the door, Alice attending him.

Sim said: "Alice, you are shivering."

She controlled herself. "It is Charles who is cold." She had a hand of his in both of hers. "Charles, you do need sleep so much. You can find your room, Sim?"

"Right, old girl. I'm so glad you came down to carry Charles off. A good night's rest is what you both want badly. And on my way up I will just look in on old Gand. I suppose I can? Jule is not there now, is he?"

"No, but he's been there the whole day, right up to an hour ago."

"He was fond of old Gand, Charles."

"Gand was fond of him. He's to have a thousand pounds from him."

Sim opened his eyes. "A thousand pounds! But, Charles, you've not seen his will?"

Charles broke out: "Of course I've not seen his will. Didn't I tell you I was all in the dark about his affairs? The will's at his bank. I'm going up for it to-morrow. This wasn't his will. This was his wish, his last wish just before he died."

Charles was again in a pitiable state. Alice, watching him so sorrowfully, was equally pitiable. Sim said: "Old man, anyway the whole thing can wait."

"How do you mean wait? Wait for what?"

"Why, Charles, till you know how his affairs stand. A thousand pounds is a lot of money."

But the suggestion made Charles worse. "Well, what if it is? It's my affair, isn't it? Old Gand's message about Jule was to me—not to you or to Andrew. There's not going to be a wrangle about it, is there?"

Sim came over to him smiling and took him by the shoulders. "You're going to bed, old man. Off with him, Alice."

Tone and touch had effect. Charles at last completely relaxed. He wiped his eyes. "I'm dog tired, Sim," he said, and he suffered himself to be led from the room.

Sim went along the up-stairs passage and quietly into the room where old Gand lay. The lights were burning. He lifted the cloth that lay upon old Gand's face and stood and looked upon the prison whence the prisoner now was gone.

What peace!

He knelt.

Prayer had not been his habit when last he stood within this room, but now he made prayer in what he knew with certain knowledge to be the living presence of his God.

"Remember, O God who pitieth, this very old man's long road; remember his uprightness, remember his courage, remember his fondness for my father, his love for my mother; remember his wish that she should bring us up in Thy knowledge and love; remember his long and grievous suffering; and, these remembering, receive him, O God to whom the weary turn, into Thy infinite compassion."

He raised his eyes and looked again upon that sanctuary that had been prison-cell.

What peace!

The Kingdom of Heaven in us all?

He bowed himself upon the bed.

THINGS, to Sim's relief, were better on the morrow. In the morning Swiss Jule left, and Alice, who had stayed in bed, unexpectedly came down to lunch and somehow seemed to have a freer air. In the afternoon the will was heard, and Charles, after the will, was almost curiously composed.

But all morning Charles was in a state of nerves deplorable to witness. Watching him, looking at him especially as he sat restlessly in the train going up for the appointment at old Gand's bank, Sim was filled with an infinite pity for him. With infinite desire he longed for courage—words—to try to tell him of his new knowledge.

He had not courage.

It was a strange will that was read that day. The old man left over sixty thousand pounds to charity; to Charles only the business and fifteen hundred pounds.

"Well, well," said Andrew when the reading was over. "I must get off."

The movement aroused Charles. Sim saw him come as with a start from rapt preoccupation. He sat up. "I have the business," he questioned, "and fifteen hundred pounds?"

"Clearly," the bank manager said.

Charles's murmur was heard: "A thousand five hundred." He drew an immense breath. He might have been a man realizing the ambition of a lifetime.

They went out—Andrew obviously intent on getting away quickly, Sim with a hand in Charles's arm, Charles irresponsive, deeply absorbed.

"Charles," Andrew said outside, "I'm glad you've got the business, as of course you were bound to, without any fuss or restrictions." His car was waiting. He shook Charles's hand as he got in. "Good, I'm glad you're fixed all right. What's this Sim was telling me about a thousand pounds to the nurse?"

Charles said absently: "Yes, that was his wish—he said it to Alice."

"Ah, well, that's your affair, of course."

Charles looked up. "Of course he will have it," he said.

Andrew said: "No doubt." He seated himself. "It rather slumps your fifteen hundred, though," he said.

"It leaves five hundred. Five hundred means a lot to me," Charles said. His voice suddenly had a ring in it, his eyes a spark—he suggested a schoolboy with a gift of money and with some mighty plan. "And everything clear, settled," he said.

Andrew's car drove off.

SIM, but more fully and genially, spoke the congratulations that Andrew had made. Charles scarcely replied, so fully absorbed was he in some thought.

Changing the subject might rouse him, Sim reasoned, and he said: "Charles, what was that little red rosette that the man who read the will was wearing on his left arm? I've noticed quite a few people wearing them. Look, there's a woman there with it."

Charles neither looked nor answered.

Curiously uncommunicative he remained not only through the journey home but in the days following. Something very new was occupying his mind. Sim, noticing this, spoke of going, and Charles made no pretense but that this would well suit him.

Sim took the news of his departure to Alice and her reception of it, "Oh, must you go, Sim?" uttered without sincerity, caused him to give a little laugh. "Alice, you don't break down and weep, I notice. Charles certainly wants to be rid of me. I believe that you do, too."

It surprized him how she colored, as though guiltily. "Sim, how can you say that?"

"Well, Charles wants me to go—he makes no bones about it, old Charles."

She avoided the direct subject. "But I think Charles is much better in the last few days," she said.

Sim's voice had a pensive note. "I don't know that I would say better. Better in one way perhaps, less—less rattled. Not better in another. What is it he has got on his mind, Alice, do you suppose?"

"On his mind?"

"You've not noticed it?"

She shook her head. "No, Sim."

He looked at her. "What is it that you have on yours, Alice?"

She was scarlet. "On mine? Nothing whatever, Sim. You are ridiculous."

As though he dismissed the subject, "Well, well," he said; but she did not speak and he pondered and then returned to it. "You both—is it ridiculous?—give me the idea of waiting for something."

She had a paper in her hand and her fingers closed on it, causing it to rustle. "Absurd," she said. The paper rustled again. "If you are apprehensive about Charles," her voice was a murmur, "you have not forgotten your promise to come to him if he should be in need of you, Sim?"

"I remember it very well." He smiled at her. "I will be waiting for it," and then he laughed. "All of us waiting for something, eh?"

Waiting for something? Sim left her and when the door was closed upon him she opened the paper—it was a letter—that was in her hand and read it again.

"Why wait? If, as I well can know, the sight of Charles and of what he has lost through that Jule-devil gives my beloved pain, why wait?"

The hand that held the letter went down to her knee. She just sat there.

SIM left on the morrow and went for a promised night or two to Andrew. Linda, looking adorable in black, had attended the funeral, but the circumstances had not availed a talk with her alone. Virtually this was the first time he had seen her since her acute distress of that hurried evening and he wondered as he approached the house how things had gone.

They seemed to have gone well; they seemed—at first—to have gone altogether. Linda greeted him in radiant spirits and radiant dress. He had no intention of reopening fears that seemed quite dissipated. "Linda, who was that man going out as I came in?"

"Lesson, that man was, little Sim boy. How nice you look! I do love seeing you, Sim. Sir Toridd Lesson, as they call him, that man was. What a name!"

Sim said: "I thought I recognized him. You know what we called him out in the war when we read about the jobs and the knighthoods he was pulling off in government work at home—the 'Orrid Lesson."

Linda laughed. "He's called that still."

"I believe you," Sim agreed, and also laughed. "Not," he continued, "that he's anything but a mighty good lesson in the way he's got on, mind you. Engineering contractor he calls his job, doesn't he, or is it contracting engineer? Anyway he contracted to some profit in those days. He's made piles, I suppose?"

"You bet he has!"

"I thought Andrew couldn't stick him at any price?"

"Andrew simply can't. When Andrew ever goes to church and they say 'Here beginneth the first lesson,' he gets up and goes out."

Sim laughed. "What is he doing here then?"

"What are you doing here, Inquisitive?"

"Talking to you."

"So was he." Linda jumped up. "Sim, forget 'Orrid Lesson and take me out to tea somewhere. I like being seen with you. Your hideousness sets me off."

Sim agreed. "Right. One thing more about the 'Orrid one, though. What was that little red rosette he had on his left arm? I see loads of people with it."

"Been vaccinated, of course."

Sim struck his hand to his forehead in mock heroics. "Ass that I am! Of course that's it—this smallpox scare—those red things have been puzzling me ever since I came to town. Have you been done, Linda?"

"Likely!" said Linda.

"Well, I don't see why not. Of course it isn't really bad anywhere except down in Westchurch, near where I am. That's where it started, you know. There've been three cases at Barton. But you never know. I've seen it in India and it's unspeakable when it once gets going. I think you ought to be vaccinated, Linda."

Linda made a face at him. "You can think what you like, Mr. Apothecary. But if you think I'm going to make my lovely arm into a chopping-block you'd better think again."

Sim said: "My dear Ugly, you needn't be done on your arm. There's no need to be done where it will show."

"That's all you know," cried Linda. "My dear little Sim boy, when I'm in one of my new evening frocks the parts of me that don't show simply aren't talked about—not by nice people."

Sim laughed aloud. "Linda, you're awful—you really are!"

She joined him impishly in his laughter, but in the very middle of it she suddenly was grave. "Oh, Sim, I know I am," she said.

A couch was beside her and she dropped on to it, hands lax, frame drooped.

He was concerned. "Linda, it was just ragging."

She smiled at him. "I know it was. But, Sim—" She stretched out a hand toward him. "Come and sit by me, Sim, and I will tell you something."

He came to her, taking her hand, and held it while he sat. "Tell me, old girl."

She put his hand to her face and rested her cheek against it. "Dear Sim, strong Sim," she said—and was silent, holding his hand there.

Immediately with her change of mood their scene in the hall that night came to his mind. "No trouble, Linda? Not——"

"Sim, just a pain."

"A pain?"

She took his hand to her heart and pressed it there. "A pain—here, Sim."

"Yes, it is that trouble of the other night," he said. "I thought it gone, you seemed so bright."

"I'm always bright," she said (her tone belied her words). "I make people, everybody, laugh as I made you just now, Sim, and in the middle of it—" She made a little gesture with her other hand. "That's what I am going to tell you, Sim." And suddenly, after silence, she began to tell him.

"Sim, I made you call out to me just now that I am awful. I know I am. But I'm not bad, Sim. I do risky things and I say risky things and I am everything that's light and reckless, but that's because it's just my nature. I live, Sim. I live every minute of every hour. Sim, I love living—but I'm not bad, Sim."

He took his hand from hers and put his arm about her shoulders: "My dear, you, bad!"

By motion of her body, a small confiding movement, she seemed to thank his gesture and his words. "I only just love living, Sim—but I've been true as true to Andrew. I only loved to live and laugh, but I never truly loved till now. And Sim, this is the pain I have when I just rattle on, and live, and set the table in a roar—that I really love Andrew, but Andrew does not love me."

A piteous thing to hear.

"Well, let that be," Sim argued. "Look, this is clear as day, that loving him now you never will be giving him a reason for--for getting grumpy—for looking at you as you think he sometimes looks."

She did not respond. She sat quite silent.

"As clear as day," he reaffirmed.

To another quarter now her mood seemed changed. She got up. "Sim, that is easy saying," she said. Her voice was somber, warning.

"It is easy doing. No need for any picture business."

"Yes, there will be need, Sim."

"What need? Come now?"

"I'm in too deep, Sim."

"Deep in what?"

She was silent. Presently she said: "Money debts."

"Oh, come!" he said. This left him unconcerned. He could not associate debts with the lavish living here. "Oh, come!"

His tone had no response in hers: "Have you got any money, Sim?"

He said lightly: "I've got about ninepence, and my return ticket."

She smiled, but palely, and she drew away and he saw his unconcern not justified: "Old girl, I dare say I could raise a hundred pounds, and jolly glad to."

"Dear Sim!" And then she said: "A hundred!"

She began to tell him of cards and of borrowings, of bills and of extravagances, principally of losses at play and of advances, from friends, from accommodating dressmakers. When she had finished, he was prepared to be taken above the estimate he formed in his mind, but he was not in the least prepared for what she told him.

"But what does it all come to? What is it that you want, Linda?"

She looked at him. "Eight thousand pounds."

"Linda!"

Never another batch that will not jell—

One minute's boiling is enough . . . Your jam and jelly cannot fail

WHAT a relief to know it will jell every time—if you just add Certo to the fruit!

With Certo you cannot have a failure. For Certo is the very element in fruit that makes it jell—taken from those fruits themselves in which it is abundant.

Some fruits never have this jellying property; it grows less in all fruits as they ripen—that is why your jams and jellies sometimes failed to set.

Now with Certo every batch you make is a success. And with one minute's boiling. No juice and flavor boiled away—half again as many glasses of delicious jam and jelly instead!

No Gray Hair—Read How

The woman of today realizes that age is no barrier to her social or business success, if she is careful to hide her age. She must not have gray hair, for if there is any one thing that indicates the loss of that precious thing called youth it is gray hair. The mission of Q-ban Hair Color Restorer is to darken hair that is already gray or starting to show signs of that telltale of age, a few gray streaks; and to darken it so gradually and with a general effect so natural that no one knows—no, not even your most intimate friends unless you choose to tell.

Q-ban Hair Color Restorer

Q-ban Hair Color Restorer, when applied to your hair according to simple and easy directions, in the privacy of your home causes a gradual darkening of the color of your hair. Indeed so gradual that your friends and associates do not notice the change. Q-ban Hair Color Restorer is sure—safe to use—not messy; a clean, daintily scented liquid.

75 cents per bottle; sold by your druggist under positive guarantee

Owing to the fact that Q-ban Hair Color Restorer works so gradually, a sample would prove nothing. Sometimes several bottles are required to obtain the desired results.' Therefore we authorize all druggists to refund your money if you are not entirely pleased—you to be the sole judge.

A Complete HEALTH FOOD DIRECTORY

MILO HASTINGS, Director of Physical Culture Health Food Laboratory, has compiled from his vast store of information a complete health food directory. Instead of writing a great volume making it necessary for you to read hundreds of pages in order to secure the knowledge you desire he has compiled a series of tables dealing with the values and effects of hundreds of different kinds of foods in connection with specific health conditions, weaknesses or results to be obtained.

To illustrate, if you are overweight and wish to reduce you turn to the weight reduction table and tell at a glance just which foods will help you to reduce, which will not add to your weight and which will make you fat. If you wish you can make your own menus from among the weight reducing or non-fat producing foods that appeal to you, or you can select your meals complete from among the dozens of carefully worked out menus supplied by Mr. Hastings.

The same is true for gaining weight, building vitality, disease resistance, conquering constipation, growth, building muscular power and others.

Another feature that you will find of unusual value is the complete and unbiased tabulation and rating of popular trade marked and branded foods.

The text is brief and to the point—the essence of information concentrated and boiled down for instant use. No one has ever before published such a book.

Supply Will Go Quickly

Ordinarily material of this nature would be built up into an elaborate beautifully bound volume and sold for several dollars a copy. The publisher would become rich from its sale because countless thousands of people would gladly pay any price for the invaluable information it contained. But Bernarr Macfadden, Father of Physical Culture, under whose auspices this unique book is being published would not have it that way. To his way of thinking no one has a right to exploit for profit, information of such tremendous import to the human race.

Accordingly, a special edition of "Physical Culture Health Food Directory" has been published as economically as possible consistent with good workmanship and material. While they last they will be supplied at the nominal price of 25c per copy—actually below cost, postage and handling considered. You realize how quickly an offer of this nature will be snapped up by eager thousands, so in order to be sure of getting your copy we earnestly advise you to send for it at once. A coupon is provided for your convenience. Make use of it to-day.

6267—The circular apron gives a smart flare to this one-piece slip-on-over-the-head frock, and the slightly different type of jabot a pretty, softening effect Use crêpe satin, satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, etc. The jabot may be made of lace edging. The dress fits closely at the hipline. Lower edge 48 inches.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The frock is smart for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6253—The apron appears in a new rôle. This time it is circular and draped across the front, leaving a diagonal line across the dress. Use satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe de Chine, etc., with lace edging vestee. With long sleeves and vestee, etc., of Georgette use printed crêpe de Chine, printed crêpe faille, etc. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 4⅜ yards 39-inch crêpe satin.

The dress is charming for ladies 36 to 48 bust.

6255—Freedom is given to this slim one-piece dress by its cluster of plaits at the left side. The smart long sleeve has two seams. Use twills, worsteds, cashmere, kasha, camel's-hair twills or wool crêpe with contrasting silk crêpe; serge with contrasting satin; or use heavy silk crêpe with satin, or satin with silk crêpe. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge with plaits drawn out 51½ inches.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch cloth.

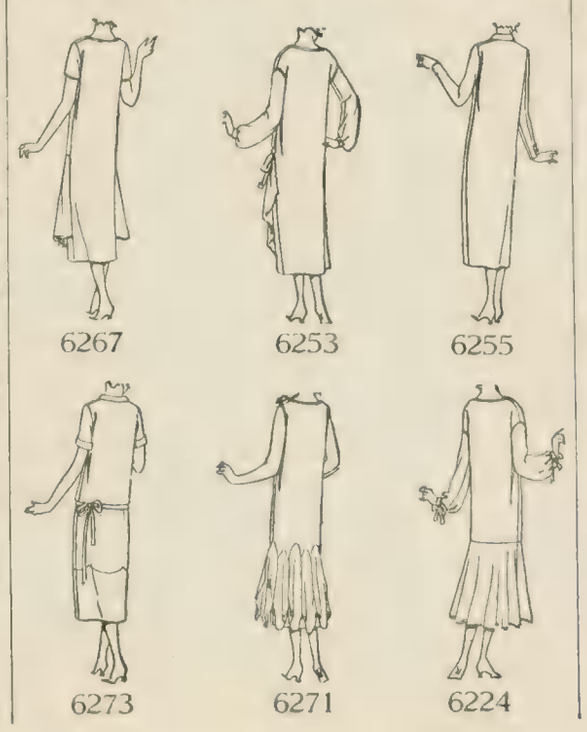
The dress is attractive for ladies 34 to 48 bust.

6273—Worsteds, kasha or camel's-hair twills with silk crêpe or heavy crêpe de Chine in self or a harmonizing color make up charmingly into a slip-over frock with a long upper part lengthened by a two-piece lower part. Or use cashmere with satin or silk crêpe; serge, ribbed wools, etc., with satin. This is a convenient style for making over a silk or wool dress. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 39 inch silk crêpe and ½ yard 54-inch soft twill.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6271—With fluttering handkerchief draperies and a hand-made flower at shoulder and hip this one-piece slip-over dress is ready for afternoon engagements. Use Georgette, chiffon or chiffon voile. The separate one-piece slip, which may have a camisole top, is made of flesh-colored satin or silk crêpe, etc. For evening wear, without sleeves, use crêpe Roma, brocaded Georgette, lace with matching chiffon, etc. The frock fits closely at the hipline. Lower edge of slip 44 inches, dress 46 inches.



36 bust requires 5¾ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6224—A circular flounce rippling all around this slip-over frock lengthens the one-piece upper part. Use satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma, Georgette, etc., with lace edging; or use printed silk crêpe, novelty crêpe satin, printed crêpe de Chine, printed Georgette, or foulards with Georgette to match, etc. Lower edge 2⅝ yards.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 39-inch crêpe satin (with circular flounce cut crosswise).

The dress is smart for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

Don't Let Sun and Wind AGE Your Skin

A dry skin is the first to grow old and nothing dries and coarsens the skin as fast as sun and wind. The improperly protected skin soon loses its youthful firmness and the little lines and other signs of age creep in long before they should. A little Ingram's Milkweed Cream applied every day fortifies the skin against exposure and keeps it always soft, firm and smooth.

Protects Cleanses Corrects

Ingram's Milkweed Cream is more than a protection, more than a cleanser and powder base. It combines certain remedial properties which correct redness, roughness, tan, freckles, blackheads, blemishes and such imperfections. The purpose of these nourishing, beautifying properties is not to cover up defects but to remove them.

Understand Your Skin Then Give It Proper Care

There's a booklet, "Health Hints," wrapped around each jar of Ingram's Milkweed Cream which every woman should read. It tells you the most effective way to use Ingram's Milkweed Cream—tells you how to use it in treating the common troubles of your skin. Read this booklet carefully. It is written by specialists to make sure that you get from Ingram's Milkweed Cream the fullest possible benefit.

Go to your druggist today and buy a jar of Ingram's Milkweed Cream—in the fifty cent or the economical dollar size. Begin its use at once. The improvement that will come to your complexion in just a few days will surprise you.

Read this

"I am a woman in my forty-ninth year and there is no one who ever takes me to be over thirty-five. Ingram's Milkweed Cream gets the credit. I have used nothing else for over twenty years." This is just one of thousands of voluntary appreciations that come to us every year from women everywhere, in society, in business and on the stage.

A Sure Way to End Dandruff

There is one sure way that never fails to remove dandruff completely, and that is to dissolve it. Then you destroy it entirely. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and two or three more applications will completely dissolve and entirely destroy every single sign and trace of it, no matter how much dandruff you may have.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop instantly, and your hair will be lustrous, glossy, silky and soft, and look and feel a hundred times better.

You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store and a four ounce bottle is all you will need. This simple remedy has never been known to fail.

6265—The collar may be buttoned up into the new high neck. Make this wrap-around one-piece frock of twills, worsteds, cashmere, serge, or wool crêpe with harmonizing satin; kasha or camel's-hair twills with contrasting silk crêpe; heavy silk crêpe with satin or heavy satin with silk crêpe. The vestee and cuffs may be detachable. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch cloth.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6233—A dress with a wide belt at the front has the appearance of being a two-piece frock. In reality it is a one-piece dress that slips on over the head. The lower edge is straight. Use light-weight flannel, silk broadcloth or heavy crêpe de Chine; plain with contrasting or printed with plain to match; plain satin with contrasting silk crêpe; plain silk crêpe, striped radium, etc.

19 years or 36 bust requires 2⅛ yards 54-inch flannel. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 38, 40 bust, misses 15 to 20 years.

6269—Inverted tucks at the sides suggest a low waistline for this one-piece frock. Use satin Canton, plain satin, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or heavy crêpe de Chine with crêpe de Chine jabot. The straight lower edge makes this slip-over frock suitable for wide borders in silk crêpe, crêpe satin or heavy crêpe de Chine with plain to match. Lower edge 46 inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch crêpe satin.

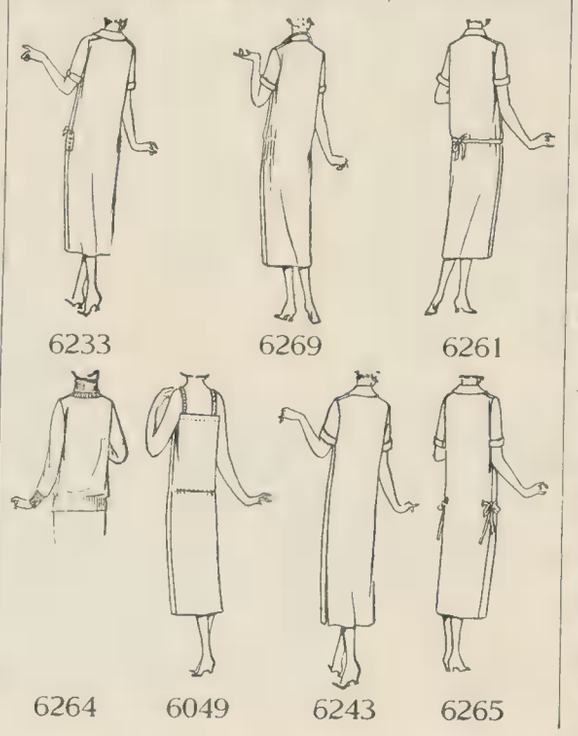
The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6261—This frock has a great deal of style. The collar can be worn either high or low and a cluster of plaits are inserted at the front. Use flannel, silk broadcloth, heavy crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, satin, etc., with contrasting. The lower edge is straight. This frock is the one-piece type and it slips on over the head.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch wool jersey. Lower edge with plaits out 1⅝ yard.

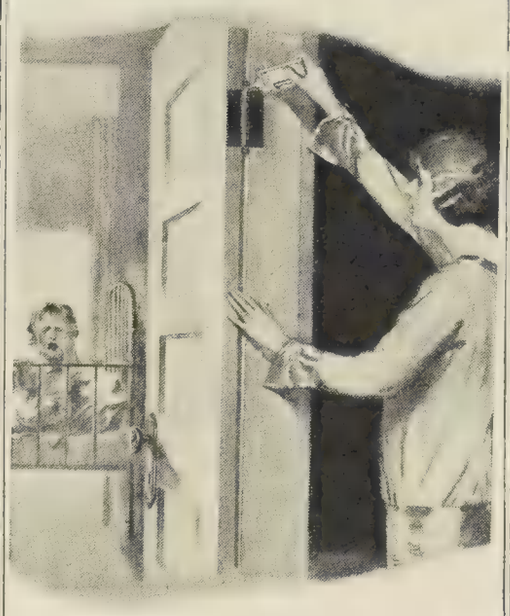
The dress is smart for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6264—6049—The turtle-neck collar, hip band and cuffs are hand knit. Or this slip-over blouse may have an open neck with fabric cuffs and hip band. The two-piece skirt has an inverted plait at the center front, and is attached to a camisole body. It may be made on an inside belt only. Use silk jersey, silk broadcloth, satin, radium, pongee, etc., for blouse, with soft twills, kasha, wool jersey, men's-wear suitings, etc., for the skirt.



36 bust and 38 hip require for blouse 1¾ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine; for skirt 2¾ yards 27-inch flannel (skirt attached to camisole.) Lower edge with plait out 52½ inches.

The blouse is for 32 to 40 bust; the skirt for ladies 35 to 49½ hip.



6243—The inverted plait at each side seam gives a cleverly hidden fulness to this slender one-piece dress. It slips on over the head and may be made of soft twills, soft worsteds, cashmere, soft kasha or soft camel's-hair twills with collar and cuffs, which may be detachable, of contrasting silk crêpe or white linen. Or use serge, silk crêpe, satin, etc. Lower edge with plaits out 55 inches.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch light-weight flannel.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

Glorious Freedom from unwanted hair—gain it quickly and thoroughly with the dainty cream, Neet. Then you are certain of lovely satin-smooth skin without any suggestion of former presence of hair.

Not the slightest trace to suggest its removal—that, today, is as important as removing hair that offends. To meet the standards of daintiness that good taste demands you simply must avoid any suggestion of the former presence of hair. Your first use of Neet will show why hundreds of thousands depend on this velvety smooth cream to bring thrilling beauty of skin where unwanted hair had been. With it you simply rinse the hair away. No other method so convenient and so rapid and satisfactory, especially for the larger surfaces of legs and arms—to remove hair from the entire forearm takes but a few minutes. Learn what Neet means to you—Buy Neet at your drug or department store, today. Test it critically if you wish. You will agree that no other method, regardless of cost, equals this quick, simple, hair-removing cream. Neet is really quicker than shaving and you use it with absolute assurance that hair will not come back thicker and coarser than before—as it does after shaving. Following its use, note the whiteness of underarm in contrast to darkened skin where the razor has been used. Neet is 50c per tube and is always sold on the basis of complete satisfaction or money back. More than 35,000 Druggists sell Neet. Every Drug and Dept. Store has Neet or will gladly get it for you.

FRECKLES

Don't hide them with a Veil; Remove them with Othine—Double Strength

This preparation for the treatment of freckles is so successful in removing freckles and giving a clear, beautiful complexion that it is sold under guarantee to refund the money if it fails.

Don't hide your freckles under a veil or waste time on lemon juice or cucumbers; get an ounce of Othine and remove them. Even the first few applications should show a wonderful improvement, some of the lighter freckles vanishing entirely.

Be sure to ask for the double-strength Othine; it is this that is sold on the money-back proposition.

We recommend Othine Complexion Soap for use with Othine, also as a shampoo—it's wonderful for bobbed hair—25c a cake at all drug or department stores or by mail. Othine Laboratories, Inc., Buffalo, N. Y.

From a Bed of Pain

A little invalid girl who knew little else but pain until she was ten years old fortunately survived years of tortuous affliction and grew up to be Bessie Potter Vonnoh, now one of our most famous American sculptors. In the October issue of THE DELINEATOR Mrs. Vonnoh tells her own story, the simple record of a woman's single-handed effort to succeed in her chosen profession despite discouraging handicaps that made every step of the way a struggle. "Those first ten years of my life," writes Mrs. Vonnoh, "are foggy in my mind to-day. Over them hangs a blurring haze of pain dimly remembered." Yet those years were to have a profound influence on her after life. They taught her to busy her hands with pencils, paints and scissors and they forced her to think. Eventually she discovered that her bent was to look for beauty in every-day life and to record it in clay. Impressed by a motto on a classroom wall, "Know what you want to do, then do it," she made it her own and thereafter never deviated from the chosen path. Mrs. Vonnoh has shown special interest in mother-and-child subjects. She received the Julia A. Shaw prize for "Enthroned" in 1904, was the only woman on the great jury of awards at the St. Louis Exposition, is a member of the Society of American Artists and was recently chosen to do the Roosevelt Memorial—a bird fountain to be placed at the entrance of the Roosevelt Memorial Bird Sanctuary at Oyster Bay. Her story is an inspiring record of an active life.

Some Kids Have All the Luck

A few months ago the world stood still for a moment—or seemed to—when the arrival of a daughter in the home of the Nicholas Longworths was announced. The little lady had simply had the foresight to select Alice Roosevelt Longworth as a mother and to identify herself rather intimately with a family to which an ex-President of the United States lends the luster of a distinguished name. However, the accounts of her début failed to mention, as we recall it, how she came to be christened Paulina. St. Paul, it appears, is the favorite historical character of Mrs. Longworth, "Princess Alice" that was. Undeterred by the fact that the militant Apostle was a rather uncompromising enemy of the fair sex, she named her first-born after him, thereby displaying a touch of characteristic Rooseveltian individuality. As all this world and his wife knows, thanks to the camera man, Paulina spends much of her time in a market-basket, just an ordinary, homely carry-all such as is commonly used on Main Street for toting fruits and vegetables. It is not surprising to learn, therefore, that, in a home where a child is so sensibly cared for, THE DELINEATOR'S "Baby Record Book" is already in use. Few children can duplicate Paulina's good fortune in other respects, but her baby book is available to all. Dr. Bird T. Baldwin, Director of the Iowa State Laboratory for the Study of Normal Children, put into it provision for a scientific record of the baby's physical and mental growth and family history. In addition, there are ample compartments for photographs, keepsakes, certificates, prescriptions, etc. The moderate price of one dollar doesn't begin to cover the value of the book to intelligent parents.

Reducing in Spots

No service feature we have offered in years has enjoyed so huge and immediate a demand as Dr. Lillian E. Shaw's "Reducing in Spots." Requests for the pamphlet poured in on us in such great numbers that the first two editions were quickly exhausted and inquirers obliged to wait for a new supply. The edition now on hand seems ample to meet all requirements and new requests will be taken care of promptly, provided the customary twenty-five cents is enclosed. Briefly, the pamphlet contains a special set of reducing exercises prepared for women by a woman physician who has specialized in physical training for her sex. The exercises have the approval of our own authority on physical training, Mr. Fielding H. Yost, and of Dr. George A. May, director of the Waterman Gymnasium at the University of Michigan. By their regular use, excess fat may be reduced safely and quickly in specific areas of the body such as lower legs and ankles; abdomen and waist; hips and thighs; chin and throat (including double chin and "dowager's cushion," i. e., the pad of fat at the back of the neck); upper arms and shoulders. Illustrations make the instructions easy to follow.

ASK THE DELINEATOR

We are glad to offer our readers the following services; and we hope they will have no hesitation in consulting our department experts on any personal or household problem. Be sure (1) to address your inquiry to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.; (2) to give us your return address; (3) to enclose the cost of the pamphlet or other literature (in each case a minimum amount fixed to cover cost of printing and postage)

Babies and Children—Join one or more of THE DELINEATOR Happy Child Clubs. Every month Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw, Director of The Happy Child Department, writes you a timely letter. He takes your child step by step through the year, tells you what to do each month.

There are four clubs, one for expectant mothers, one for the "new baby," a third for little runabouts, and one for the school child.

Membership in any one is only fifty cents a year. Or you can join all four for one dollar.

Send for one or all of the important Child Health pamphlets. They cost only ten cents each and treat the following subjects: "The Expectant Mother and the New Baby," "The General Care of the Baby," "Maternal Nursing," "Artificial Feeding," "Diet Problems of Childhood," "Early Childhood," "The Child's Teeth," "The School Child," "The Mental Health of the Child," "Three Dread Diseases of Childhood," "Play, Eyes and Movies," "Correct Posture," "The Development of Personality," "Widespread and Dangerous Diseases," and "Weight, Growth and Health."

Are you getting ready for the new baby? Our Pattern Department has just issued an up-to-date collection of layette patterns. These have been prepared under the direction of several State and municipal maternity and nursing organizations.

The whole group of patterns—a complete outfit for the baby, with the Deltor, containing full directions—can be procured for thirty-five cents from any Butterick pattern dealer or by writing to the Pattern Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

Home-Making—This department has a score of leaflets that will help you to systematize, simplify and improve your housekeeping. Write for a list of them, enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage.

Building and Decoration—If you want to build, write for pictures of all Donn Barber's model houses, costing you only two cents for return postage. Then for one dollar you may order a print of floor-plans and elevations of the house you decide upon.

Ask Mrs. Sanders, the editor of this department, about furnishing and decorating (not more than five questions at one time, please). Be sure to give full description of rooms—and a two-cent stamp for reply.

Special bulletins, "Good Floors," "Curtains and Draperies," "Walls, Woodwork and Ceilings," "Furnishing the Home," "How to Choose, Frame and Hang Your Pictures," "How to Know Good Furniture" "Methods of Painting Furniture" and "Slip Covers and How to Make Them," may be had for twenty-five cents each.

Beauty—The beauty editor will answer personal questions and send complimentary folders on the care of skin, hands and hair, or lotions and cosmetics. Enclose postage at rate of two cents for two folders.

Etiquette—A new booklet called "Table Hospitality" gives explicit directions for setting the table for formal and informal meals and for entertaining with and without a maid. This is ten cents, and Mrs. John Cabot Kimberley will answer any personal quandary or send instructive leaflets on phases of etiquette, such as "Courtesies of To-day between Men and Women" and "Introductions, Invitations and Replies." These cost nothing but the postage, which is two cents for two folders.

Entertainment—Something new in September affairs is all ready for you. Any two of these leaflets will be sent for a two-cent stamp to cover postage. There's "Capital Fun for Labor Day or Any Day," "A New Barn Party and Dance," "Dutch Dallying for Dog Days" (a delightful outdoor informal dance and stunt party) and "A List of Pageants for Country Gatherings."

MIX and SERVE

Edited with Willing Hands and a Mean Pencil by a Mere Man

EVERY time we ascend this rostrum to address our fair pewholders we are mindful of our indebtedness to some of the great leaders among the never-sufficiently-praised sex whose laudable endeavor is much the same as our own ◈◈◈ There is Elinor Glynn, for instance. A paragraph in her latest book contains a nugget of wisdom that echoes our convictions, but we could not express it here without inviting the displeasure of the censor. Listen to this mouthful from Mrs. Glynn: "There are all sorts of modern philosophers (in petticoats mostly, but still some of them are men!) who, with more or less subtle reasoning, are trying to inculcate an idea of the necessity of individualism in all women. They urge every unit to express her individuality, with the result that the average female, who is little higher than the animal world in intelligence, and not half so endowed with instinct, is becoming a perfect bore! She has not the sense to see that, if she were really gifted, nothing on earth could keep her from being individual, and that, if she is not so, to try to push forward her commonplace ideas only serves to make her less attractive" ◈◈◈ The Russian Soviet has put a ban on the exportation of caviar because it is one of the principal foods given to hospital patients in Russia and last year's catch was far below expectations ◈◈◈ Readers who share our zeal for equal rights for women will deplore the following incident reported in Ed. Howe's Monthly: "In a certain town a wife walked up to her husband on the street and shot him in the back, killing him instantly. The police took the pistol away from her. Now that she has been freed by a jury (on her own testimony) she is demanding that the pistol be returned to her, also, that there be less delay in paying the husband's life insurance to her" ◈◈◈ Dr. Charles Gray Shaw, professor of philosophy at New York University, views with alarm the decline of the stiff collar. "When man changed his stiff collar and soft shirt," says Doctor Shaw, "for a soft collar and silk shirt, it was too attractive and women copied it. As a result, man is becoming effeminate and there are now flappers in both sexes." Doctor Shaw places much of the blame on the haberdashers who sell a man lilac pajamas, embroidered bathrobes, silk slippers and cosmetics. He goes home with the gay apparel; his women folk see it and get envious, so they invent a new style, going the man one better. In contrast to our own day the professor points out that in the days of chivalry no nice girl wanted to wear a suit of armor and that no Victorian gentlewoman ever wanted to imitate the dress of Prince Albert or Mr. Gladstone ◈◈◈ As a barometer of the alertness of our 1,000,000 fair pewholders we have framed up the little test which appears within the ruled lines just below. The idea is to read the sentence within the rules and then say how many f's are in it. After you have experimented yourself, try it on your friends:

> Every reader of magazine fiction should remember the name of THE DELINEATOR

The clerk in charge of the Bureau of Marriage Licenses in Detroit, Michigan, is reported to have taken a poll of all the couples who came before him during Leap Year on the subject of who popped the question—he or she? The results indicate that sixty per cent. of the brides did the proposing ◈◈◈ A lovely lady in Estherwood, La., attests to the truth of the following anecdote which she sent in response to our S. O. S. for "stretchers" about the return of lost articles. "In my northern home (Vineland, New Jersey) one of my neighbors, after preparing dinner, found to her utter dismay that she had lost a finger ring. Searching everywhere failed to reveal its whereabouts. The following Summer her father brought in a pail of new potatoes harvested from the compost heap (composed of rakings from the lawn, kept from year to year), where she had thrown potato peelings long before. Imagine her surprise, on cutting one of them in two, to find her missing ring in the center of it!" ◈◈◈ The Massachusetts Senate has refused to pass a measure repealing the law prohibiting the use by women of hatpins protruding more than three inches from the crown of a hat ◈◈◈ If, by the way, you didn't find three f's in the test sentence in the frame above, try it again.

1 Use two tablespoonfuls of Gold Dust to a gallon of water - and a tin, aluminum or galvanized pan.

2 Water must be boiling hot and sufficient to cover silver.

3 Place silver in the boiling solution for one minute. Each piece must touch the pan. Remove - and

4 Rinse with clean hot water. Then dry with a soft cloth or chamois

Now—the secret is out!

THE secret of how to have your silver clean and gleaming—like new—by simply washing it bright!

Just follow the four operations illustrated above and marvel at the simplicity of cleaning silver by way of the Gold Dust "bath"!

It's nothing short of magical the way Gold Dust cleans silver. A one-minute dip in the boiling suds—a rinse in clear water—a gentle drying with a soft cloth. That's all!

This discovery does away with "silver-cleaning day" in the home. In just a few minutes you can do what it formerly took hours to do. And you get even better results!

No tiresome rubbing. No mess. No soiled hands. Stubborn tarnish gone. Silver like new!

Washed bright! Every piece sparkling! No scratch or mar, for Gold Dust contains no grit. Nothing in it to harm even your most treasured sterling pieces. So don't hesitate to try this new, easy method of cleaning silver.

In a twinkling it will be bright as new. It may read like a romance but every word is true.

GOLD DUST

Let the Gold Dust Twins do your work

Cut this out—Paste it in your Recipe Book

Dissolve in each gallon of boiling water in a tin, aluminum or galvanized vessel, two tablespoonfuls of Gold Dust. Be sure to have enough of the solution to entirely cover the pieces of silver, and see that some part of each piece of silver touches the vessel. (This is important). Leave them in the boiling solution and in contact with the vessel at least one minute. Remove and rinse. Then polish with a soft cloth or chamois.

Cream of Wheat cooked with chopped dates puts a new appetizing interest in breakfast. Its creamy wheat flavor blends deliciously with any fruit—prunes, raisins, figs or fresh fruit —with a delicious energy dish!

Start the day right with breakfast

The great American farce—breakfast! No meal is so slighted, so misused; and no meal is more important, according to diet specialists.

The average business man swallows a too heavy breakfast and rushes away. The average school child's breakfast is a "sketchy" affair chosen by a capricious appetite. The average mother forgets to eat in the rush of getting her family up and off.

In the morning everyone needs a hot, nourishing breakfast, to get into action for the day; just as a cold motor needs priming.

Energy our greatest morning need

The body's chief need at the start of the day is energy. Breakfast should supply this need fully and enjoyably.

There is one delicious food which perfectly meets this morning requirement—Cream of Wheat!

Physicians and dieticians know Cream of Wheat as a valuable carbohydrate food, exceptionally rich in energy substance or the vital force we all need. It is a doubly valuable food because it is in such simple form that the most delicate digestion can handle it easily and quickly, without extra effort.

Many foods are rich in energy; many others are easy to digest. But high energy, quickly available for use because so easily digested—in this Cream of Wheat offers an unusual combination.

As the first solid food for babies, Cream of Wheat has had a leading place on physicians' diet lists for many years. And for growing children, its rich store of energy fills an especially vital need.

An energy breakfast for all the family!

An energy-breakfast! Tempting, satisfying, affording new enjoyment—have it tomorrow morning in Cream of Wheat! It will assure an ample morning energy supply for children and grown-ups alike.

And with Cream of Wheat you can put the magnet of variety in this monotonous old meal, for you can serve it in so many tempting ways. Try it cooked with dates, prunes, raisins or served with baked apples. Children love it with brown sugar or maple syrup. Its creamy flavor blended with fruit is particularly delicious.

FROM the EDITOR'S POINT of VIEW

WHAT PRICE!

THIS editorial is for all Americans, but especially for parents and teachers.

What is the matter with Education? Why do the most thoughtful and experienced educators annually discuss the problems of education, and yet—

One hundred and ten thousand teachers leave the profession every year? That number abandoned teaching in 1924. That number or more will give up teaching this year. A few of those who left were a good riddance, but in losing many others the schools were drained of the finest teaching material America has produced.

Who will pay for this loss? Not the uneducated legislators—blind politicians; not the ungenerous school boards; not the unthinking voter; but—your child and mine.

In this generation of prosperity and materialism we have come to imagine that good education rests on foundations of brick and mortar and towering walls. We boast that we have the finest school buildings in the whole world. That is a splendid gesture, but it is not enough. In some places, where the fine buildings have been turned into educational factories for quantity production, it has become an irony, a farce. We have in mind a well-trained, high-souled teacher from such a beautiful school building who in desperation recently said: "I can not endure it another day! Fifty pupils of ten different nationalities in one room for half a year! I do not even get a chance to learn all their names. I can not do justice to them nor to myself. The whole system is wrong."

That woman reluctantly gave up teaching and entered the commercial world.

Her case is typical of thousands of others. Last year The National Education Association sent a questionnaire to one thousand teachers, just like her, who had abandoned their profession. The answers the Association received revealed five conspicuous weaknesses in the teaching profession. Contrary to expectation, low salary was not the first of these. The chief causes for desertion were, as the teachers themselves expressed it:

1. "There is little respect for teachers. The public holds them in contempt."

2. "There is little hope of advancement. The average pay of a teacher does not make it possible for her to travel or to continue her higher education."

3. "Tenure of office is uncertain because of politics in many of the school systems. In many parts of the United States teachers hold their jobs not by competence, but by the will and the pleasure of an untrained, often illiterate, school board."

4. "Living conditions are intolerable for rural teachers who are required to 'live around' with various families during the year."

5. "The rulings against married teachers are unjust."

And so in one year, for these and other reasons, one hundred and ten thousand fine, alert, inspirited men and women equipped to mold a finer race were lost to the most important work that life holds.

THERE is no denying that teaching is our most important business. A failure to pass on in one single generation all the knowledge so painstakingly gathered during the ages would start the human family back to a state of barbarism. Most men and women who have succeeded in life in their mature years admit debts of gratitude to two people—a parent and a teacher who helped to show the way.

Every year colleges drop girls and boys, bright, ambitious young people, who are thus marked with failure because they were not well prepared in their lower grades. Every day business schools turn out inefficient girls and boys who will never get very far because they will never have time—nor know how—to fill up the holes left in their early education. Every day some part of young America goes wrong because it has missed that tower of strength—the influence of a great teacher.

Who pays? Why, your child and mine! Later the whole nation pays.

The system is wrong. The attitude of the public is wrong. Ask the dean of almost any college. Ask the headmaster of the high school. Ask the principal of the elementary school. Ask the teachers. They will tell you who pays.

THE DELINEATOR believes that education is one of the most important problems before the country, and that the desertion of the teachers is one of the most important phases of this problem.

But there will be no solution until a large percentage of the people themselves become interested; until it gets into the consciousness of America that teaching is the most important business in life, and that getting an education is the business of every child, no matter what occupation that child will follow in later life.

The people best fitted to discuss this question and perhaps find an answer are you who are closest to it—parents and teachers. So we are turning to you for assistance. In this number of the magazine we are starting a campaign to find out "What Is the Matter with Teaching?" On page 5 Dr. John Dewey, one of the country's leading educators, author of "School and Society," "Democracy and Education," "Human Nature and Conduct," tells what he thinks is the matter. Other well-known educators will discuss the subject in later issues.

But this is not enough; we want to hear directly from YOU, teachers, parents, and all those interested in education, what, in your opinion and experience, is the matter with teaching, and what remedies you would suggest to keep other men and women from leaving the profession.

KATHLEEN NORRIS

Kathleen Norris has been studying rich American girls for many years. She has watched their restlessness, their bitter, desperate dissatisfaction with life. She has seen some of the best in young America turn to Europe for new life in the old world, for adventure, for social power. The great novelist has become immensely interested in what happens to these title-hunters. Last Winter she went to Europe to watch their intrigues at first-hand. She has now written the result of her observations of the millionaire American girl adventuring abroad, into a lively and discussion-making novel.

This story of the loves and dangers of the social leaders of the world begins next month in THE DELINEATOR. Don't fail to read the first installment of "Beauty and the Beast"

Search your own memories and tell us, simply and directly, and in not over one thousand words—less if you prefer—why you gave up teaching, or would give it up. We want real experiences—either yours or your neighbor's or your community's. You may give one reason or many reasons.

And we don't want papers which simply find fault—we can all do that; we want you also to suggest a remedy. For instance, many teachers complain that their lives are of necessity narrow and restricted. If this is so, what could be done to change the situation and who should do it? These and many other questions will occur to you. Let us hear your answer.

BEFORE starting to write your paper, read the announcement of the contest on page 5. Then read carefully the following rules, for if your paper does not conform, it can not be considered for a prize:

1. Manuscripts must not be over one thousand words in length, must be typewritten, and must be on only one side of the paper. They will not be judged on literary merit, but on their sincerity, insight, the conviction they carry, and their constructive suggestions.

2. Manuscripts must bear the name and address of the sender and the statement as to whether or not the sender is a teacher.

3. No manuscripts will be returned unless accompanied by a stamped and self-addressed envelope.

4. Manuscripts must be addressed to "Prize Contest Editor, THE DELINEATOR. Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.," and must be received by us on or before January 7, 1926.

5. Prizes will be announced in THE DELINEATOR for June, 1926.

Livingston Farrand, President of Cornell University.

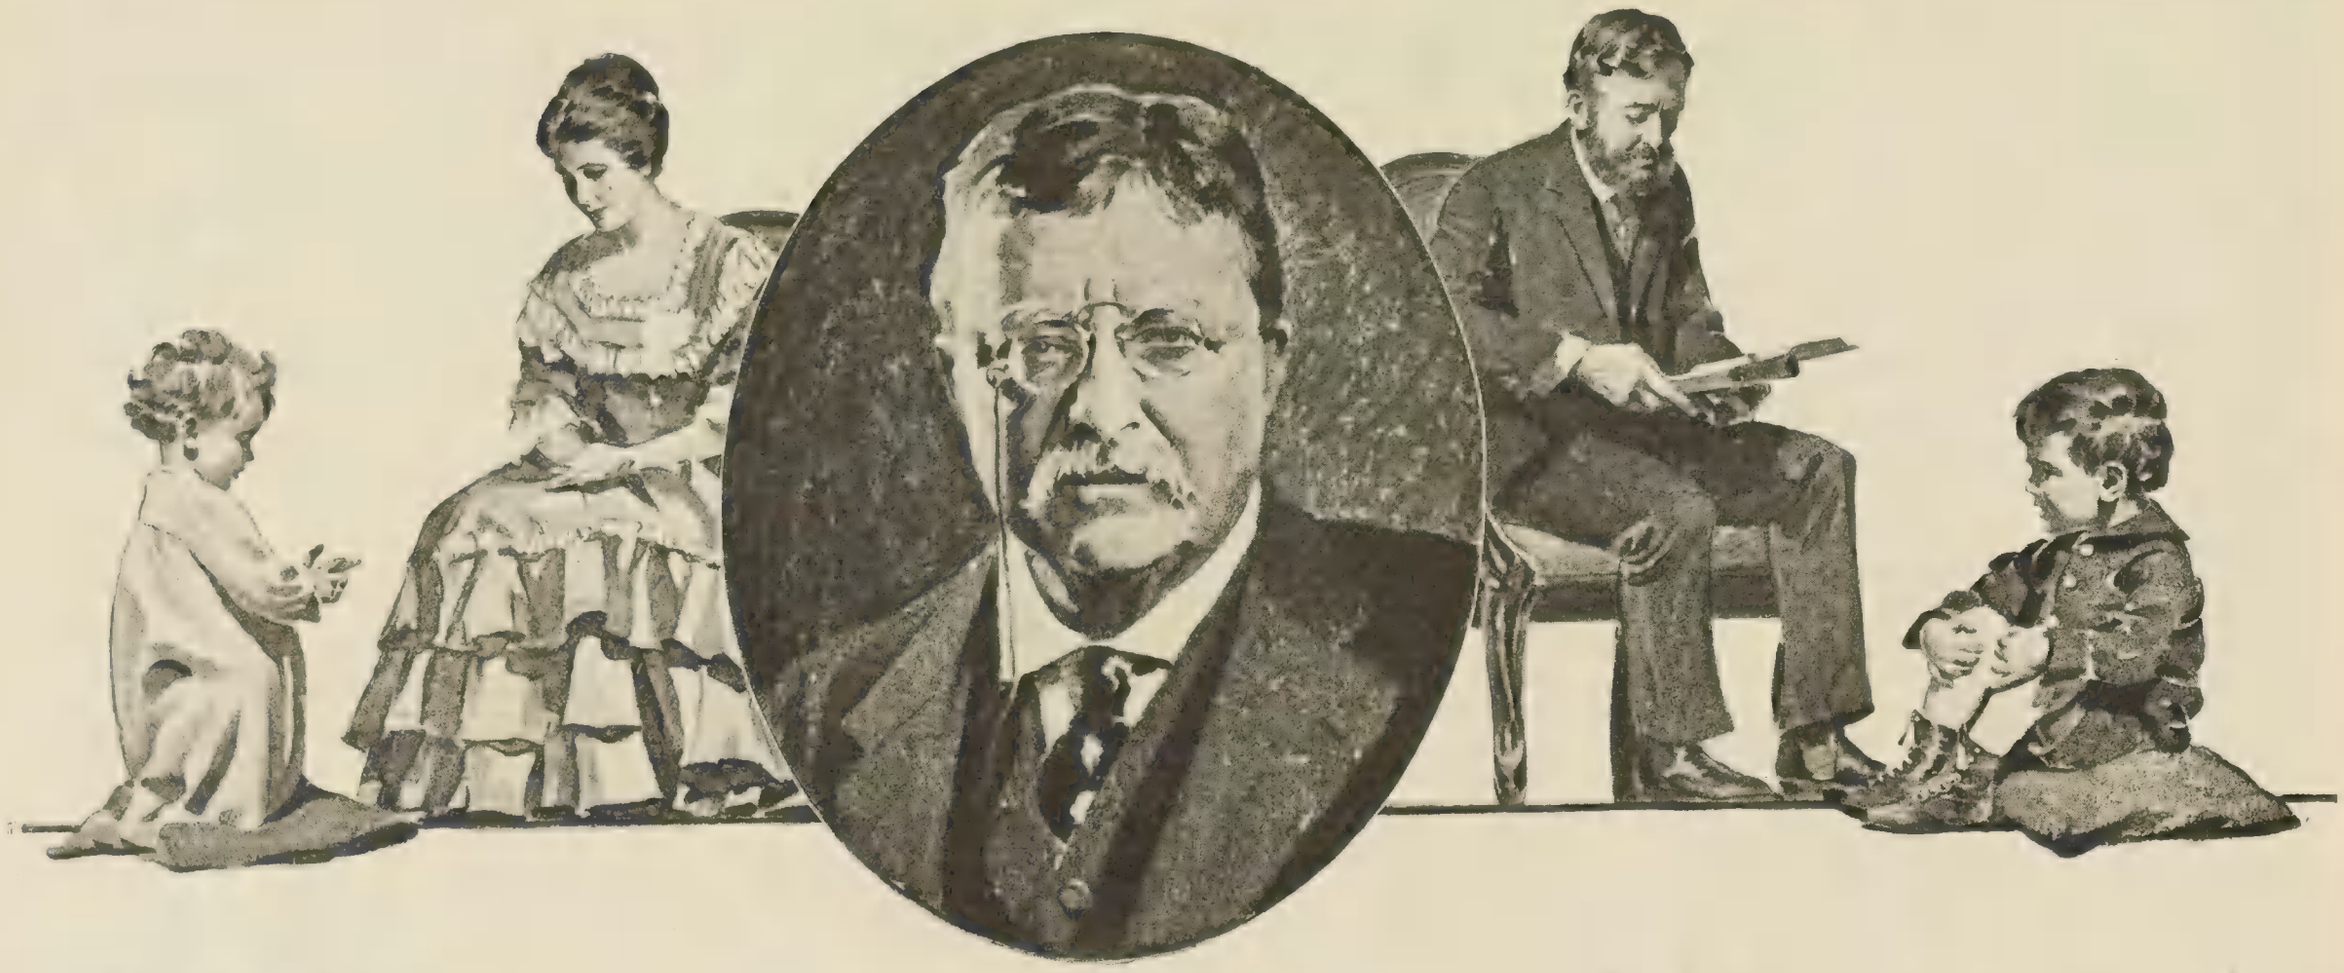
Ada Comstock, President of Radcliffe College.

William McAndrew, Superintendent of Schools, Chicago.

Katharine Lee Bates, Professor of English Literature, Wellesley College; author of "America the Beautiful."

Angelo Patri, Principal of Public School No. 45, New York; author of "A Schoolmaster of the Great City."

Mrs. A. H. Reeve, President of the National Congress of Parents and Teachers.



Mrs. William Brown Meloney, Editor of THE DELINEATOR.

"A MATRON OF SOUTH CAROLINA"

THE approaching celebrations of the one hundred and fiftieth year of our independence will undoubtedly add to our growing interest in all things historical. As a nation we are now old enough to remember our childhood, and have begun to collect and preserve with tender enthusiasm all the relics of our past which time has not already destroyed. It should give pride to all women to remember that one of the most sacred of the nation's shrines was saved from destruction by the patriotism and energy of a woman. Mount Vernon, the home of our first President, which was falling into decay, and which both Congress and the Virginia Legislature had refused to buy, was bought, beautifully restored, and has since been maintained through the efforts of Ann Pamela Cunningham, "a matron of South Carolina," who founded the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association for the purchase and upkeep of Washington's home.

Complete information about this and other patriotic societies is given in THE DELINEATOR'S booklet "Patriotic Organizations for Women," which will be sent for twenty-five cents to any one interested.

How Teddy Roosevelt's parents made a man of him

By ANGELO PATRI

IS YOUR BOY A "TEEDY"?

Somewhere—perhaps in your home is the gifted "Teedy" of to-day who will be the "Teddy Roosevelt" of to-morrow. In hundreds of homes just like Roosevelt's boys and girls are playing and studying and unknowingly preparing themselves for leadership in the next generation. What can we do to help them? Angelo Patri, that great "understander" of youth, will show in this new series how the parents of great men fitted them for their high places. Read this human and interesting story of Roosevelt's parents, the training he received from his father, what his mother meant to him and did for him.

The story of other great men's parents will appear in succeeding issues. You can not afford to miss any of them.

HOW much of a child's future success depends upon his father and mother? I believe that the major part of it is due directly to them. From his parents he inherits his gifts and his shortcomings, and they are responsible for the environment in which he lives. I would say, then, that Theodore Roosevelt was a very fortunate child, for he had the most charming of mothers, the most devoted of fathers and the best possible surroundings.

From his mother he took his tender loving nature, his gentleness, his sympathy. From his father, his wonderful energy, his altruism, his fighting courage. In his early years he was afflicted with asthma, and the father and mother spent themselves generously in his service. We find them packing hurriedly to carry him to some place where he might breathe easier and be at rest. The ailing child was always the first thought; all else could wait.

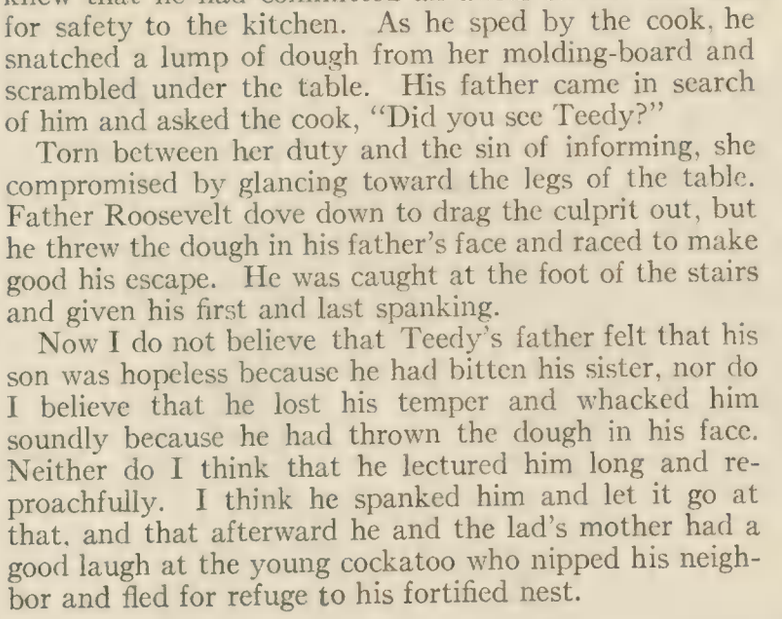
Here was the stage set and ready for a spoiled boy. He was a gifted child, headstrong, impetuous, loving, and delicate. He was the son of a rich and influential man. But he was not spoiled. He had the rarest of rare good fortune—he had a loving, intelligent father. All the power of the elder Roosevelt's mind—and that was much—all his money and all his influence were directed toward the development of the spiritual, mental and physical growth of his children, especially toward that of "Teedy," the unusual, the gifted, the turbulent member of the flock. He was not easy to deal with, you may be sure. Alive to his very finger ends, he vibrated through the house as in later years he vibrated through the country—yes, through the world. Such powers as his, so varied and so dynamic, would naturally require the wisest direction, the most unceasing care.

Once when he was four years old he bit his sister. He knew that he had committed an awful offense and fled for safety to the kitchen. As he sped by the cook, he snatched a lump of dough from her molding-board and scrambled under the table. His father came in search of him and asked the cook, "Did you see Teedy?"

Torn between her duty and the sin of informing, she compromised by glancing toward the legs of the table. Father Roosevelt dove down to drag the culprit out, but he threw the dough in his father's face and raced to make good his escape. He was caught at the foot of the stairs and given his first and last spanking.

Now I do not believe that Teedy's father felt that his son was hopeless because he had bitten his sister, nor do I believe that he lost his temper and whacked him soundly because he had thrown the dough in his face. Neither do I think that he lectured him long and reproachfully. I think he spanked him and let it go at that, and that afterward he and the lad's mother had a good laugh at the young cockatoo who nipped his neighbor and fled for refuge to his fortified nest.

THIS father's spirit was full of joy and seasoned with mirth. Everything that he did in his busy life was done on the crest of delight. He enjoyed his children. Their tastes found ready sympathy and fatherly acceptance and understanding. He never made Teedy feel that he was troublesome or in any way a source of anxiety, and he must have been all that and more many times over.



When the lad began to grow spindly, his father said: "Son, you have the mind but you have not the body to support it. You will have to make your body."

The child's face flushed and he said: "I'll make my body."

The wise and generous father built an open-air gymnasium on the upper porch, and here the boy set to work to overcome his handicap and literally build his body. Here, his sister says, he worked day after day, patiently stretching the narrow chest, strengthening the feeble arms and legs in a stern effort to make himself strong. Here, too, gathered the boy clans, for the spirit of leadership shone early in this brilliant lad, and there was many a strenuous hour of wrestling and boxing and see-sawing in the airy gym.

It would have been far easier for the father to have turned the child over to the nurses and doctors, and coddled him into invalidism as many a fond father had done before. It took courage of a rare kind to turn that headstrong, daring boy into a gym with instructions to grow a body; but this father had exactly that sort of courage mixed with faith, and he passed it on in large measure to his high-spirited son. I like to think that it was in this gym that the first strands of the powerful chest muscles that turned aside the assassin's bullet were first laid. I like to think that they were the result of this gift of his gracious, loving father.

While he aided in building the boy's body, the father fostered the growth of the youngster's eager soul. The elder Roosevelt was a lover of his fellow men. For years he gave one day a week to visiting the sick and the poor. His home was the philanthropic center from which flowed the spirit that inspired many a civic and charitable undertaking, and there Teedy received his first lessons in service to common people. His father taught by deeds rather than words. But words were not neglected.

"TEEDY'S" MOTHER AND FATHER

EACH morning there were family prayers. Many fathers will wonder how a man could possibly conduct family prayers, so outworn the custom seems to be. But in this family the ceremony was performed in the same spirit of joy as every other ceremony. God was no remote and fearful personage here, but the God of love, the loving Father of His children.

I like to think of the little boy learning his prayers, drinking in his first impressions of the Divine Father from the lips of his own beloved earthly father. I like to remember and credit to the teaching of this father the reverence the boy had for all that was pure and holy.

Everyone notices your teeth

Pebeco keeps them white—and safe

CHARMING WHEN YOU SMILE . . . . AND SAFE FROM DECAY

A CONSTANT struggle is going on in your mouth . . .

Acids are forming slowly but continuously from tiny particles of fermented food—and attacking the delicate enamel of your teeth.

To counteract these deadly acids, nature intended that several pints of alkaline saliva should flow over your teeth daily.

But in practically no mouth today are the salivary glands working normally.

Modern soft, sweet foods do not stimulate them sufficiently. Your glands grow less and less active. The acids of decay collect on your teeth and eat the enamel.

Brushing is merely a temporary remedy. In "The Prevention of Dental Caries and Oral Sepsis," the greatest dental authority today says, "Some substance which is a salivary stimulant should be used in order to promote and educate the activity of the salivary glands."

Pebeco stimulates the salivary glands

Pebeco contains no ingredient harmful to the teeth or gums. Its base is a safe, neutral salivary stimulant. Its effect is accomplished by gently promoting the flow of your natural alkaline saliva.

As soon as Pebeco enters your mouth the salivary glands flow more freely. You can tell the difference. Your mouth feels so fresh and pleasant.

These Teeth can be yours

Learn how to keep your salivary glands active

To protect your teeth—use the tooth-paste that keeps your salivary glands working normally

With regular daily use Pebeco entirely restores the normal, protective flow of your glands. Their alkaline fluids bathe your teeth day and night. They prevent the formation of bacterial plaques or film because the acids of decay are neutralized as fast as they form. Every day your teeth grow cleaner and stronger.

Pebeco does its polishing carefully without using any gritty substance. It keeps your teeth beautifully white, your gums clean and soothed, your whole mouth normal and healthy.

Do not let your teeth deteriorate. Learn to keep them white and safe with the tooth-paste that restores the natural protective function of your salivary glands.

Wisconsin says to New Mexico

"I'm glad you agree, too."

THERE'S Wisconsin, away up at the top of the map. And there's New Mexico, away down at the bottom of the map. What is the unseen bond between them? What accounts for the cheerful smiles of both?

Both have discovered, in America's greatest laundry soap, the secret of the whitest, freshest clothes that ever blew upon a line—without drudgery!

The presence of P and G The White Naphtha Soap in the washtub explains the Monday morning smiles that appear regularly, not only in the homes of Wisconsin and New Mexico, but across an entire continent! For in these two states, as in all of North America, P and G is the largest-selling laundry soap.

Like you, perhaps, many of these women have tried other soaps. But after experimenting, they have decided upon P and G, because:

No finer soap for laundry or household use has ever been made.

It really takes out all the dirt, quickly, safely, economically.

It saves time, it lessens rubbing and it is wonderfully easy on clothes.

It makes rich, lasting suds with hard or soft water.

Winter or summer, cold water or hot, it cleanses quickly and rinses out completely, leaving behind no grayness or unpleasant soapy odor.

White clothes come out from a P and G laundering glistening white—colors come out fresh and smiling.

Maybe you are saying to yourself: "Can there really be a noticeable difference between my present soap and P and G?" Well, the simplest way to answer that question is to buy P and G—then wash and watch! Week after week you'll see your clothes improve in whiteness and freshness. You'll feel the difference in your arms and back.

Before your next washday, order P and G from your grocer. In its spic and span blue-and-white wrapper, the clean-smelling white cake holds the secret discovered by the women of Wisconsin, New Mexico, and all the rest of America. There is no real mystery about the supremacy of P and G—it is simply a better soap.

PROCTER & GAMBLE

"I have been using P and G The White Naphtha Soap for several years and find it gives splendid results. It keeps the white clothes fresh and white and I do not believe it fades the colored clothes a particle. I also use it for dishwashing—it loosens the grease better than most soaps. I like it for general housecleaning such as washing woodwork, kitchen walls and floors, and for bedroom rugs and rag rugs. In fact, I recommend it highly for all general household purposes."

MRS. G. O. H., Milwaukee, Wis.

"I find P and G unsurpassed for washing white as well as colored clothing. I have no dread that my colored clothes will fade. For dishwashing it is all anyone could want. For general housecleaning, such as washing woodwork and the bathroom, I would use nothing but P and G."

MRS. J. S. G., Tucumcari, N. Mex.

What is the matter with Teaching?

By

DR. JOHN DEWEY

LONG VACATIONS DO NOT COMPENSATE YOUNG WOMEN FOR THE OTHER DISADVANTAGES OF THE TEACHING PROFESSION. IN MANY RURAL DISTRICTS THERE ARE FEWER SCHOOLS AND FEWER TEACHERS TO-DAY THAN THERE WERE TEN YEARS AGO

AMERICAN educational theory is the most advanced to be found in the world. It is a recognized source of progressive educational movements in Japan, China, Australia, Russia, Turkey, South Africa as well as western Europe. Those schools in the United States in which this theory is put in operation are an inspiration to modern schools all over the world. And what is most significant is that these schools are a good deal more than models for improvement in this or that new detail. They have furnished new and revolutionary ideas of what schools are for; of what they are capable of effecting in transforming lives of boys and girls, and of how the transformation is brought about. It is in elementary education that this work has been accomplished; no such striking advance is found in high schools or colleges.

Nevertheless the vast mass of American elementary schools show no trace of the influence of advanced educational theory or practise. They are practically what they have been for the last fifty years; worse, one is tempted to say, but that perhaps is an exaggeration. In the big cities they are by and large big scholastic factories, efficiently managed for the American commercial specialty—mass production of standardized products at lost cost. In the rural districts they are dead, dispirited, poorly equipped, with the air of carrying on a losing struggle.

WHAT is the cause of this contrast? this contradiction? In a word, the answer is found in the old saying: As is the teacher, so is the school. Yet this answer tells us only where to look for the problem; it does not solve the problem. Teachers are an effect of social conditions before they are a cause of schools.

Why are the teachers of our elementary schools what they are? What selected them? What keeps them what they are? The responsibility is found in the community; we can not unload it on the teachers, for they are symptoms, products of our own beliefs, desires, ideals, and what we are satisfied with. To find out what is the matter with the schools, we have to make an examination of teachers; to find out what is the matter with the teachers, we have to examine ourselves.

As a people, we profess to believe in education above everything else. We have succeeded in making ourselves believe in this profession. Critics are taken in by it, and ridicule our alleged faith as a blind religion and our devotion to schools as a cult, a superstitious mummery. But what is the test of the depth and sincerity of a faith? Only acts show whether a professed belief is living or is a form of words. In the case of education the actions which serve as a test are: First, are we willing to pay, to give, to sacrifice, to get and keep in our elementary schools the kind of men and women teachers who alone can make our schools be what they should be? And, secondly, apart from money for salaries and equipment of schools for educational work, what are we willing to do in the way of esteem, respect, social prestige, hearty backing? For neither question is the answer very encouraging, least of all for elementary schools.

Immediately after the war the shortage of teachers was such as to compel some attention to the question of adjustment of wages in the face of the rise in the cost of living. The Red scare helped also, at least as far as high school and college teachers were concerned, since there was a fear that poorly paid "intellectuals" would be attracted toward Bolshevism. But symptoms only, not causes, were then dealt with, and that remains true to-day. Salaries were increased with reference to quantity and not quality. The aim was simply to pay what was demanded in order to get enough teachers to go around, such as they were; not to find out what would be required to attract and hold the best men and women within the schools.

In spite of the readjustment of wage scales, the shortage is still all but chronic in many regions, and in many rural districts there are fewer schools and fewer teachers to-day than there were ten years ago. A serious feature in the situation is that while elementary teaching is lessening in attractiveness, other callings are gaining in competitive power, especially for women. It is not necessary to point out how many avenues formerly closed to women are now open to them. The "invasion" of business, if not of the professions, by women is a commonplace. Moreover, the higher paid positions in business are becoming more and more accessible, so that ambitious women see something ahead to beckon them on. In contrast the pulling power of the elementary teaching vocation on the financial side is almost pitiable.

TEN years ago one of the greatest problems of the women's colleges in placing their graduates was to find anything but a poorly paid teaching profession for them to go into. The more enterprising institutions made a business of diversifying opportunities. So rapid has been the change that one of the colleges which took up this matter most seriously found a few years ago that its courses to prepare students for teaching were almost without students. In less than ten years teaching sank from an almost monopolistic rôle among gainful occupations for women down toward the lower half of the list.

The other side of this story is that as cultivated women coming from homes with a tradition of culture find teaching less and less attractive, keeping school presents itself to another class of girls as an opportunity to take a step upward beyond the place of their parents in the social scale. In the larger cities a constantly increasing ratio of elementary school teachers come from daughters of immigrants of, as a rule, not more than one generation's standing.

I have no sympathy with the highbrow and "Nordic" slurs passed upon our recent immigrants. I only point out that it is impossible to secure in large numbers from this particular class

$2,000 IN PRIZES!

"What is the matter with the teaching profession and how may its evils be cured?"

For the best answers to this question THE DELINEATOR is offering $2,000 in prizes, as follows:

To Teachers: A first prize of $500, a second of $300, and a third of $200.

To Parents (and others not teachers, but interested in education): a first prize of $500, second of $300, and a third of $200.

You do not have to be an experienced writer to take part in this contest. We want you to search your own mind and experience and tell us, quite simply, one or more reasons why, in your opinion, over 110,000 teachers deserted the teaching profession last year, and why every year a smaller percentage of college graduates are choosing teaching as a life work. If you are one of those who have deserted it, give your own experience; if not, give the experience of your friends or of your community.

The following are some of the well-known men and women who will be judges in this contest:

David Starr Jordan, President Emeritus, Leland-Stanford University.

Ada Comstock, President of Radcliffe College.

Livingston Farrand, President of Cornell University.

William McAndrew, Superintendent of Schools, Chicago.

Katharine Lee Bates, Professor of English Literature, Wellesley College; author of "America the Beautiful."

Angelo Patri, Principal of Public School Number 45, New York City; author of "A Schoolmaster of the Great City," etc.

Mrs. A. H. Reeve, President of the National Congress of Parents and Teachers.

Mrs. William Brown Meloney, Editor of THE DELINEATOR.

You can find the rules for the prize contest on the editorial page of this issue; see that your paper conforms to these rules, for if it does not it can not be considered for a prize.

any high grade of cultivation, occupied as the families have been with getting a bare economic foothold, and that the pathetic eagerness for education displayed by many of this immigrant class does not compensate for the generations of intellectual starvation which has produced this hunger.

In one form and another, the depths of culture are contained in the resources of the mother tongue, and not much can be expected from teachers to whom the daily language is still largely an external instrument and not an organ of the soul.

Another proof of the seriousness of the financial aspect of the question is the extent of the "labor turn-over." I spare the reader any attempt at statistics upon this point as upon that of salaries. Any one can take judicial notice of the fact that even in the cities where preparation and advancement are best organized from a mechanical point of view, the number of teachers who abandon their calling is very large. This signifies in practise that young and unexperienced girls are flowing in a steady stream into the elementary schools, only, after they have obtained some experience and some professional sense and outlook, to be replaced by others, equally crude, who have also resorted to teaching as a temporary stop-gap pending marriage or the taking up of some more lucrative pursuit. And this is the situation at its best!

In the country districts as a whole there is hardly even a pretense of the maintenance of professional standards and spirit. Teaching is no more a profession than washing dishes and taking care of the baby at home. It is an improvised occupation easily taken up and easily laid aside, largely pursued to fill in because it does not involve as much social stigma as going out to service and exacts little if any more special training than is acquired by any one who has himself or herself been at school. If these words seem harsh or exaggerated, let it be remembered that there is little prospect of any great improvement in our schools throughout the country as a whole until we get rid of our feeling of complacency.

FINALLY, let us bear in mind that all conditions are at the worst in elementary schools. A large part of even the educated part of the community is still under the shadow of the old belief that anybody who is in possession of his five senses and who has himself or herself learned to read, write and figure, knows enough to teach little children, at least if he or she "be handy with the children." It is not too much to say that psychological science has in the last few years practically proved the prophetic insight of a few great educational reformers who asserted that the early years are the most important, because at this period all the underlying emotional habits and unconscious attitudes are being formed. The scientific demonstration is the more impressive because it has come mainly from physicians who in dealing with abnormalities have been forced to trace them to their origin in badly adjusted personal and social relationships in childhood.

It may be that this scientific demonstration will mark the beginning of a new era in education. But if so, the epoch is still in the future. Parents and teachers alike are still committed to the absurdity that the older a person is, and the more fixed, closed and specialized his habits, the more important are skill and learning in his guardians and teachers, while in the plastic years in which habits are being formed for the whole of life, habits which are fundamental and general, the human being may safely be left to chance, ignorance and inexpertness. I sometimes think that this absurdity is itself more than enough to account for all the failures of all our educational efforts, and that until it is remedied all our energies spent in other directions are wasted. See what happens. As a rule the most inexperienced teachers and those who receive the lowest rate of pay are given the youngest children. Because the latter are the easiest to teach, they shall receive the supposedly poorest teachers. Then because being the easiest to teach and learn, and having been started by acquiring habits in the most haphazard and misfit ways, we will pay subsequent teachers more and more to try and correct the results of prior poor teaching and learning! So it works out that we college teachers, who by the nature of the case can do the least in forming fundamental habits, although most, of course, in imparting specialized skill and knowledge, get the highest pay for the fewest hours of work.

It is not all a joke if I say that we can measure the dawn of a serious faith in education by the manifestation of willingness to pay the highest wages going to those who actively direct the education of the youngest. We shall then begin by setting new teachers to deal with older and relatively case-hardened specimens, and as they prove their fitness promote them to teach younger children whose education is so much more important just because they are much, so much easier,to teach wrong. As for high-school and college students, once started right they would largely educate one another, together with the contacts which they would naturally seek with those specially skilled and learned in the lines in which their curiosity had been aroused.

IN DEVOTING so much of my space to the pecuniary side, I do not imply that right education can be bought out of hand like a material commodity. I have in mind the will to pay adequately as a sign and test of the genuineness and depth of our professed faith and interest in the cause of popular education. My first question is really part of my second: What is the degree and quality of our esteem, our working respect for education as measured by our attitude toward those who pursue it? Judged by our desire to make the calling materially attractive, it is pretty low, and the intangibles and imponderables of the case bear out the conclusions indicated by the material factor. Who pays the piper calls the tune.

IN RURAL SCHOOLS THE "LABOR TURN-OVER" IS VERY LARGE. ONE OF THE REASONS IS UNCOMFORTABLE LIVING AND LACK OF CONGENIAL COMPANIONS IN A SELF-CENTERED COMMUNITY

Consider first the conditions with which teaching is surrounded. It is a commonplace of those scientific principles to which allusion was made at the outset that no two children are alike, that no two learn in just the same way, or are, strictly speaking, capable of being compared, measured and graded on a basis of just quantity, more and less. Nevertheless the number of pupils to a teacher may average anywhere above thirty-six, this being regarded as about the lowest number under most favorable conditions. Consequently quantity becomes the controlling consideration. The teacher is compelled to instruct in batches and on a basis of uniformity. Everything tends automatically to lock-step treatment in teaching and discipline. To cover so much ground with every pupil, to have each one go through as nearly as possible the same motions as every other, is the same thing as to discourage originality and depress individuality.

What if the teacher believes in encouraging independent thought and creative impulse? The pressure of circumstances gives her no opportunity; she is forced to fall in line; she is a part of the machine. Uniformity gives speed, and speed alone enables her to get over the ground that she is required to cover.

Human beings were not constructed to operate like machines; they need more leeway and variety of action. Hence the teacher is under constant nervous strain from the abnormality of her life. The type of nervous fatigue and overstrain which marks the school is as easily recognizable as that found in the overdriven factory worker.

In the teacher it goes deeper and leaves behind it a great organic irritability. For the factory hand is only working against machines. The school hand is working against other human beings who also rebel against being treated as machines. The strain and irritation is more than doubled. Then the teacher looks for the first chance to escape from the treadmill. The vicious circle keeps on.

GENERALIZATION regarding the social esteem in which elementary teachers are held is probably foolish, since it is not likely that the same rule holds for the country as a whole. What is needed is a careful collection of data made by investigation of selected parts of the country. Upon the whole, however, elementary teachers seem to be approaching the status of upper-class servants, save that their conduct and movement are subject to a closer watch and stricter censorship. What is galling to those with brains and is surely driving them from the profession is that they are not expected to have any ideas of their own on any controverted social and moral subjects. Wo be to them if in an unguarded moment they permit a dull class in geography, or history or civil government to be enlivened by a discussion of some contemporary topic in which the appearance of heretical ideas is permitted. These things are in the keeping of the local branch of the American Legion, of the hardware merchant and bank cashier and the local board of education.

Colorless intellectual conformity, blank vacuousness, is the estate to which the teacher is called. Even in her amusements and what is commonly called "social life," the teacher must be not only blameless and circumspect, but neutral and subservient. Consciously and still more by unconscious selection and elimination, the teaching profession is insured against the presence of vigorous, many-sided and rich personalities, from whom alone something positive and constructive might be expected.

The ever-thickening wall which divides the classroom teacher and the administrative officer is another sign of the degraded esteem in which the elementary teacher is held. When the community thinks with some degree of respect and honor of an "educator," it is the principal and superintendent who is thought of. Within the system promotion and increase of pay are almost equivalents of getting out of teaching and into that professional mystery termed administration. The further away one is from children and from the only place where education takes place, the direct contact of mind and mind, the greater is the probability that one will be an educational authority and looked up to with respect and envy. In the name of scientific administration and close supervision, the initiative and freedom of the actual teacher are more and more curtailed. By means of achievement and mental tests carried on from the central office, of a steadily issuing stream of dictated typewritten communications, of minute and explicit syllabi of instruction, the teacher is reduced to a living phonograph. In the name of centralization of responsibility and of efficiency and even science, everything possible is done to make the teacher into a servile rubber stamp. After we have either thus scared away intellectual creativeness and originality, or else segregated it in offices remote from fertilizing contact with child life which is touched only through statistics and standardized tests, we wonder why all the energy and zeal expended upon education bears so little fruit!

BULGARIAN BET

A story for baby-lovers — and other lovers, too

By SHIRLEY SEIFERT

Drawing by Charles R. Chickering

IN THE DIMNESS THE SAINTS ON THE WALL SMILED AT THE SITUATION

"NOW, isn't she sweet?"

"She certainly is not sweet! She smells like a sour cheese."

Elizabeth Harkaway's blue eyes burned hot defiance at Doctor Whalen over the absurd bundle of human composition which the doctor insisted was hers by ties of flesh and blood. The baby lay on the oak table of the parlor at St. Mary's Hospital, wrapped in one of those idiotic blue blankets sprinkled with white bears or rabbits—only the person who made them could say which. Elizabeth Harkaway, angry at her rôle of aunt, charming as the brilliant March morning in her white studio frock with a golf cape strapped carelessly to her shoulders, stood on one side of the table and Doctor Whalen stood on the other.

Elizabeth disliked Doctor Whalen, too. He was fat. He looked disturbingly maternal in his all-over smock with the sleeves short above his plump elbows. He was the most popular baby doctor in the city. For that, also, Elizabeth despised him. And it made her furious to know now that his eyes. for all their sleepless heaviness, were twinkling at her stubborn chin, that the very painted saints on the walls around were smiling at the situation. Elizabeth wanted to scream.

The baby spoke first. A pink flipper feebly beat the air above the blue blanket and the child screeched.

"I won't touch her," said Elizabeth. "Every time I tilt her the least bit, she spills some of that awful buttermilk food. She's ruined this dress now. And I pay my own laundry bills."

The doctor considered anew the crisp linen studio frock.

"You had better wear something more ordinary—less spoilable—until you are accustomed to handling her. Mothers find it advisable——"

"But I am not a mother. I am an artist-photographer."

THE doctor picked up the blue bundle, made a smoothing motion or two with his broad hands, and laid it down again—perfectly quiet. To see the enormous man manipulate the speck of a baby gave Elizabeth a queer feeling about her nose. And in an effort to remove that tightness behind her nose she drew a breath which in a weaker person would have been called a sob.

"It isn't fair! No, it really isn't fair!" Elizabeth protested.

"What isn't fair, child?"

"I'm not a child. I'm thirty years old. I'm old enough to know my own mind—to decide my own life. I have decided it. Years ago I made up my mind to have a career. I loved pictures—painting, sketching, all of that. I loved beautiful pictures so that it hurt, but I couldn't draw a line. Somebody gave me a camera one Christmas and—oh, well! Anyhow, beginning there, I took up photography. I broke my legs climbing trees—I burned my hands and my best clothes with acids—I worked and worked. Then I began to get a reputation and later some business. And now—now, when things are really beginning to happen—this! I wouldn't marry myself. I deliberately chose not to marry."

Even a sleepy doctor could have told that non-marriage had been choice on her part.

"Dear me!" said he.

Elizabeth turned back to him, her blue eyes still hot.

"It isn't fair," she stormed. "You've seen Peggy up-stairs with her ruffles and curls and invalid pallor and sweet, saintly air of martyred motherhood, and you think she's perfectly lovely—and that isn't fair."

"Now, now!" said the doctor.

"And you'll only think less of me when I tell you about Peggy—it will sound awful—but I've got to say it. Peggy always was pretty and ruffled and curled and sweet like that—at some other person's expense."

Elizabeth waved her hand at the ceiling to indicate the general location of Peggy's room—then, meeting the doctor's eye, flushed.

"I'm not referring to the fact that I am paying the hospital bill here and will pay for her maintenance at the sanitarium that you recommend. I'm talking about the big things—the things that really matter. When we were girls at home together, it was like this. At one time I had to stay at home from my first Artists' Guild reception because Peg had worn my Georgette dress to a circus and shredded the skirt on the boards. That sort of thing. And then she married. Of course she married. That was never in doubt. The question was what would she marry. She made the poorest selection possible. She picked on a trombone-player in a jazz orchestra. Imagine! He had neat silk ankles and he wore sideburns and could make more different kinds of noises than any other trombonist known. She saw him once and sent him a note—in my name—making an appointment with him at my studio for a free photograph. She gave him tea and two weeks later they eloped." Elizabeth's tone was bitter. The doctor puckered his lips and whistled softly.

"Of course he wouldn't stay married. He skipped out and she came here and had a baby. I was glad to pick up the heavy end of the load and carry it. But I never dreamed that this would happen."

A blue-robed Sister paused at the door to make signs to the doctor.

"Just a minute," he said.

"Do you understand?" said Elizabeth. "I know Peg is sick—and really I am sorry, though I know she'll come out on top somehow. But doesn't it seem downright devilish that she should have to be sick in such a way that she can't care for her own child, that she should have to go to a sanitarium where the baby mustn't go?"

Still the doctor smiled. He was the most persistently amiable person!

"You do appear to be the victim of a conspiracy," he said. "But none of this happened on purpose, really. Your sister was not glad to unload the care of her daughter on you."

"How do you know that?"

"She said, 'Poor little baby!' "

"What?"

The doctor spoke on—in a would-be soothing manner.

"You see, she, too, told me about you two sisters. She understands your attitude toward matrimony and children."

"Did she insinuate that I wasn't fit to care for a child?"

Wild anger shook Elizabeth's voice as she spoke.

"I hope I'm intelligent enough to prepare a buttermilk and corn-sirup formula!"

"The mother would be worrying because you had no

Tears and Laughter caught in Bronze

A great woman sculptor recalls her trials and triumphs

By BESSIE POTTER VONNOH

"NOTHING CAN BE DONE"

Little Bessie Potter heard the doctor's death sentence when she was only ten years old. But something was done—after eight years of invalidism she fought her way to health. That same dauntless spirit has carried her on to fame. One of the few women elected to the National Academy of Design—the greatest honor that can come to an artist—prize-winner at many exhibitions, represented in famous museums, and designer of the exquisite Roosevelt Memorial Fountain, Mrs. Vonnoh has an inspiring story of courage and achievement to tell you

THE ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL EXPRESSES THE JOYOUSNESS OF YOUTH

WHEN I was fourteen I decided that I wanted to be a sculptor. This seems really the begininng of my life. Yet it would be ungrateful not to mention the invalid childhood which came before, for the sufferings of those long years taught me a lesson in endurance.

I was born on the 17th of August, 1872, in St. Louis, Missouri. When I was two years old, my father was killed in a railroad accident. Shortly after this my invalidism set in, and until I was ten years old I knew little else but pain.

The ailment was mysterious. One puzzled doctor after another diagnosed the case. All disagreed. All prescribed differently. As a result I endured years of slow torture, sometimes encased in plaster casts, sometimes held by straps from the ceiling in an upright position, sometimes lying exhausted in a wheel-chair. During those invalid years my inactivity stunted me so that to-day I am child-size, standing only about four feet eight inches from the floor.

At last, in my tenth year, the doctor then attending gave me up. I heard his death sentence: "I won't come again. Nothing can be done. Make her as comfortable as you can."

But instead of dying I began gradually to get well. Why, no one ever understood. I only know that when all treatments and fussing ceased I slowly began to mend.

When I went to school, the modeling-class was my delight. We copied casts of fruit and flowers and made reliefs in wax from pictures—preposterous things. But the work enchanted me. The touch of the clay and the joy of creating gave me a sense of deep contentment. Our teacher was an old German professor, whose principal piece of advice was: "Make it smootin mit your finker."

We were living then through an epidemic of hand-painted "things," from sofa pillows to shovels decorated with snow scenes and sprinkled with diamond dust. I loved all these, and painted away furiously, decorating every loose object in our house; even coloring the pictures in all our books.

IT WAS in these same days of callow youth and untempered zeal that I fitted up a little "studio" at home, pinning on the walls pictures of sculptors from the magazines. But my workmanship immediately attracted orders. And how comical they were!

First I was asked to paint the portrait of a house. I eagerly undertook the commission and concentrated on it fiercely. There wasn't a shingle I didn't put on that house! Next I modeled the head of a political candidate for a campaign cane. To-day I shudder when I think of it.

When I was about fifteen, mother and I discovered an Italian plaster-caster's shop. The discovery of this shop was a turning-point in my life, for it was through its proprietor that I heard of Mr. Lorado Taft, the sculptor, to whom my mother finally took me for advice. I was still a child in years, but much in earnest, and knew that my mother's moderate resources only would permit another year of schooling. Mr. Taft, understanding this, kindly permitted me the privilege of working in his studio every Saturday.

On his advice I also enrolled in the Chicago Art Institute, where he was an instructor, and it was my fortune to obtain immediately from various sources enough orders for portraits to pay my expenses from the very first.

At the end of my second term at the Institute I had the joy of receiving a prize for my work in the class. During the next year, 1891, I began to exhibit locally. Soon I was exhibiting in most of the Chicago shows and earning enough to enable me to make a long-dreamed-of trip to New York. There I spent the whole Summer, drinking in beauty and meeting the famous artists of the day. I had been given letters of introduction to Mr. Augustus St. Gaudens, Mr. Daniel Chester French, Mr. J. Q. A. Ward, Mr. Olin Warner and others, and I made the round of their studios with my heart in my mouth.

Never shall I forget Mr. St. Gaudens. Physically he was the fine type I had expected, with an ideal head, a straight nose and sensitive face. But personally he was lovely and kind beyond imagination. The day I called on him he was working on the Shaw Memorial for Boston. Over it there is a flying figure, and something about this was troubling him. He turned to me earnestly.

"There's something wrong with it, Miss Potter," he said anxiously. "What do you think it is?"

I don't remember my reply. But I do recall my astonishment at the man's sweetness and simplicity. Imagine his turning for advice to a child who had chanced to blow in! I learned, then, a lesson about the truly great.

When I was once more back in Chicago, I found the World's Fair in preparation. To my unbounded delight I was employed to work on the sculpture under Mr. Taft's direction, together with his other pupils. I was also given a commission to do a figure eight feet high, representing Art, for the Illinois Building. I was to receive five dollars a day for my general work and eight hundred for the statue.

My joy can hardly be imagined. What mattered it that I must ride to the Fair grounds every day in an unheated horse-car with straw spread on the floor? I mounted that bumpy car each morning as if it were a chariot.

"SHE HAS PUT NEW LIFE INTO YOUR OLD BONES OF AN ART"

IN 1894, when I was twenty-two years old, I left behind me forever the swaddling clothes of art-student life and became a professional. That is, I rented my first studio!

No jewel will ever be as precious to me as that studio

key. And as for the orders—luckily for me they came trickling in. Between times I invited my girl friends to pose, making little statuettes of them just as they dropped in, dressed in all the incongruities of the day.

Like all young things I was radical in art. Greek sculpture did not appeal to me at all. It seemed a far cry, and cold. What I wanted was to look for beauty in the every-day world, to catch the joy and swing of modern American life, using the methods of the Greeks but not their subject-matter. I was equally determined to prove that as perfect a likeness and as much beauty could be produced in statuettes twelve inches in height, and in busts six inches, as could be had in the life-size and colossal productions suitable for so few houses.

With this ideal before me, and barely enough orders to keep me going, I struggled along in obscurity for a number of months. Then suddenly, almost overnight, I found my little statuettes had become the fashion. I had started a vogue—portraits in plaster; orders were pouring in.

My struggle for a livelihood was not over yet, however. For I had to produce these statuettes ("Potterines") with great rapidity, and was able to charge for them only about twenty-five dollars apiece, including the cost of casting. Then, too, there was the serious problem of how to portray charmingly women in the atrocious fashions of the day—balloon sleeves, pinched waists, full skirts, funny little hats.

As my savings grew, there was born in me the intense desire to go to Europe. So one day mother and I sailed with Mr. Taft and his sister.

My stay in Paris was packed with big experiences—among them a visit to Rodin in his studios. He was my idol at the time, and to meet him was an event so tremendous in my uneventful life that I went to it trembling.

THE ARTIST'S MOTHER, MRS. MARY McKENNEY POTTER

We found him working in a big bare room with marble-cutting and casting going on around him. But in place of the man of rugged appearance and gruff manner whom I expected there came forward to receive us an affable, kindly, neat gentleman who had laid aside studio togs and donned black business clothes in our honor. I suffered a bitter shock of disappointment, but in a few moments I had forgiven him, for he was very kind. He showed us photographs of his work; and whenever I admired one especially he would ask me if I did not want it.

THIS FINE STATUE, "MOTHERHOOD," IS IN THE METROPOLITAN MUSEUM, NEW YORK

I RETURNED to Chicago filled with enthusiasm, and a busy Winter followed. I had all the orders I could fill, besides which I produced two figures—"The Spirit of the Water" and "A Young Mother." The latter is one of my best-known pieces to day, as it is in many museums and private collections.

Virtually all my effort, however, was put into portrait work—statuettes of society women in the horrible dress of the day. It was amazing how intelligent women clung to it. Julia Marlowe was an exception among my sitters. She posed for me in a graceful Juliette costume. How I longed for the power to do justice to her, for she was beautiful!

An extreme example of the other type of sitter was a certain wealthy matron who wanted a portrait of Susan B. Anthony and herself together. This lady—Mrs. Blank—was enormously stout. And the dress she insisted on using would not come together in the back. It was terrible beyond words—white satin with balloon sleeves, full skirt and great baskets of flowers embroidered at the hips.

"Never mind," I consoled her, as patient Miss Anthony looked on with quiet tolerance, a willing martyr because Mrs. Blank was helping to finance the "Cause." "No one will see that it is open." I seated Miss Anthony—a charming subject, gentle and feminine, almost beautiful; then I stood Mrs. Blank beside her, white kid gloves and all.

We had hardly started when a caller dropped in, Mme. Lillian Nordica, the fashionable singer of the day.

"Don't let me interrupt you," she urged. "I'll just look about." And she commenced to stroll around the studio.

Mrs. Blank's bosom began to heave, and for a moment I thought she was going to run from the room. Instead, however, she kept turning, so the singer would not see her back. Nordica soon caught on, became highly amused, and tormented the poor lady by hovering near, until I was in despair for fear I should lose my order.

"ON SANDMAN'S TRAIL"

IT WAS during this year that a congenial group of workers in the various arts—such as Eugene Field, Edward MacDowell, Herbert Stone, Henry B. Fuller, Hamlin Garland, Lucy Harriet Monroe, Burton Holmes and A. B. and L. K. Pond—came together in my studio, forming a club called "The Little Room."

DOROTHY, DAUGHTER OF GUY WIGGINS, THE PAINTER

Eugene Field was one of the most beloved of our members. Droll, whimsical, full of nonense and pranks, yet pathetically wistful at times, he was a kind of male Maude Adams. Himself a boy who had never grown up, it was his impish delight when riding on a street-car to make a fiendish face at some fat, stupid baby while its mother was not looking; then, when it howled, and she turned, to cross over and ask mildly: "Nice little child! What is the matter, dear?"

That year I began to send my work to exhibitions in the East. To my great joy and astonishment it sold; and the critics commenced to write magazine and newspaper articles about it. Partly on the strength of this I

ONE DAY to LIVE

In which an arrogant Emperor learns the meaning of heaven from Princess Budding Moon and a stranger warrior

LOVE IS THE KEY TO JOY. SEE THESE TWO. THEY SIT IN THE TIMELESS VALLEY OF HAPPINESS

Drawings by Joseph M. Clement

"HEAVEN and I understand each other," the Emperor Yeng Ti dictated. And then he fell into profound thought, while Ming Foo, the copyist, cut fresh wrinkles of awe into his face, which was already as wrinkled as a dried cassia leaf.

"Heaven accepts my omnipotence in the world as I accept Its omnipotence in celestial realms," the Emperor resumed. "Of this I have had abundant proof. My subjects must honor the scroll which the four winds hereafter will bear aloft, 'Yeng Ti and God!' "

And the Emperor, having finished, ordered the necessary copies to be made in readiness for dispatch to his countless governors throughout his kingdom, which ran even unto the far Pamir.

"I will have Lo Chun, my sorcerer," he commanded then. The command was swollen with a mighty arrogance. None other than one who believed his overlordship coequal with Heaven's could have attained such a tone. Bright-clad courtiers made a startled lane for the hurrying messenger.

And, waiting, the Emperor Yeng Ti leaned upon the arm of the golden Dragon Throne and looked through the window of his lofty Council Tower to where the nearby Palace of Delight vaulted azure and black and red. This was the greatest palace in the world and the most beautiful, and he had builded it to be the home of his daughter, the greatest Princess in the world and the most beautiful—Budding Moon.

A fermentation broke out in the multicolored host who swarmed before the Gate of the Emperor's Daughter in the sun-brightened wall of the Palace of Delight. And the Emperor, observing this, was moved to an uncommon joy. For he knew that it marked the long-expected home-coming of his daughter

THE Princess Budding Moon was come home to choose a husband. She had sixteen summers, and besides comprehending all wifely duties, together with the care of silkworms and the weaving of silk and cotton and the culture of the lotus, peony, hibiscus, wisteria and orchid, she was profound in her knowledge of the philosophies of both Lao-tse and Confucius. Thus her mind was prepared to essay the responsibilities of matrimony.

As for other attributes, she was not tall and she was very slender. She went upon her little feet as the windflower drifts. Her young waist was as yielding as a bundle of new silk.

At sight of her palanquin that joy welled up in the Emperor which only he knows who centers all his love upon one being. And this was followed by a little sadness. For the Emperor knew that even the best man is scarcely fit for any woman. Pondering upon this he wondered where, then, he might find a mate for the Princess Budding Moon. He became fearful, realizing that even the greatest Princess in the world is only imperfectly secured from sadness.

Love fought with his great pride of place, impelling him to arise and go to greet her. But he denied himself this gratification. On this day not even for his daughter would he openly reveal ordinary emotions. On this day even she must come second to his empire.

And he turned resolutely to meet the advancing Lo Chun, who was the most mysterious man in all Yeng Ti's land. None knew whence he came nor who were his ancestors. But his power was greater than that of all the Emperor's other advisers in union. He was old and tall and garbed in a pale-blue robe. And he had a pale pontifical face in which piercing eyes were set. Rumor spoke of a mission to which his hand had been put—some said divinely.

"Lo Chun," commanded the Emperor Yeng Ti, "I will be told whether I may spread my new banners to-morrow. Will my General Wu T'ang be successful in the battle he fights to-day?"

"I have learned," replied Lo Chun, the sorcerer, "that to-day your foe becomes a Guest on High."

"My last rival! Then my banners will be finished none too soon. To-morrow it will, indeed, be 'Yeng Ti and God.' "

Lo Chun, the sorcerer, gave no response to this. A locust strummed vibrantly from some chink in the tower wall and for the space of the sound the sorcerer was silent, tight-lipped. As it ended, he seemed evanescently to rise in his slender height up and up until his head passed through the open dome and vanished in the sky. But this could have been nothing more than the fantastic swaying of his mysterious figure bowing before the Emperor's exultation.

"And the battle!" cried the Emperor Yeng Ti. "My last rival departs—but what of his army and his generals?"

"The event of the battle is in the hands of the Emperor's general and of the Emperor himself."

"Then show me the scene that I may know what I must tell my general to do."

Lo Chun, the sorcerer, fathomed into his capacious blue sleeve, drawing from its depths a sphere. This was of a substance like frozen milk, polished to opalescence. It seemed a vast eye without a pupil. Yet the Emperor Yeng Ti was to have proof that it could see.

The sorcerer mounted now to the throne level and the sphere was cupped reverently in his hands. He floated close to Yeng Ti. They bent their heads and as they did the room went black, as black as the faces of Yeng Ti's warrior dwarfs.

Outside sunlight flooded the world. But the bright rays were turned back at the window of the Council Tower as a spear is turned back by an impenetrable buckler. The room lay under the hand of darkness. Only the sphere in the grasp of Lo Chun, the sorcerer, remained lucent. A fierce light blazed within it, pouring down upon the landscape which it revealed.

This appeared a devastated country with villages huddled like dusty beggars who had died in their alms seats. At one point a river spread out into a broad lake. Above the lake a vast fleet of war junks raised sails and dropped oars. It moved forward and upon the lean commander who stood in the prow of the leading vessel sat an air of harassed resolve. Below the lake another great fleet advanced confidently. And over this fleet floated the banners of the Emperor Yeng Ti.

"Wu T'ang prepares to fight in the wide lake," explained Lo Chun.

"Send him more swiftly forward. He must halt my enemy in confusion at the narrow mouth of the lake. Then into this confusion he must send fireships. Thus he will win the event with little risk."

A fiercer luminosity within the sphere burned down upon the landscape. And when this dimmed, the sunlight flooded back into the Council Tower. Lo Chun, the sorcerer, backed down from the throne, making his obeisance while he returned the sphere lightly to the depths of his sleeve.

THE Emperor Yeng Ti stared again through the window of the Council Tower. The bright wake of his daughter's retinue eddied into the Palace of Delight. He saw this even as he imagined a vast banner, "Yeng Ti and God." And rising to descend, as a special occasion demanded, into the Hall of Judgment, he beckoned the Greatest Noble.

"The Princess Budding Moon will sit with me to-day. It should please her to see me pass judgment upon the Foreigner. And it should please my people to see her on the day of her return from the philosophers. You will carry this message to her in the Palace of Delight."

The Greatest Noble prostrated himself. Then he arose and departed swiftly. He was a meager man with a face like blank steel. He wore a yellow robe only a shade lighter than that of the robe of Yeng Ti. He was second to Yeng Ti in the empire, and he was the personal attendant of the Dragon Throne. "For," argued Yeng Ti, "if I make the highest do me daily service, then will the lowest of my subjects never cavil at according me that humility which is my due."

And the Emperor strode through the door of green jade set in a wall of porphyry. And he descended the wide alabaster stairway which led to the Hall of Judgment.

As the Emperor Yeng Ti entered, moving up the Aisle of the Twenty-five Statues, the walls rippled with sound. This sound came from the silks of the courtiers and the warriors' armor as the audience bent in homage.

The Emperor Yeng Ti advanced haughtily to the great double Dragon Throne and seated himself. His embroidered yellow robe fell open a little at the waist, revealing his breastplate of gold. Upon his head rested the imperial cap ornamented with one hundred and forty-four precious stones. Twelve pearl pendants hung from this to veil the Emperor's eyes. Thus, ordinarily, was a blind and fair justice insured. But to-day the ropes of pearl were pushed aside and the Emperor held a naked sword. This was because his pride had been audaciously flouted.

So, justly or unjustly, the Foreigner was being brought now to see his past service blotted out by one disservice. A murmur about the Western Door marked his approach. And as he entered, the soldiers were won anew by his gallant youth and the murmur swelled. The courtiers, who knew him from the amazing tales of his beardless bravery, gave way curiously before the advancing square of warders.

The Foreigner advanced proudly. His head, with its shock of yellow hair, was high. He was tall and moved with a lightness betokening great strength, although he was slender in comparison with the Emperor's bodyguard who grouped about the Dragon Throne. Beside the leader of these, Li Kong Ho, he seemed a stripling. And indeed he was young, although the leather lining of his suit of mail was scarred with many blows. By many blows. also, the tall cross upon his shield had been effaced. By much use, too, the freshness of the little golden spurs upon his heels had been worn dim. Yet, if the long sword at his side had been drawn, an armorer would have said the cross upon the blade had been engraved new within three years. But the sword would not be drawn, for it was bound into its scabbard by the golden prison cord of the Emperor.

The Foreigner performed a genuflection at the foot of the double Dragon Throne, but he did not prostrate himself, and the Emperor frowned.

"Hurl him onto his face!"

The command was upon the Emperor's lips, half uttered indeed, and the giant Li Kong Ho was shuffling ponderously in anticipatory obedience, when the speech was interrupted. Subdued cymbals clashed outside the Eastern Door. Soft harps sounded. Mellow flageolets blew. And then the Princess Budding Moon entered.

AFTER THE FORMAL MARRIAGE RITES THE STRANGER YOUTH REVERENTLY UTTERED SIX WORDS IN HIS OWN TONGUE

THE Princess Budding Moon was come in obedience to her imperial father's command, walking modestly beside the Greatest Noble down through the Aisle of the Twenty-five Statues. Her little smile, like a child's appealing fingers, touched one man after another in the great hall. Smiles broke out in answer. And as she bowed before her father's throne a thunder of voices avouched her serene charm:

"Hail! Hail! Hail! Our Princess, hail!
Hail, our Princess! Hail! Hail! Hail!"

The Emperor Yeng Ti greeted his daughter distantly lest he should betray a common father's pride, but he helped her into the left seat of the double throne. There she sat, a butterfly shining in a cumbrous frame. She looked about in gentle confusion. And then her hands convulsed in her lap.

The Foreigner continued to stare at her and she at him until that which his gaze proclaimed forced her eyes aside and deepened the dawn in her delectable cheeks. Terror started in her face when her father arose and spoke.

"Because you have disobeyed my command, Foreigner, you are here. Do you deny my right to inflict punishment in proportion to your crime?"

"I ask but justice, O Emperor!" replied the stranger youth.

"Justice is my word. You shall hear that accordingly as I balance your deeds against your misdeeds."

And thereupon the Emperor resolutely gripped his naked sword

No demurrer came from the stranger youth. Indeed he may not have heard, for the Princess Budding Moon had taken a flower from her hair and it had slipped down through her fingers to his feet. Li Kong Ho strode to rescue it, but he took scarcely one step to the other's five. And there was the flower in the hands of the golden-spurred youth.

"You came among us as you stand now," began the Emperor Yeng Ti, intent only upon voicing the vengeance of his pride. "You brought nothing save your sword and shield with their strange device and your strange armor You said you had been an unwilling warrior upon the pirate ship which broke upon our shores.

"You told a tale of a vow made to your God, of much fighting in a certain land which you called Holy. You told of treachery, capture, slavery.

"We gave you an honorable place. Your prowess gained due reward. Were you not, until the day of your crime, a favored general despite your beardless face?"

The stranger youth bent low before the just tally. And at the nadir of his obeisance his lips lingered unseen upon the flower in his hands, unseen save by the Princess Budding Moon.

"Did I not, honoring your merits, intrust you with a paramount duty?" the Emperor resumed. "I ordered you to capture the Prince Cho Sun. And I who stand equal with God look to have my commands obeyed throughout my empire even as His commands are obeyed in Heaven. Yet how do my emissaries report your conduct? 'He stopped in his pursuit ten hours,' they tell me, 'to gain a second glance at a maiden he saw upon a temple wall.'

"And so my General Wu T'ang must to-day hurl into battle fifty times ten thousand men."

The flame of denial burned in the face of the stranger youth. Yeng Ti held out an imperious hand.

"You are about to say my emissaries accused without cause. You would tell me your delay did not open the net to Cho Sun. Your friends already have told me that if you had not been seized you could have continued the pursuit to success But I do not know this. I know only that a maiden made you forget my commands."

As he paused, the Princess Budding Moon in her golden seat quivered like a shining butterfly in a blast.

"Only the greatest of the five punishments will suffice for this crime."

A murmur of pity swept the watching audience. Frowning heavily, the Emperor pushed on: "Yet there is none who may say that Yeng Ti abuses his power. And even this punishment will I ameliorate. Decapitation is not honorable for a soldier of one worthy deed. And the brush of valor has writ many upon the book of your days. Therefore Li Kong Ho will slay you here and now in fair battle. This much will be vouchsafed you."

And now the pity of the audience grew into a louder murmur. The boyish Foreigner was loved and honored for his gay courage and his gentleness. And no man ever had lived after facing the sword of Li Kong Ho, whose sword was sanguinely athirst. Once drawn, the demon within it would not permit it back into its scabbard until it had drunk away a life. The stranger youth, however, shook his yellow crest hardily.

"And if Li Kong Ho does not kill me?" he asked. "If I kill Li Kong Ho?"

Li Kong Ho burst into laughter. Indeed he almost burst with laughter. Even the Emperor passed over his anger and smiled. For a flash he regretted that this valiant Foreigner must die. Once, he recalled, he had considered this handsome youth as a spouse for his daughter. In all his realm he knew none other so worthy, so promising in greatness. But he banished the thought, remembering the affront to his pride. His face became like a descending blade.

"Loose the sword of the Foreigner!" ordered the Emperor.

The Princess Budding Moon cruelly twisted her fingers against the carven mouths of the dragons upon her throne. That which had before but dawned in her eyes shone now for all to see like the noonday sun. But all save the stranger youth were intent upon the coming combat. He smiled and kissed the cross hilt of his sword. Then he strode beside the giant Li Kong Ho into the Aisle of the Twenty-five Statues.

Li Kong Ho made his tremendous attack, a black cyclone sweeping upon a stripling oak. He swung his two-handed sword like a resistless scythe of death. And with a speed appalling to the watchers the stranger youth was driven back.

Now the Aisle of the Twenty-five Statues sloped down to the Emperor's throne. Thus the stranger youth now was forced up an incline. This incline ended in a brief flight of steps, leading to a secondary dais upon which visiting potentates sometimes sat.

When the stranger youth had reached the third of these steps, it was made apparent that his retreat had been deliberate. He halted abruptly. He attacked. He forced Li Kong Ho's sword to waver in its deadly sweep. His blade became as a dozen darting arrows, threatening every crevice in his adversary's bulky armor. Never before had Li Kong Ho met such an onslaught. He gave way a pace. Seizing this moment of misgiving, the stranger youth leaped. With a great shout he hurled himself high above Li Kong Ho's thirsty point. His sword arm lunged out. His lithe body rose behind it. Sword and man became a terrible spear which drove into the throat of Li Kong Ho. And the giant fell upon his own blade, so that even in its master's death the thirsty sword drank away a life.

Breathless, exultant, the stranger youth strode back to bow before the Emperor.

No word came from Yeng Ti, gripping his naked sword. No word came from the soldiers and courtiers, staring at the clay of Li Kong Ho. The hall was a vast dumfounded silence until, like a crystal bell tinkling in a pall, two little hands clapped.

This loosed the voice of the audience. A packed hall took up the ecstasy of the Princess Budding Moon.

THE frenzy of the marveling host lifted the Foreigner to the pinnacle of worship. But the brow of Yeng Ti grew black, black. He saw his imperial power mocked by the victory, and his anger scorned the custom which called for the victor's liberation. At the deafening climax he shot to his feet. The great hall stilled.

"This man shall die!" He swore. "Enough of this clamor! Shall he slay my man after flouting my command?"

A vague babble of protest arose, but the naked, shaking sword forced silence.

"The Sticks of Destiny shall decide his fate. They shall say if he dies at once or if he is to be flung into a ship to float back whence he came."

The Sticks of Destiny were brought, and no less than the Greatest Noble cast them. The whole audience crowded to watch their fateful fall upon the yellow throne rug. Would the flat sides come up, sending the Foreigner to immediate death? Would the rounded sides come up, dooming him to mysterious waters?

The face of the Greatest Noble was blank. He gazed steadily at his master. Yeng Ti drew erect. His hand clenched so tightly about the haft of his sword that the drawn skin broke over the knuckles. And the Greatest Noble cast the Sticks of Destiny, and their flat sides came uppermost.

A little moan broke from the Princess Budding Moon. A great sigh broke from the watching audience. Lo Chun, the sorcerer, looked on with outraged eyes which the shamed gaze of the Greatest Noble would not meet. But the Emperor smiled in triumph.

"It is decreed," cried Yeng Ti. "Now, O Foreigner! If you would deny the will of Yeng Ti, speak!"

The stranger youth shrugged intrepid shoulders as he advanced to the foot of the dais.

"I bow to your judgment, O Emperor!" he said. "It is, after all, a small matter. No man can escape death in his turn."

He met fleetingly the gaze of the Princess Budding Moon and his voice tripped a little. Then with sudden resolve he raised it. He spoke now reverently, as one who recites a prayer.

"But Yeng Ti, I give thanks that the justice of Heaven transcends the justice of earth. For where an Emperor sends me alone to death, Heaven has given me love to be my companion.

"And if this is to be my last speech, let it be the utterance of that love. You say I die for a maiden upon a temple wall. I ask no greater boon. I beg only that she may hear these words. Let Heaven grant that the South winds, friends of lovers, bear them aloft! Let them reach her upon a temple wall—or elsewhere!

"Let her know that in my heart she reigns a golden vision encompassing all the beauty of the world. Let her know she was the one for whom I waited. And for whom I shall wait after the death you give me."

His voice fell softly.

"And for whom I shall wait," his whispering lips repeated. "I have done."

HE HAD no more than ended when the Emperor Yeng Ti was erect, raging.

"Name me this maiden!" he cried. "Name me this maiden that she may stand beside you! Ch'ou Chang, commander of my guard! Flay this man until he names the maiden. Is Yeng Ti to be mocked? She shall die with him. She shall die, though she be the daughter of the highest priest in my empire. Flay him! Find her! Slay them both! This is the command of Yeng Ti. I have done."

"Then I begin!" cried the little Princess. She fluttered down from the great throne. Unmoved by the wordless plea of the stranger youth, she ran swiftly from the dais and thrust her little hand into his.

"Hunt no farther!" she cried. "I was the maiden on the temple wall."

The tongue of Yeng Ti clave to the roof of his mouth. His face went gray. The multitude found its voice, however. There arose a sound low and dolorous, like the sea as it bruises itself against the feet of a mountain.

Now Lo Chun, the sorcerer, whispered into the ear of the stranger youth, who moved forward to the foot of the dais, never letting go the hand of the Princess Budding Moon.

"I claim the day," he shouted loudly. "I claim the day for the Princess and myself."

Once, early in the reign of Yeng Ti, a condemned man was executed summarily. Within the hour this man's innocence was irrefutably established. Whereupon the Emperor decreed that each culprit should have a day of grace lest justice miscarry again.

This was the day the stranger youth claimed. And upon his words there flashed over Yeng Ti's face a look which in any other would have been easy to define. But what it meant upon the countenance of the Emperor none knew. All were the more baffled because his words seemed to belie the look. He strode to the edge of the dais and nodded.

"I grant the day," he said. "But the decree stands for both. It is death."

He paused in a weighted silence.

"Heaven," he ended arrogantly, "will endorse my act as I have always endorsed the acts of Heaven."

THE weighted silence held. The echo of the Emperor's voice was the one sound in the shadowy hall. No shade, however, dimmed the shining eyes of the stranger youth and the Princess. These two turned to each other in joy. Sorrow chilled the hall, but they held happiness in their breasts and were warm. Never once did they cease gazing upon the wonder they saw in the eyes of each other. Only the Emperor seemed unsoftened by their love. With a mien like adamant he flung down his sword, dismissing the audience.

"Ch'ou Chang," he ordered, "imprison these in the Palace of Delight."

Then he hurried toward the Council Tower.

Lo Chun followed the Emperor, but slowly, for he stopped in the arcade to watch an itinerant magician. This man had set up his little stand before the dismissed audience. Thrice, to attract attention, he thrust a long knife into the body of his apprentice who received no harm therefrom. Then the magician found Lo Chun watching him and chagrin crimsoned his face. His shame was plain at being caught debasing his mysterious art before a master. Lo Chun only looked long into the apprentice's face turned skyward as in a mesmeric trance.

Back in the Council Tower the Emperor clapped his hands imperiously.

"I will have Lo Chun, my sorcerer," he called.

"Shall we read the progress of the battle of Wu T'ang?" asked Lo Chun.

But when he would have drawn the white sphere the Emperor caught his hand. The sound of a multitude floated up from the base of the Council Tower, many voices lifted in a common burden:

"Mercy for the Princess and the Foreigner. They love!"

The Emperor seemed to devour the supplication.

"I would be transcendentally magnanimous were I to free those two," he remarked. He gazed at his closed fist as though it held the world in its compass. "My people would bow before me as before a very benign god."

"Do you torture that rare child," Lo Chun, the sorcerer, demanded, "save in a sincere though misshapen sense of justice?"

"I torture! I wield the power which is mine."

"You flout Heaven with your acts. Do you not think Heaven has long observed your swollen pride and has looked to humble it?"

"To humble me?" The Emperor Yeng Ti was so amazed that he passed over the affront of the assertion.

"Be warned! Be warned! Modest must be the mien of him whom Heaven forgives. I see the hand of Heaven reaching vengefully toward you who usurp its power."

And then he dipped into his sleeve to find the opalescent sphere.

"Rejoice at the progress of your general Wu T'ang and see in his success cause for magnanimity."

The Emperor shook his head.

"Later!"

"But Wu T'ang may lose without your advice. And if your rival conquers, he becomes stronger."

"At the proper time I shall brush my rival aside like a cobweb. But not now. Show me, instead, my daughter."

Lo Chun, the sorcerer, drew close with the opalescent sphere and the two bent their heads and the room went black as before.

"See!" whispered the Emperor, and then he repeated softly, "See!"

They gazed into a room revealed in the sphere's immanent light, a room all draped in softly colored silks and with many flowers in it. Gently swinging censers cast a mild perfume. And here, upon two closely drawn seats of ivory and fur, were

HOW THE STORY BEGINS

THE war miraculously spared the life of young Major Simon Paris. "Why?" he wondered in torment, while death struck all around him. "You are spared for a special purpose," came a comforting message as if from his dead mother. But when the war ended, he still did not know what that purpose was to be. Seeking it vaguely, seeking positively his lost friend Elizabeth Glade, he first visited his two brothers in London. At Charles's house, where a great-uncle, old Gand, lay paralyzed, a secret love-affair was being carried on between Alice (Charles's wife) and Dr. Conrad Bryne. Only Swiss Jule, old Gand's male nurse, suspected the hidden passion. At Andrew's house, marital troubles of another kind were brewing. This rich and austere brother, loving his butterfly wife Linda for her beauty only, was beginning to lose his desire for the sport of pursuing her. Sim just at this time found the girl of his own heart, so the heart troubles of others faded from his notice. For Elizabeth Glade had pledged never to marry while a sum of money stolen by her father from a grim spinster, Miss Andiron, remained unrepaid.

Groping for further light on his purpose, Sim bought a cottage in the country, near the great estate of Lord Staverton, Andrew's billionaire employer. Then on the downs one evening, just at sunset, there came to Sim a vision of his Purpose—and a deep knowledge that it was to be "of God." Friendship with Sir Henry England and his happy family further led to the discovery of a bit of the Kingdom of Heaven in every human being. The solution to his problem seemed very near at hand—when old Gand's death called Sim suddenly back to London. There, Alice's affair with Conrad Bryne was in such danger of discovery that she had pledged a thousand pounds in hush money to Swiss Jule, to be paid from her husband's little fifteen-hundred-pound legacy. Linda's affairs, too, were growing more stormy. Horrified, Sim learned from her that she had run up gambling debts (unknown to Andrew) to the extent of eight thousand pounds!

PART FIVE

"WHAT I am afraid of," Sim was telling Elizabeth, "is that Linda has the plan of raising this money from people who would be only too glad to help her and who——"

He was with Elizabeth in a small ante-room of the boarding-house where Miss Andiron, who "might have had a beautiful house of her own," was "forced to live." Filled with all that was arising within him from the revelation that in the Kingdom of Heaven in us all lay the truth he sought, he had immense reasons for wishing long evenings with Elizabeth while he remained in town. But this meeting, come to straight from his interview with Linda, was their first since his arrival, and Elizabeth had been telling him that there could be no more such evenings together. She was living at the boarding-house now. Miss Andiron was very ill, and she was nursing her. Miss Andiron in her illness was pathetically different (Elizabeth said) from Miss Andiron in her health. "She is so gentle, so grateful—and Sim, though of course she can not be left, she seems to love to have me by her. You can imagine what happiness it gives me."

He had reproached her that she was taxing herself too greatly. "I get very tired," she had replied, "but, Sim, the more tired I am the greater happiness I have."

"K. O. H. happiness," he said gravely. He had already told her of his discovery of the Kingdom of Heaven. "K. O. H. happiness, because it is K. O. H. kindness that you are showing. Elizabeth, there is proof every way I turn."

"Sim, it is the most wonderful, wonderful thought," and she had gone on to speak of Miss Andiron's exemplification of it in this new gentleness and gratitude; and out of that how now, her time so taken up, they could not meet; and thus to ask him where he now was staying—"With Andrew?"

He had said, "Yes, with Andrew," and on the words had been carried straight to speak to her of Linda's cause.

"That is what I am afraid of, Elizabeth—the idea for raising this money that I believe she has on her mind. It is worrying me badly."

"What idea, Sim?"

"Why, all she is borrowing now to pay her card losses and the losses themselves that have not been paid have got to be met. Every dip she takes in those sources is just a dip deeper. But there is another source that wouldn't want to be paid back, I think. There are people—men—in Andrew's world who would jump at the chance of helping Linda and let it run till Doomsday."

"Sim, to an amount like that?"

"To more, I wouldn't be surprized. I don't know much about these things, but I am talking about the people who do huge business deals and they think in amounts that to me are just rows of meaningless figures. Presents to Linda, from their point of view, wouldn't even be a gift—they would be an investment. The people I mean are the people who want to stand in well with Andrew."

Elizabeth questioned him.

"There is a man," said Sim, "—Sir Toridd Lesson, you've probably seen his name in the papers—whom Andrew will have nothing to do with except when he has to meet him in business. Well he has been calling on Linda—and Linda, immediately after assuring me that she had ways of raising money, made me promise on no account to tell Andrew that Lesson had been there. Elizabeth, don't you see that, supposing Lesson were interested in, for instance, a South American deal of Andrew's now pending which involves the investment of some sixty million pounds—why, eight thousand pounds, twice eight thousand, would be as nothing to having a share in the huge contracts that will go out on a scheme like that? But Elizabeth, it wasn't about Linda that I came to talk."

"No, for we just got on to poor Linda's trouble somehow. It was about that thought, that discovery of yours."

He was silent a few moments, looking deeply before him. "Elizabeth," he then said, "I have a feeling that I shall not be at Barton Mill much longer."

"Sim, your Purpose?"

He very slowly nodded. "Something is quickening within me, Elizabeth, and I have a kind of instinct that courage will be called for in it and that leaving Barton Mill will be called for in it."

"Sim, Sim, it has something to do with your Kingdom of Heaven—I am sure of it!"

Happy at her perception, he smiled at her. "Yes, it is that—but I have not told you the half of it, Elizabeth. I only have told you what those Englands told to me—the little things that are Kingdom of Heaven kindness. But, while I stood by old Gand as he lay dead something happened to me, the thing that is quickening in me began. I haven't told you that."

HE BEGAN to tell her. He told her of his thought, "What peace!" beside that tranquil sanctuary upon the bed; then of the answer that suddenly had filled him—the peace of the Kingdom of Heaven. He told her then of how, delving among these revelations through the night, his mind had thrown up proof on proof—"for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven"—"Thy Kingdom come on earth as it is in Heaven"—proof in the words of Christ Himself that here indeed the sought-for knowledge lay—here, here, the faith a man could understand and live and follow.

He said: "Elizabeth, the Kingdom of Heaven in us all—in you, in me, in every one! The more I think of it, Elizabeth, the surer seem my feet to go toward it. 'Thy Kingdom come on earth as it is in Heaven.' What does it mean but that that Kingdom is already here, set in each one of us, needing only to be known to be realized?"

Elizabeth's voice when she then spoke was a whisper, "Sim—needing only to be known to be realized!"

"I'LL GIVE YOU WHAT'S COMING TO YOU," SIM CRIED AGAIN

He said: "But Elizabeth, I need courage. Why, I looked at Charles, coming up in the train with him to hear old Gand's will, and saw him, haggard in trouble sitting there, and wanted to tell things like this to him and did not like to, had not courage."

She was gazing at him, her lips still parted in that whispered echo of his words. She put a quick hand to him and said: "Oh, Sim, your Purpose—make it known."

He said very deeply: "I have thought of that."

They were alone in the room. Profoundly moved, she gave herself into his arms. He held her. She could feel the quiver in him of some great emotion. He said, "Knowledge—a little more; and courage, courage!"

"Sim, Sim!"

WHEN Sim was back at Barton Mill, he had the feeling of approach toward that final knowledge which should show him where he was to go. Something was quickening in him he had told Elizabeth—and strongly, strangely, daily, he now could feel its pulse.

Strange that beneath his very roof were two whose lives were illustrations of the enshrining in each human soul of Heaven's Kingdom—old Yeoman and his sister.

Sim was working one day with old Yeoman on the fourth of his wayside benches when the post brought him news of another person that his roof should house.

Linda—her letter informed him—was coming to him, that same day.

She gave no reason—but he guessed it.

In the afternoon he went to meet her. He had guessed aright—trouble, acute, with Andrew.

When he greeted her as she alighted from the train, and while a porter got her things— "You and Niggs?" Sim questioned. "Oh, don't ask!" she said and made a gesture mockingly calamitous.

That, and to call her last meeting with her husband "a fiend's own scene," was as far as she would go. She was in gayest spirits.

When they were out of the town, "Well, come on now, Sim, you aren't telling me anything," she cried. "What's that place on the hill over there?"

He gave way, very gladly, to her mood. "Linda, you're just having a game with me! You must have driven this road scores of times going to Staverton Park. What do you do, sleep all the time?"

"Just where you make a mighty mistake," cried Linda, "for I've never got out at Barton Magna before. Staverton Halt is where the grown-ups get out, little boy."

"Ah, I have forgotten. It is all new to you, of course."

"Absolutely fresh from the cow, and I'm losing it all because for a guide the village idiot would beat you. Come on, tell me, poor little idiot boy—that place over there? It's hideous enough. Is it a prison or is it that cottage of his that Major Simon Paris is always gassing about?"

Sim laughed. "You're nearer with your prison shot, ugly lady. That's the county isolation hospital, and pretty full at present, ma'am. Linda, have you been vaccinated yet?"

"Not me."

" 'Not I,' as B. C. D. would tell you. Well, you ought to have been, Linda—especially coming down here. Andrew ought to put a collar and chain on you and drag you off to be done."

"Oh, Andrew!" she cried. "Next time you see Andrew it will be down on his benders and offering me a bit of sugar to come back into the cage again—tears streaming down his face. You see!"

She clapped her hands. She was radiant.

"Linda, seriously, what's the game?"

She caught his arm and snuggled against him. She stretched out her legs and clapped together her dainty shoes. "Oh, wouldn't you like to know!"

"Well, I certainly would. I insist. What's at the bottom of your coming down here? Out with it, Linda."

Animatedly she told him—that Andrew had been at his blackest and most stern, that she had tried to coax him round and had failed, that she suddenly had conceived the brilliant notion of leaving him for a bit, that she knew he would be eating his heart out for her the moment she had gone, that when he saw her again he would be at her feet—and that here she was!

She stretched out and clapped her shoes together again: "Here I be, fiddle-de-dee! Here I be, fiddle-de-dee!"

Could this be the same creature who, almost in tears, had spoken to him of the bitterness of having to employ that very coaxing, and of how hard and harder to achieve was that same tragic coaxing's success? He never had seen her in higher spirits—he never had seen her, he thought, looking more radiantly lovely.

"Ugly though you are, I believe you are right," he said. "Does Niggs know you are here?"

"You bet I told him! I want that sugar he'll soon be offering me. Oh, yes, he knows. He'll come plunging down after me this very night, I shouldn't be surprized."

She was wrong there (not that it was seriously expected). Andrew did not come plunging down that night, nor in any day of those that immediately followed, nor did he write. But no qualms were given Linda by his silence. She was certain of her plan.

She was at her liveliest one night, pantomiming Andrew's ecstasies when he should see her again, and Sim had exclaimed, "Linda, you the limit, you really are!" when, on a change starting in its abruptness, she came swiftly to him and cast herself on her knees beside his chair: "Oh, but dear little Sim boy, don't think I am not in earnest. Sim, I am staking everything on that when Andrew sees me next he will be longing, longing for me. And when he is, it is fresh I'm going to start, Sim. He is going to idolize me then and I am going to be his true and worthy idol evermore. I am only excited now, because I am so certain that when next he sees me he will adore me. He will, Sim, won't he? Tell me he will—tell me, Sim!"

He put his hand on her forehead and smoothed back her lovely hair, more soft than down, more bright than gold. Beneath the brownness of his hand her skin gleamed white as milk, beneath the pleading of her mood her eyes and lips touched with new beauty the beauty of her face. He thought that such an exquisite creation could not be elsewhere in all the world. "Linda, next time he sees you he will want to worship you," he said.

She put her head down on her folded hands crossed on his chair's arm: "Oh, the next time," he heard her murmur. He always remembered that moment.

LINDA had said the next morning that she was going up to Staverton Park and would take lunch there. Left to himself, Sim rode over to the Englands' and remained for lunch. Returning, he came by Staverton Park and thought to call and see if Linda had yet left. The servant told him Linda was not there—"No, not to lunch, sir. Mrs. Paris has not called here to-day at all."

He rode home quickly. It had begun to rain and he was wet before he made Old Ballards. Linda, not there, was much the more wet when, an hour later, she turned up.

"Linda, you are soaked," he told her. "Where have you been?"

She was about to speak, but his words were running on. "You never went to Staverton after all," he said. "I called there for you just before tea."

He did not notice it then, but, when later events had struck, he could recall that she appeared in smallest degree taken aback.

All that at the time he saw was that she turned away and swished the raindrops from her felt hat. "Look at the wet! Why, no, I went a tramp—miles. I'd the sudden idea I would. It's fun. I loved it!"

"Where?"

She did not know; could not tell him; had just tramped. Lunched at a Trust House somewhere at Shifney, she thought; got caught in the rain coming back and took shelter in a cottage; stuck it till it was certain she would be there for the night if she waited for the rain to stop; came on in the rain; loved it; was ravenous—"Tea! Tea!" and she fastened upon the tea-table and ravenous appeared to be—also, beyond even her ordinary measure, animated and excited. Sim commanded her to get off her soaking things. No, no! it was lovely here by the fire—she was steaming like a tea-kettle and she loved to see herself steam and there still was tea in the teapot and cake on the plate and she wasn't going to move until the whole of it was inside her.

She moved nevertheless throughout her meal, dancing and play-acting about, cake in one hand, cup in the other. She was wildly excited. She might have been a boy who had just passed an examination—she might have been one suddenly discharged from a load of care. Sim got her off to a bath and a change at last because he caught her in a shiver—but he could hear her singing during her operations and she was as excited as ever when she reappeared, and in gay pantomiming of Andrew's ecstasies when he next should see her, and in that deep but happy cry of hers, her head on her hands, "Oh, the next time!" the evening ended.

Of her all-day tramp she would say nothing. "Well, suppose you tell me first what you've been doing all day," was her counter to his questions. And when he told her that he had visited the Englands, and that they had asked him to bring her over, enthusiastic, she insisted that they would go over on the morrow. "We'll walk," she declared. "You'll see then what a walker I am"—and they were back again on her tramp, but the most she would say, teasing him, was that it was the "most luckiest" walk she ever had had in her life; "the luckiest, luckiest ever—oh, wouldn't you like to know—oh, wouldn't you like to know!"

In the morning the high spirits were equally within her. Now her excitement was looking out for the postman—there would be a letter from Andrew she was sure, she said in explanation. She dashed out to meet the postman when he came in sight and then dashed in

REVENGE

By KAY CLEAVER STRAHAN

It may be sweet, but love is sweeter

HER name was Mary-Martha Honeywell, and that made a poem—so people, who are mostly prose, called her Bud, and she was without reverence. Her father was a black sheep (so his family said) and her mother (so his family said) was an upstart. Let it stand—adding, only, that her father was as peaceful as cleanliness, and that her mother had been as beautiful as the Twenty-third Psalm and not at all unlike it.

Had you known that people were ever born in Nevada? Bud was born there, away up in the northeastern corner of the map in a tie house built at the base of a mountain.

One reason why Felix's family—two unmarried sisters, elderly now and always exemplary—said he was a black sheep was because he had dared to step out of the innermost exclusive circle in Washington, where he and they had been born and reared, for a breath of newer, more vigorous air. In order to do this he had embraced a profession which the Misses Honeywell had considered disreputable—mining engineering—and had gone West to California, and had found Cecilia—that was the lovely name of Bud's mother—and had married her, and had never been homesick at all.

How Felix and Cecilia happened to come to the tie house at the base of a mountain in Ruby Valley is a long story, having to do with love, and with a lead and silver mine. How they happened to remain there is a shorter story. They stepped into the old, deserted house and looked out of one window at the range of Ruby Mountains, and they looked out another window across thousands of miles of serenity—and Cecilia took off her hat, and Felix built a fire of sage-brush in the big fireplace, and they said, "We'll stay for a little while."

TWO years, and Bud was born and Cecilia went to dwell in the house of the Lord forever. Bud and Felix stayed on together for nineteen years, and into a gracious September, and then Felix took a notion.

He took the notion because some young tourists from Boston took the wrong road and came by mistake to the tie house. The tie house had grown very grand during the years; outside it was covered with stucco and shaded by aspen trees, and inside it had Navajo rugs and a wall of books and a grand piano tucked slyly away in one corner of the living-room. So the young tourists treated the tie house with respect and put on their best airs and graces for it. After they had driven away in their sedan, Felix produced his notion.

He said, "Honey-bud, I've decided that I want you to accept Aunt Violet's and Aunt Lucy's invitation to you to come to Washington and visit them for a Winter's season."

Bud closes a book on a finger of hers and we see her for the first time. It is an adventure, seeing Bud for the first time, a heady sort of experience that leaves one rather breathless.

"I'm not," she answered Felix's notion, "going back East to visit those two old stiffs who were mean about mother."

"That's all long past," he said. "I have decided that I want you to accept the invitation."

She rose from the chaise-longue, she was strongly slender as a sword is slender, and walked to the window and said, "But I'll not go, you know, Fe. I'll not go."

"Yes, I think you will, Honey-bud," he responded, as if he were agreeing with every word she had said.

"Are you planning to go?"

"No— You see, there is no reason why I should go."

"I see," she replied, dangerously. "But what I don't see is why I should go."

You have read that Felix was peaceful; no mention was made of wisdom.

He said, "Bud, I realized this afternoon, when I looked at those young married people, that it was time you were meeting men of your own class. Every girl has a right to a home, and a——"

He got no further with it. Then and there Bud went on a rampage.

TWO weeks later, in Chicago, Bud, instead of going directly to another train as had been arranged, got into a taxicab and went to a hotel recommended by Miss Bobbed-hair as swell, gee, yes! but awful high-priced. Bud and Miss Bobbed-hair (who was returning eagerly to Chicago where she made—she said—seventy-five dollars a week, and to her sweetie, who was—she told the world—some sheik) had met on the train and effected a sort of chumminess, due, largely, to Bud's insistent friendly overtures.

From the hotel in Chicago, Bud sent two telegrams. A short, formal one to her waiting aunts, and a longer and less formal one to Felix.

YOU HAVE SEEN CROWDS GATHER WHERE FOOD SAMPLES ARE BEING GIVEN AWAY—MARY-MARTHA'S SUCCESS WAS LIKE THAT

The Child who won't Eat

"The world is mine"

By RICHARD M. SMITH, M.D.
Formerly secretary of the American Child Health Association and author of "The Baby's First Two Years"

FOR many parents of young children the dining-room is a daily battleground. Will the occupant of the high-chair eat the proper food his mother has provided, or won't he? At almost every meal the struggle is renewed. Of course the child does not always actively resist; frequently he is just listless about his food; has no appetite. Threats, bribes, cajoling and all kinds of strategy are considered necessary to get the proper fuel for growth and energy into his little body.

Since food is the most important single factor in the development of children, their refusal to take it is the cause of much parental anxiety. The anxious mother tries all the persuasive weapons in her arsenal and is ever ready to learn of more.

Of course appetite is a natural thing, and when a child lacks it, something is wrong. The trouble may be in either his body or his mental attitude, since mind and body work together to make perfect digestion. The sight of food and the pleasure which the normal person expects to get from eating it make the mouth begin to water and the digestive juices to flow. This increased preparation on the part of the body for receiving food makes us even more hungry, and we hurry to satisfy our desire for it. Thus appetite may fail when either the bodily or the mental part of the apparatus is out of order.

Sometimes loss of appetite follows an acute illness. In this instance it is usually only temporary, and when the child feels perfectly strong again he is willing to eat the usual amount. In such cases a tonic is often of real assistance.

On the other hand, the child may be suffering from some chronic disease, as a result of which his desire for food and ability to digest it are both lost because there is a decrease in the quantity and quality of the digestive juices, owing to the little one's poor general condition. This reason for loss of appetite is generally easy to recognize, since the child shows his weakness in other ways, and appetite returns only when the chronic disease is cured and the youngster returns to normal health. A tonic is frequently helpful in these cases also.

THERE are many children, however, who have no inclination for food at any time, though they have no acute or chronic disease and no abnormal bodily condition. It is frequently difficult to convince their mothers that there is really nothing the matter with the physical condition of these youngsters—that there isn't anything wrong with either their throats or their digestive systems. The parents find it hard to believe that what is really wrong in these cases is the child's mental attitude.

Such children are generally—to put it bluntly—badly spoiled. Their refusal to eat is just one way of showing the power they have over their parents. They enjoy having all the grown-ups in the family talking about them and making a fuss over them. The more the grown-ups discuss their lack of appetite the more satisfaction they get. These egotistical little persons have created parts for themselves and captured the center of the stage. They like the excitement which is caused by their taking a small amount of food and then vomiting because they are urged to take a little more. Mother and the nurse rush about to clear the table and the room and bring more food, often some specially prepared dainty, thus setting the stage for another scene. Sometimes the little tyrant is read to or told stories or shown toys during the meal-time, or father performs like an animal on the floor, or mother runs the victrola in the hope that the youngster can be fooled into eating more while these diversions are going on. This is all very pleasant to the high-chair ruler, and the more excitement and amusement he gets the more he wants. Such children are usually very alert physically and mentally, are active and responsive; and consequently are favorites with older people—except at meal-time. Their parents often describe them as nervous, though this term is incorrect.

What can be done about them?

First and foremost, don't let them form the habit of not taking food. Tackle the problem in infancy, and you can solve it. There are two things to consider:

THE RULER IN THE HIGH-CHAIR BECOMES AN UNMANAGEABLE TYRANT IF MOTHER ALLOWS FUSSY HABITS TO DEVELOP the kind of food and the way in which it is given. I can not go at length in this article into the question of the child's diet from babyhood through school age, except to say in a general way that he should be given simple food, and that important health builders, such as milk, cereals, vegetables and fruit, should constitute the greater part of his menu. Highly seasoned food is not good for children, nor is it well to use a great variety of flavors to conceal the taste of milk.

Foods other than milk may be introduced into the diet quite early, as it is best not to keep a child on an exclusively soft solid diet after the teeth have made their appearance. Nor should the baby be fed on the bottle more than a week or two longer than the first birthday.

I have often heard mothers complain that the diet recommended for their children was monotonous. Inquiry sometimes reveals the fact that the child has never made any complaint; the mother has simply tired of preparing the same things day after day and week after week. Of course the youngster's food ought to contain a certain variety during the week, but this does not mean that he should have all the dishes the grown-ups eat. Don't give him tastes from the family table; it will only serve to spoil his liking for his own food.

The way in which food is given to a child is almost as important as the kind of food. Establish regular hours for feeding and stick to them; otherwise the child will not recognize the need for regularity. Especially do not give him food between meals, except in the form of a definite lunch coming at the same time every day.

Another point: Don't let meal-time be turned into play-time, either for the infant or the school child. It is not a good thing to tease the baby while he is eating, or to try to amuse him, or to make him the center of a ring of admiring relatives.

A third important rule is: Teach him as early as possible to feed himself. Many children are still being fed years after they ought to be eating without assistance.

And don't discuss food in front of him; children are so imitative. I have heard mothers say: "I suppose it's natural for Johnny not to like spinach. I never liked it myself." The truth is that if Johnny had never heard her make this remark he probably would be eating spinach obediently. The same rule applies to the introduction of new articles of food into the diet. Just add them, without discussion. A veiled apology—"Here are some nice carrots which are good for the baby"—will sometimes excite suspicion, even in the infantile mind, and cause a revulsion of taste.

Some children are confused by having too much food offered them at one time. Of course their diet should be reasonably varied and the amounts sufficient for growth and health, but it is usually better to put before them only the food which is to be eaten at once—that is, the dessert should not be put on the tray before the meat and vegetables have been consumed. One course at a time is best, and in the proper order.

Begin early in the game, for your own sake and the child's, to insist that he learn to eat everything that is offered him. Of course this doesn't mean that you must offer him most frequently the things he likes the least, but don't let him form the habit of demanding and getting dishes which have not been prepared.

The child should also be allowed an adequate amount of time for each meal, but not enough to let him dawdle. Half an hour is sufficient for breakfast and supper, and three-quarters of a hour for dinner: At the end of the allotted time take the food away, clear the table, and send the young one about the next thing to be done. Don't discuss the fact that his meal was left unfinished, or that he has not had enough to eat, or that he won't grow strong if he doesn't take the proper amount of food. Make him realize that the time for eating is now over. When his meals are treated in this matter-of-fact way, he is very likely to settle down to normal; fussing about his food has ceased to be a pleasant diversion.

Of course it is frequently hard for the mother to reach this common-sense state of mind. But if she simply can't keep from showing that she is worried about the baby's food, she had better keep away from the room in which he is eating and let some one else give it to him, some one who can take toward him an attitude of absolute indifference as to whether he eats the meal prepared for him or not. The child will, in time, work out his own salvation. He may go hungry for a time—but not permanently. Before long he will acquire the right attitude of mind.

So we see that the mother's is usually the final responsibility for lack of appetite in children. This trouble does not develop with those who have been well brought up from infancy. If it has developed, the only cure is reeducation. The young ones must readjust their attitude toward the daily routine of life and toward their environment. Feeding can not be considered apart from the rest of life.

IT'S YOUR OWN FAULT

You would not need to worry about that finicky little youngster if you got down to the root of the trouble. Lack of appetite is nearly always caused by the mistakes that mothers make. Why is your child hard to feed? Is it faulty nutrition, lack of variety, a chronic disease or just bad training?

It is necessary to correct the condition, whatever the cause. Next month we tell you of one important step in the process. "Vegetables for Children" shows you the need for vegetables in a balanced diet, and tells how children can be trained to like them.

Eating habits are important. But so are all the others. There's sleep for instance. If you have difficulty enforcing the afternoon nap, or getting the children to bed at night, if you want to know how much sleep children need at various ages, what are the best conditions and the clothing they should have while they sleep, write for our new leaflet—"Baby's Sleep Habits," enclosing a two-cent stamp for postage. IF YOU lived in a little fishing village of Denmark, there would come a day at the end of February as exciting as Christmas. Your mother would clean your pretty, red-brick house from top to toe, and scrub the double windows till they shone like crystal. (Danish windows have double panes to keep out the cold, and in the space between, people grow plants and flowers, like a little greenhouse.) Mother and big sister would deck out in their best, and father might bearded fireman squirting water on everybody, and comical men dressed as women (there's your father!) and big-headed trolls (do you see your brother?) and every kind of crazy costume the fisherman could invent.

Every man holds a big club. What for? Why, to break the back of Winter. Just wait and see.

High across the main street, strung on a rope from flagpole to flagpole hangs a barrel, a very gay red-and-blue barrel, painted especially for the parade. If the men can break it with their clubs, they will have broken the back of Winter, and Spring will soon be coming.

City people crowd the windy street, wrinkled grandmothers smile above green plants in near-by windows, and babies press pink noses against the panes. The village band—men in black suits sitting in a shiny, black carriage—begins to play. Down the street the parade stops.

Whoop! here comes the first horseman. He gallops under the barrel, rises in his saddle, and strikes his club at it—thwack!

But the barrel swings on as strong as ever. Winter is not so easily broken.

Whoop! On gallops the next horseman and takes a mighty crack. Thwack! But the barrel swings on. Whoop! On comes the next horseman and the next and the next—thwack! thwack! and thwack! But the barrel swings on.

Now the wagons rattle by. All the funny firemen stand up and thwack! go their clubs, and whizz! squirts the water. Everybody laughs. But the barrel swings on.

Now the men in skirts take a swing that nearly splits their dress-seams—thwack! thwack! thwack! and thwack! But the barrel swings on. Thwack! go the big-headed trolls and the clown policemen and all the crazy wagonfuls. You stand up all excited in your red-and-yellow suit and slap at the barrel with a fish—thwack! How the city people laugh! But the barrel swings on. Will old Winter's back never be broken?

Round the cobbled street behind the little red-brick houses rattles the parade, and stops. The horsemen begin once more—thwack! thwack! So do the wagon people—thwack! thwack! A second time and a third and a fourth and a fifth the parade passes under the barrel between the flagpoles, and thwack! swing all the clubs. The band plays anxiously, babies press their noses flatter against the windows, grandmothers shake their heads and sigh: "Ah, boys were stronger in my day!" City people are stamping their feet and blowing their fingers in the cold sea wind, when——

One day, the little town of Odense, where he was born, invited him home again to be given the freedom of the town, which meant he could go anywhere and do anything without paying. All the houses were decorated, the school children had a holiday, the mayor and all sorts of important men made speeches, and at night a torchlight procession marched by the Town Hall, where the great man stood—Hans Andersen—who had once been a queer, timid little shoemaker's boy running barefooted daily over those same cobbled streets.

The fairy-tale had come true, and the Ugly Duckling was a beautiful swan at last.

put on one of mother's old dresses and a mask and wig, while big brother and his friends would perhaps dress like trolls, those ugly underground fairies with big heads. If your family owned a horse and wagon, out they would come, to be decorated for the village parade. For to-day you must know the great Spring Festival is being celebrated by the villagers.

If you are lucky, you are chosen to wear a red-and-yellow clown suit and sit inside the Big Horn of Plenty on one of the gay wagons. That pleases you especially because, although the horn is only pasteboard, it looks like the wonderful almond-cake, striped with white icing, which mothers and bakers make only once a year for the Spring Festival day.

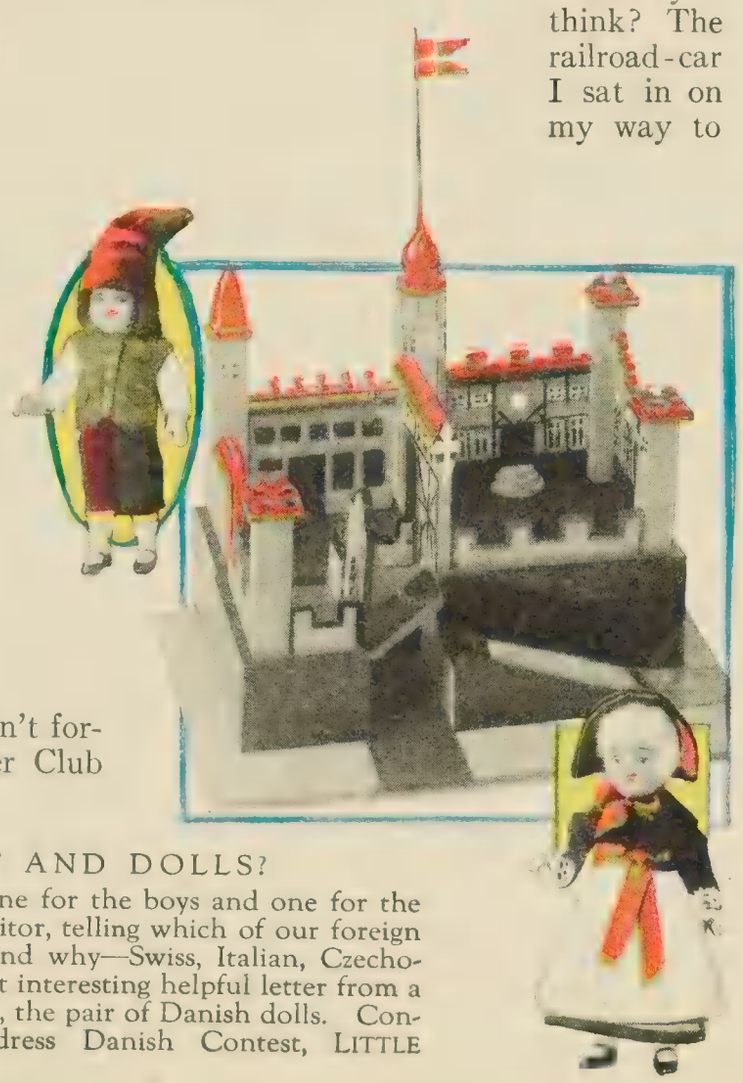
PICTURE EDITOR—ROBERT GRAEF

AN OLD VIKING SHIP OF THE FIRST PEOPLE WHO LIVED IN DENMARK

MY LITTLE PAGE



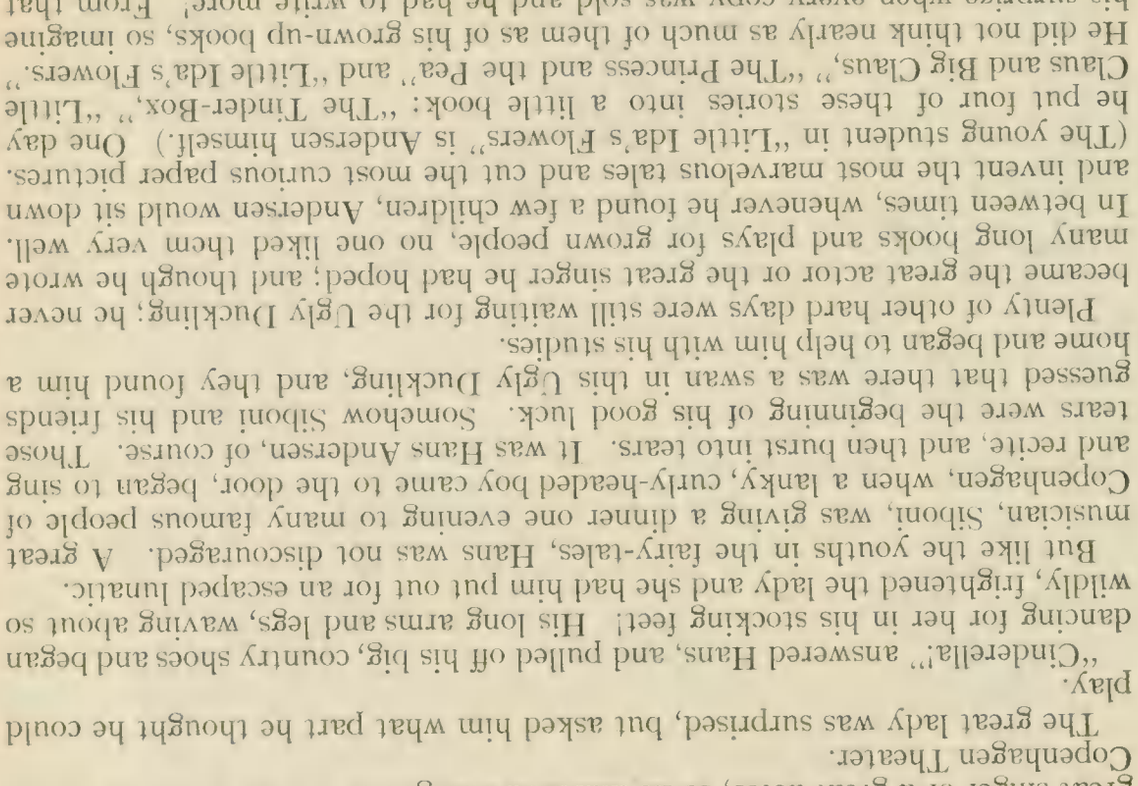
DEAR CHILDREN:

Well, your editor is hopping around Europe, isn't she? And here is your Danish number from 'way up North in Denmark! I hope you're finding all the countries and cities on your map each month. And please don't stop writing to me, just because I'm far away.

What do you think? The railroad-car I sat in on my way to Denmark was run on tracks on to the ferry-boat which took us across the water from Warnemünde to Gjedser. When we reached shore, the bow of the boat bent up to make a bridge, and our car ran through. Before I say good-by, I must explain the cover. It is an old Viking ship, like those used by the Norsemen hundreds of years ago.

Your editor-in-Denmark,
HARRIET IDE EAGER.

P. S.—D. C. members, don't forget to send for your October Club Secret letter.



WHOSE FORT AND DOLLS?

Here are two Danish prizes, one for the boys and one for the girls. Write a letter to your editor, telling which of our foreign numbers you have liked best and why—Swiss, Italian, Czecho-Slovakian or Danish. The most interesting helpful letter from a boy will win the fort; from a girl, the pair of Danish dolls. Contest closes October 20. Address Danish Contest, LITTLE DELINEATOR, New York, N. Y.

The Ugly Duckling of Denmark

MOST of you have seen on the map of Europe that wiggly little country, full of islands, called Denmark, and all of you, I hope, have read "Andersen's Fairy-Tales." But did you know that Hans Andersen was born in Denmark—that his father was a poor shoemaker, and that his own life happened like the story of the Ugly Duckling who became a swan?

The Andersen family had only one room to live in, but little Hans used to climb the ladder to the roof, where his mother grew vegetables and flowers in a big chest of earth between the gutters. Years later, Andersen made that roof-garden bloom again in "The Snow Queen"—do you remember Kay and Gerda playing around it in the story?

But it was not only because he was poor that Hans was an Ugly Duckling. He was a timid, queer little boy, afraid to play rough games with other children, and he loved best to dress up dolls for his toy theater and make them act stories of his own imagining.

At night, his mother set him in the middle of their big, old-fashioned bed, and drew the curtains—later, his little trundle-bed would be pulled out from underneath and he would be laid in it, half asleep. Little Hans would lie there, blinking drowsily, watching the shadows through the thin curtains and listening to his father reading "Arabian Nights" aloud. Perhaps the strange stories mixed with his dreams were the beginning of the fairy-tales he wrote so many years later.

Poor Hans was even afraid to start to school, so his mother, who spoiled him badly, promised that if ever the teacher whipped him, he might come home to stay. One day the old lady did. Hans picked up his books and slate and never went back again.

He was an odd-looking boy and he grew odder as he grew older—tall and gawky, with a big nose and curly hair and a high voice like a girl's, wearing his father's made-over clothes that did not fit. Of course all the children poked fun at him, just as the chickens in the barnyard pecked and poked at the poor Ugly Duckling in the story—for children can be very cruel.

But Hans believed in fairy-tales. When he was fourteen years old, he took a little money he had saved and set off for the city of Copenhagen to seek his fortune, like all the youths in the stories. He hoped to become a great singer or a great actor, so he marched straight to a famous dancer of the Copenhagen Theater.

The great lady was surprised, but asked him what part he thought he could play.

"Cinderella!" answered Hans, and pulled off his big, country shoes and began dancing for her in his stocking feet. His long arms and legs, waving about so wildly, frightened the lady and she had him put out for an escaped lunatic.

But like the youths in the fairy-tales, Hans was not discouraged. A great musician, Siboni, was giving a dinner one evening to many famous people of Copenhagen, when a lanky, curly-headed boy came to the door, began to sing and recite, and then burst into tears. It was Hans Andersen, of course. Those tears were the beginning of his good luck. Somehow Siboni and his friends guessed that there was a swan in this Ugly Duckling, and they found him a home and began to help him with his studies.

Plenty of other hard days were still waiting for the Ugly Duckling; he never became the great actor or the great singer he had hoped; and though he wrote many long books and plays for grown people, no one liked them very well. In between times, whenever he found a few children, Andersen would sit down and invent the most marvelous tales and cut the most curious paper pictures. (The young student in "Little Ida's Flowers" is Andersen himself.) One day he put four of these stories into a little book: "The Tinder-Box," "Little Claus and Big Claus," "The Princess and the Pea" and "Little Ida's Flowers." He did not think nearly as much of them as of his grown-up books, so imagine his surprise when every copy was sold and he had to write more! From that time on he became the famous Hans Andersen of the fairy-tales. Everybody loved them, kings invited him to read them aloud, and in any country where he went, boys and girls on the street ran to greet him as their best friend.

LITTLE TEXAS

A circus suddenly changes hands—and brings to an heiress a change of heart

By DIXIE WILLSON

HE STEADIED THE CONTRACT ON HIS KNEE WHILE TEXAS SIGNED ON THE DOTTED LINE "KINGSLEY FITZGERALD"

PART FOUR—CONCLUSION

TEXAS moved her hands in a helpless little way, her eyes wide on Kingsley Fitzgerald's face.

"My—my grandfather!" she repeated, almost whispering it; "but I haven't any grandfather!"

"That was—a mistake." Mr. Fitzgerald said, an odd note in his voice.

Joe stretched across the grass lazily, reached for Texas's hand and drew her toward him.

"No, it wasn't any mistake, Texas," he said. "Can't you remember this gent walkin' past us in the train that day, lookin' us up and down?"

Texas looked at the tall old man, who glanced sharply at Joe and uneasily back to her.

"Why, yes—why, yes," she said after a long minute. "He came walking into our car and looked at the doll you made."

Joe laughed.

"That's it," he said. "Nobody can fool this kid! All right, honey! Remember when that conductor went away so fast? Well, what he went after was this gentleman right here, who was travelin' on the same train, with his name marked out on his grip so big the conductor remembered it! Well—that conductor went and told this gentleman the whole thing, and brought him back to look us over—and this here gentleman, Texas, was ashamed of us! That's what! So he beats us to the lawyer and tells him to make us believe he's dead or gone and to get us out of the way! Honey, that's what he did! When I went to get the tickets for us to come back to the show, the brakeman who was along with that conductor on the train told me the whole business!"

Mr. Fitzgerald's lips twitched. His fingers opened and closed nervously over the edge of his silk hat. Texas clung to Joe's hand.

"Why, Joe," she said in a voice that hardly knew what it was saying, "did you know all this time that I did have a grandfather?"

She looked up at the old aristocrat incredulously. "And did you know all this time that you had me?" she asked, vaguely trying to understand.

"I wouldn't call nobody my grandfather that was ashamed of me," Joe said scornfully, "and as to me knowin'—say, when you'd been figurin' ever since you could talk on a grandpa bein' the perfectest man in the world, was I goin' to tell you that the only one you had didn't want you?"

Mr. Fitzgerald listened to Joe as he had listened to the conductor, though it seemed as if he hardly heard, for devouring Texas with his eyes.

When Joe was done talking, the child looked up at Mr. Fitzgerald frankly.

"Mother and I didn't want any money," she said with childlike simplicity. "We only wanted a relation. But we're all used to not having any now, so you don't need to bother about us. You can just go home again."

Kingsley Fitzgerald rested his ebony stick against the canvas. Performers passed in and out, gold-wheeled wagons rumbled by, the band played on, but neither he nor she knew it. He put out his hand to her.

"But I've come after you," he said. "I've been trying everywhere to find you. You can leave your mother here and come to live with me. I'll buy you everything you want."

"Leave my mother?" Texas questioned. "Why should I leave my mother? And I don't want to live with you! I don't want you to buy me anything! You see, I wasn't a performer when I went to find you—Mama Meg and I wanted a grandfather then—but we're all right now, thank you." She studied him thoughtfully. "Are you sure you're my grandfather?" she asked politely. "Mother and I didn't expect one like you at all!"

Mr. Fitzgerald smiled a little stiffly. "What did you expect?" he asked.

Texas tucked herself closer to Joe.

"Oh," she told him, "just a regular grandpa, you know—to make pop-corn and tell stories and live in a little grandpa-house, with not much money."

Aunt Mary came out of the dressing-tent.

"Come and take off your dress, Pettie," she said, looking inquiringly at the tall old stranger. "Joe's waiting to take you home to your mother."

"Oh, my, yes!" Texas said hurriedly. "I'll be ready in one minute, Joe!" She turned to her grandfather. "My mother isn't very well to-day," she said, "so I'm going right back to her. If you came clear to Lynchburg, Virginia, just to take me home with you, I'm sorry you had all that trouble, but as long as you didn't exactly want me, you don't care, do you?" She approached him and offered her hand. "Good-by," she said simply.

Mr. Fitzgerald felt the little hand in his a moment, then saw the child turn to Aunt Mary and disappear in the dressing-tent. Joe got up and strolled over to the bear-cage.

WHEN Texas came out ten minutes later, in a rather soiled gingham and with streaks of dusty fingers across the warm dampness of her cheeks, she was much surprized to see her grandfather still waiting.

"Oh," she asked, "did you wait to see the circus?" She had a letter in her hand—fluttering, closely written pages.

"I waited to see—your mother," he said.

Texas considered.

"Mama Meg isn't well to-day," she said doubtfully, "and I don't think she'd want to see a stranger, but of course we can go and ask her."

So Joe, Texas and the tall old man went across the blue-grass meadow toward the string of cars with their little blowing white curtains. Texas clung to Joe's hand and watched for a sight of Meg.

"What's the matter to-day, honey," Joe asked, disregarding entirely the man who strode beside them. "You're so quiet. Don't you feel good?"

"I guess it's just because Mama Meg's going away, Joe," she said, her voice breaking. "I don't know—I don't know—" She caught her fingers tighter in his. "Joe, what can I do with mother gone?" she cried, her voice suddenly strained and frightened.

Her grandfather said nothing, asked nothing. Texas was conscious only of Joe and herself and the cars ahead. Joe put his arm around her protectingly.

"Now, it's all right, honey," he soothed, "everybody's going to take care of you, just like they did the little brown bear when its mama went to the zoo! You couldn't ask for nothing more'n for your mother to get better, could you—and ain't that what's goin' to happen?"

Texas made another streak across her face with tears and little soiled fingers.

"I know it, Joe, only—oh, there she is!"

Meg, in something sheer and white, was lying on a bank of bright pillows and rugs in the shady slope between the cars and the meadow. Her hair was in braids over her shoulders, her feet in white sandals, her hands full of wild-flowers, and Torchy, in the grass beside her, was trying with sharp fingers to untangle a ball of knitting-wool.

As Texas squirmed under the fence, Joe and Mr. Fitzgerald following, they heard Meg laugh aloud.

"But Torchy, the grasshopper was exactly on the end of your nose!" she was saying. Then she heard Texas come bounding through the grass.

"Oh," she cried, "my baby's home again!"

She turned eagerly as Texas tumbled down to her, rumpling her all over with quick hot kisses. Then Meg saw Kingsley Fitzgerald standing there.

To him she seemed scarcely older than Texas—this slender girl, pale, frail, delicately lovely as she looked up surprized and questioning. Then she drew herself up among the pillows and leaned forward, her eyes on his face.

"You are—King's father," she said slowly.

Joe and Torchy went away down the track. Texas brought a wicker chair from the cars for her grandfather and then curled herself in the crook of her mother's arm. Across the meadow the sound of the band and the calliope came faintly.

Frankly, simply, Texas repeated to Meg what the brakeman had told Joe. Meg watched the stern old man as the child talked—saw that his face scarcely changed expression.

"Well then, darling," she said when Texas's story was done, "as long as Mr. Fitzgerald didn't quite want you—how glad we are that you didn't quite find him!"

"But you're quite wrong," Mr. Fitzgerald said sharply, bringing his fists down on the arms of the chair emphatically. "I wish to take Kingsley with me. I wish to make her my sole heir. I have a governess for her—clothes—everything she needs."

Meg smiled and caught her fingers in the little silken curls. "She needs love more than anything," she said meaningly, "and I think perhaps there will be more of that here! You didn't want her—and I don't believe she wants you—though of course that's entirely for her to say."

Texas put her head on one side.

"Mother, I don't want to hurt Mr. Fitzgerald's feelings, when he's come all this long way," she said, "but don't you think it would be all right for me just to stay here and earn money?" Then suddenly she remembered the letter still in her fingers. "Mother, the doctor told you about the letter from Mrs. Sunny for you to come to the cottage, didn't he? Wasn't it wonderful that Mr. Fobes should ask you just the very same day we needed somewhere to take you! Won't it be fun, and won't you be happy! Think how fast you'll get well with flowers and chickens and apple-trees and a little tiny sweet house! I can spare you now mother, because I want you to be there!"

Meg held the bright head against her cheek.

"I—I've been ill, Mr. Fitzgerald," she explained. "That's why Texas went into the ring. The doctor thinks best that I should have rest and care, so I am going to-morrow to dear friends in St. Louis."

"I will take you to St. Louis," Mr. Fitzgerald said quickly. "I will take you to my home. I will see that every care is provided."

"Oh, but you see, mother is going to Mr. Fobes and Mrs. Sunny," Texas told him sweetly. "Thank you, but they have a brand-new cottage and chickens and everything like that!"

"I made Mr. Fobes a present of a limousine yesterday," Mr. Fitzgerald said.

Texas sat up in complete surprise.

"Mr. Fobes!" she exclaimed. "Do you know Mr. Fobes?"

Mr. Fitzgerald smiled at her.

"It was Mr. Fobes who found you for me," he told her, "or rather, who found my lawyer. I have not seen Mr. Fobes himself."

"Oh, Mr. Fobes is such friends with me," Texas said. "I loved him very much the first time I saw him—for a very special reason—and I decided, when I heard about his chickens and little house, that I'd have him for my grandpa, as long as he was just like I wanted and there wasn't any other. For one thing, Mr. Fobes wears red neckties on purpose to please me! I thought I would ask you to wear them, too, when I first went to find you—but then I didn't know you had so much money! I guess rich men only like to wear black ones."

Doctor Mifflin interrupted them, coming from the lot. He got under the fence and came into the shade, mopping his perspiring face, his hat on the back of his head.

"Well, well, here's my two girls!" he greeted gaily—then, without ceremony, offered his hand to Mr. Fitzgerald as that gentleman rose. "Glad to know you, sir," the doctor said. "Heard you were here. You chose a mighty hot day to pay us a visit! Meg—" and he turned to his patient—"this is fine about the Fobes cottage opening its arms to you—but I came over to say we'd better start to-night. Cooler traveling, quicker trip, better all around. I'll go with you—and we'll leave at eight. How's that?"

Mr. Fitzgerald coughed slightly.

"Doctor," he said, "unless it's necessary for you to go, I will be able to accompany my—my daughter to St. Louis, and my—granddaughter, too, I hope. I came with the idea of taking them both with me."

He looked down at Texas—and the doctor did—and Meg did—all silent, waiting for her to speak.

"I think," the little girl said at last. "I think mother would rather go to Mrs. Sunny's where the chickens are—and I think I'd rather stay here and earn our own money. You see, it was because you thought we needed some money that you didn't want us, so I think mother and I would rather take care of each other."

The sun was low by seven o'clock, the lot was soft Virginia blue. Torchy had gone to do the lights alone—to set the yellow gas flames flaring in the wind. Aunt Mary and Madam Helen had packed a case with the clothes Meg would need, and there, around the dressing-tent, the same little crowd that had gathered once to say good-by to Texas gathered now to say good-by to Meg. Doctor Mifflin was waiting to go with her to the station, where Mr. Fitzgerald had gone to see to the accommodations.

THEN WITH A WILD RUSH SHE PELTED INTO HIS ARMS. "GRANDAD, YOU OLD SCAMP," SHE QUAVERED, "GIVE TEXAS A KISS!"

Josephine was to live in the stateroom with Texas and Gipsy Jean was to wash, iron and mend the little ginghams.

The minutes went quickly, stars came out here and there, until at half-past seven Meg, pale but smiling, kissed Texas, clung to her hand just a moment—then Doctor Mifflin lifted her into the car, and the parting was all over.

Joe swung Texas up into his big arms and without a word to any one strode with her into the meadows, where nothing was—but crickets singing in the grass—and daisies going to sleep.

AUGUST at Fitzgerald Mansion was like an artist's picture in gold and amber. It was late in the afternoon, two weeks after Meg had become a beloved part of life in the cottage, that Mr. Kingsley Fitzgerald's limousine started to the Fobes's tiny cottage to call for her according to Mr. Cuffly's arrangement of the day before.

Every soul God puts in His world has its own little importance! Who would have thought that just one small person, traveling one day in a dusty passenger train, could have been the cause of stir upon stir in a busy, growing, moving city?

The uprooting of every routine of Fitzgerald Mansion, an attorney's entire attention, a wedding, a cottage, the casual drawing up of Jason Fobes before Crandle's boarding-house in his own private car—stir upon stir—and now this day when Meg Fitzgerald for the first time was to enter her husband's home!

At first she had declined to go, but Mr. Fitzgerald had asked for just one hour, so to-day he was calling for her. She still felt much in awe of this tall old relative who had come to them so unexpectedly. She wished, as she waited, that for this one day she might have her child's utter fearlessness of the whole wide world.

When she saw the long car turning down the street, she felt her fingers growing cold—but she steadied herself and walked with Jason to meet it.

She felt very small, very needful of strength as they rolled along through the parks and quiet boulevards to Fitzgerald Mansion—she in the great foreign velvet-lined car, alone with this man so much like King—yet so very unlike him.

"I sent Kingsley a watch," Mr. Fitzgerald said, "and she—she returned it to me!"

Meg looked up quickly.

"Returned it?" she repeated. "What did she say?"

Mr. Fitzgerald drew a note from his side pocket and handed it to the little girl's mother. It read:

MY DEAR SIR:

I thank you. I wore the watch yesterday, but I thought you would rather have the money, so I will send it back. Yours truly,

KINGSLEY FITZGERALD TEXAS.

Meg could not but smile.

"That's very like her," she said. "She has her father's pride, and I have taught her to think for herself."

"Doesn't she care anything for what her father would wish?" Mr. Fitzgerald asked rather curtly.

Meg's hands were in her lap—her eyes fixed on the gold wedding-ring there on her left hand where King had put it. Paris came back to her—King so young and eager—the message this father had sent—the three years of struggle!

"Did you—care for anything her father wished?" she dared ask.

They rode the rest of the way in silence through the warm mellow fragrance of Summer afternoon. They turned in at the great Fitzgerald gates. Mishmer loped across the lawn, then spread his tail and strutted toward them in great dignity as Mr. Fitzgerald helped Meg to the ground and guided her, still in silence, past the fountains up the terrace. The multimillionaire took her carefully to the veranda and placed her in a low cushioned chair. She saw the small porch furniture—the books, the tea-set—she closed her eyes and the tears dropped down on her cheeks.

What should we Spend for Food?

By FLORA THURSTON

POINTS IN FOOD ECONOMY

Here are the rules to remember when you plan your food budget:

1. Money wisely spent for food is the best kind of health insurance.
2. Select the most important foods first.
3. Lose as little food value as possible in preparing meals and using left-overs.
4. Make wholesome foods attractive and appetizing so that the family will like what it has to eat rather than eat merely what it likes.
5. Have your own garden, if possible, and grow nearly all the vegetables you need.

"But," you may ask, "what are the important foods, and how can I make the wholesome foods attractive?"

If you would like to know how, send for our leaflet "Eating on a Budget." It gives you a large and varied group of menus that are healthful, appetizing and inexpensive. Another helpful leaflet is "The Cost of Food." This tells you how to divide your food allowance—what part for meat, how much for milk, butter and eggs, and how much for all the other divisions of the diet. It will help you reduce expenses without eliminating important foods. Just a two-cent stamp for postage will bring you both pamphlets. Send your request to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and they will go to you at once.

START A SERVICE CORNER

Just a small shelf will hold the handy leaflets that are so valuable when you have a few minutes to read about little Mary's training or the way you are going to decorate the living-room, or when you want to try a new recipe. Every month we offer you new leaflets that will add to your little library. They are interesting and practical, and have been edited and approved by the directors in our various departments.

Look through the articles in this issue and choose the aids you want us to send you. Here are the services our experts have prepared for October, and if you will turn to the page number given after each one in this list you will get further details:

IF "THE most comfortable place to live is inside your income," certainly for most families a food budget is a necessity before moving in. Without a plan the food bills are likely to consume too large a proportion of the family income and keep the savings account from growing as rapidly as it should. Any home-maker who is eager to have her family get the most out of life on a limited income must first decide how much she can reasonably allow for food, and then see that every penny yields a good return.

She will recognize, however, that it is poor economy to spend so little for food that the safety of her family is in danger, because one of the most important sources of family wealth is family health. There are certain foods which are important in any dietary no matter what the cost. These should be provided first, then others added to give palatability. Food luxuries should be included only if there is money to spare.

The charts at the end of this article represent the weekly food bill for an average person, and show at what low cost an adequate diet may be purchased. Chart I gives the market order for the cheapest desirable selection at low and at moderate prices. Chart II shows how a larger allowance for food provides a greater margin of safety and a wider variety of vegetables and fruits.

The amounts suggested are sufficient for an active woman, an adolescent girl, a sedentary man or a young boy. About one-fifth more will be needed for an active man or an adolescent boy, and one-fifth less for a sedentary woman or a young girl.

THE foods listed in Chart I have been selected because in most localities they provide the greatest amount of food value for the least cost. In making substitutions, it is essential that an equally good food be chosen. Any greens may be used in place of spinach, which can be either canned or fresh in season. If oranges are as cheap as tomatoes, they may be used interchangeably. Any fresh fruit can be substituted for apples at the same price. The apples should be used raw as often as possible.

By combining the fruit with cereal foods, it may be stretched and so appear often though in small amounts. In place of some of the milk, it would be economical to purchase occasionally cottage cheese at fifteen cents or twenty cents a pound, because the food value is similar and the cost is less. The cabbage should be served raw as often as possible, because it is more valuable raw than cooked. Prunes or raisins are among the best and cheapest of the dried fruits.

No part of the family income should be more carefully guarded than that set aside for food. Sound bodies can not be built and maintained without the needed abundance of good materials. If necessary, sacrifice even savings for food, since money wisely spent for right food is the best investment and health insurance that any family can have.

Learn what you should include in the daily dietary and how much it will cost. Then try to make the income provide the best possible protection which food can give. Remember that to cut down on food bills may mean depleted health and costly illness.

When eggs are sixty cents or more a dozen, it may not be advisable to use them often. They may be reduced or eliminated from the diet temporarily until the price is lowered, or water-glass eggs may be used. The beans included in the diet lists are a source of much excellent food value, but they should be made as digestible as possible, particularly for the children. Bean soup is probably its most acceptable form. If cheap cuts of meat can be attractively prepared, the family may afford a little more than is listed. This may be stretched by combining meat with cereal foods and vegetables.

Bread and cereal are somewhat interchangeable, but it is important to emphasize the whole-grain products. Other sweets may be used in place of sugar if they can be secured as low as six cents a pound.

Butter should be used generously, since it has a high vitamin content.

The standard of Chart I when compared with the food-selection Score-Card published in THE DELINEATOR in June, 1924, will fall a little short, because it represents not a desirable safe standard but a minimum safe standard. Every effort should be made to keep it as high as possible and to waste nothing. Chart II is a more ample one and contains foods that are more expensive but not always as valuable as those in Chart I. It provides for a desirable standard as well as a good margin of safety, but it does not permit the luxuries of food out of season, the finest cuts of meat and other expensive foods that are delicacies but not really essential in the diet.

If liberal amounts of fruits and vegetables are allowed, if bacon and marmalade are added to increase the satisfaction and food value of the breakfast, if cream instead of top milk is provided for cereal and coffee and other similar high spots of flavor are included, from fifteen to thirty cents a day or from one to two dollars a week will need to be added to the allowance for each person. An extra allowance will have to be made in any of the budgets if food is purchased out of season, if it is wasted or if prices are more than moderately high. When a diet is generous or on a luxury level, there is more temptation to exceed the limit of moderation, especially in the case of foods that fatten but do not strengthen. Special care should be taken to see that the total amount of food is not more than health requires and that the selection is well balanced and rates high on THE DELINEATOR Score-Card.

IF A home-maker decides to feed her family on the lowest desirable amount, she will need to use considerable care in the selection and preparation of the food. The variety she has to choose from will necessarily be small, because she must select the cheapest foods of each kind. Her ingenuity, therefore, may be taxed to the utmost in making each appearance of the same food somewhat different and always attractive.

The problem of conserving all the food value each food has to contribute is much more acute in the low-priced budget than in the one allowing a larger variety. It is possible and even probable that one-half the chief value of vegetables may be lost by careless methods of cooking. Since vegetables are one of the chief sources of vitamins and minerals, no one, and especially the economical home-maker, can afford to throw down her sink half the price she has paid for so important an article of diet. Instead she can steam the vegetables or boil them in a small amount of water and serve the juice with the vegetable or use it for sauces or soups. Better still, she may pare them thinly, avoid soaking them and bake them in a dish which will conserve all their flavor and juices.

Accepted by the Light

By CELIA CAROLINE COLE

OH, I CANT GO!

"YESTERDAY I FELT IT ACCEPTED BY THE LIGHT"

WHAT a drab world this would be if there were no such things as dreams; if people never closed their eyes to shut out things as they are, never opened their minds to let their imaginations slip out the open door into things as they might be! Here a man sends out his dream like an ever-widening circle of light into the No-Man's land of the Undiscovered, and brings back the steam-engine, the printing-press, the radio. There a woman, "last at the Cross and first at the Resurrection," visions beauty and freedom and peace where ugliness and limitation and strife now are—and the faith that is born of her dreams spreads through her children and so through the race. Yes, our dreams give us our faith, the sustaining belief that even though life be a mist there is a burning star at its heart which one can seek and find.

And if we did not have these dreams? There would be no growth, no progress; in fact there would probably be no human race—just cells, perhaps, or something with no capacity to dream.

All the lovely things in the world are dreams come true. All the magic around us is a dream come true.

THE reason we're talking about dreams instead of about bottles and jars is that we have just found a magic phrase of inspiration. It was at a studio party where a lot of painters and sculptors were discussing a figure recently finished by our host, and he said, "It was not until yesterday that I felt it accepted by the light."

"Accepted by the light!" Clear, white light falling on it from all sides and finding no flaw in it! What a lovely expression! What a lovely dream—to have all one's work accepted by the light!

And straightway our mind flew to women, and what they mean in this confused, whirling, multi-colored old world. For some reason, other kinds of people—men and children and dogs and rabbits and everybody—can be a little hit-or-miss and incomplete, but woman—the last high note in the symphony written by the Great Composer—must be accepted by the light. She must be virtuous and stimulating and patient and noble and alluring and understanding and witty and beautiful. Yes!

"Accepted by the light." Think of a wide, revealing shaft of amber light turned on you, full—your face, hair, body, habits, aims, thoughts, desires. We couldn't bear it calmly, many of us, could we?

And yet it's happening to us all the time, from that every-day light that shows up as you sit with your back to the window, for instance—if you're past thirty-five, never let anybody put you with your back directly to the window, it's the act of an enemy—shows up every poor little sagging muscle, every tired, worn line; from that light up to the blaze you have turned on your soul each time you measure yourself by some person you meet or read about, keen, clear, gallant and fine in all her reactions and battles!

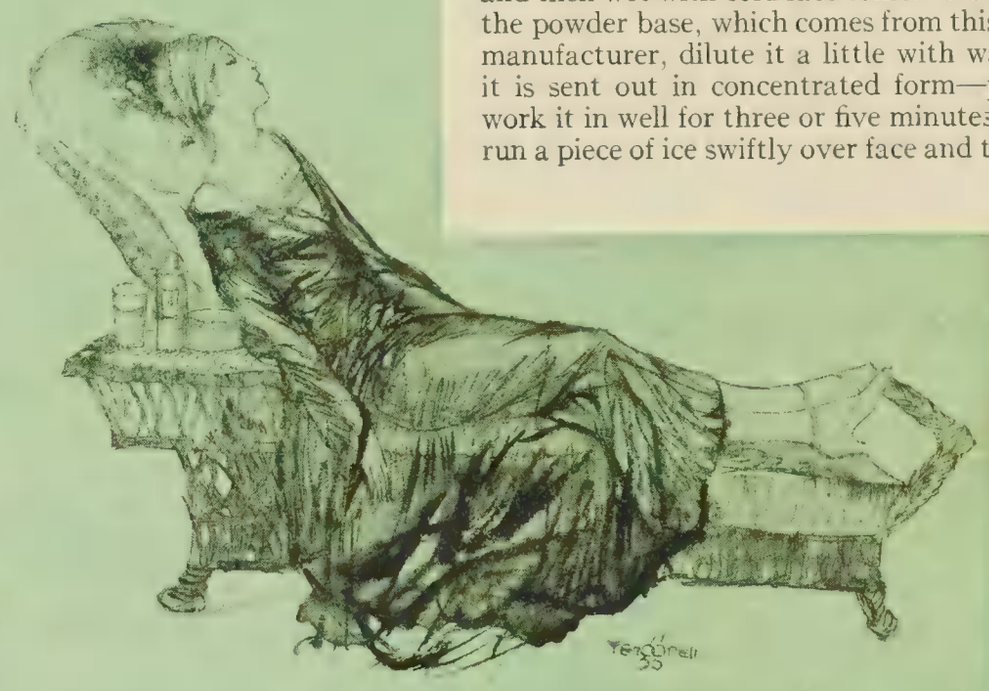
"THEY LOOKED AT US WITH THAT 'HO! SHE'S RATHER NICE!' EXPRESSION"

It's the amber light, turned on from all sides and finding you—not acceptable.

It's a good yardstick, that expression, "accepted by the light." If one could live evenly and yet not get into ruts doing it, one wouldn't have so many flaws in the marble, so many bad curves. It's the sudden rush and jam, the drive, that makes us pay. If only there were always some swift and glorious thing one could do in an emergency!

NOT long ago we went through ten whole days of unusual activity without doing the daily building up that we practise because we wanted to try out the effectiveness of all these emergency treatments the salons have been seeking for, and finding.

We passed ten days of burning the candle at both ends with all our respectable little might, and then every other day taking our ruined face into a salon for an emergency treatment. The salon people let us do it by ourselves as if we were home alone, just as you might be, out there in Iowa or Kansas or Mississippi! Skins like our own have to be careful not to get too dry, and always to watch their step when they stay up nights; otherwise they will get yellowish and sulky. Our usually firm and docile chin strikes when it gets no daily encouragement in the way of patting and ice or astringent, and becomes double-dealing and lackadaisical; our eyes, uncared for and abused, look as if they had lived quite long enough in this world of so much effort and such thin returns. So we were always looking our worst when we went to the emergency treatments.



This is what happened. Every single time as we went along the street on our way to a salon, nobody looked at us with that "Ho! she's rather nice!" expression (not that we look for that, oh no! but one notices it when it comes). But every single time as we came away, after the treatment, somebody looked at us and usually quite a lot of somebodies. Same clothes, same inside-me, discreetly walking along. The difference between adding nothing to the gaiety of nations and later, after the treatment, apparently contributing something was my face. It had been made acceptable to the light.

AN HOUR OR TWO LATER YOUR HAIR IS GLAD-TO-BE-ALIVE

THERE were four treatments which accomplished this. You can take your pick.

The background, of course, is always a tired you who has at most an hour before you must get on to the next place. You enter your room, drop off your frock and street shoes, slip on a bathrobe and a bathing-cap. Cleanse the face with cream, soft, melting, put on with an up-and-out stroke; then wipe off cleanly with a tissue or soft cloth. Now spread on a glorious and quite-new-to-this-world special astringent cream, all over the throat and face, up and out, and lie back, eyes closed, not one heavy or sharp thought anywhere about you, full of peace, no time but all eternity stretching around you. Lie there till the cream has dried. Now wet a face-cloth in cold water. Lay it over your face until the cream is all soft and will wash off easily. Dry the face. Pat a bit with a pad of absorbent cotton wrung in cold water, and then wet with cold face tonic. Now take the powder base, which comes from this same manufacturer, dilute it a little with water—it is sent out in concentrated form—pat or work it in well for three or five minutes; then run a piece of ice swiftly over face and throat.

AFTER PUTTING ON THE MASK, LIE DOWN, CHIN RAISED, CORNERS OF YOUR MOUTH UPTILTED

Then a dash of rouge right where that artist, Nature, put the color when you were seventeen; then a fluff of powder, a whisk of rabbit's foot for luck and smoothness. Look! You not only feel as if you had been lying for half an hour in an apple-orchard with the trees in full bloom or the apples hanging on the trees in October ripeness, but you look astonishingly new and pleased-to-be! Lines are relieved and sometimes, unless they are too deep and permanent, are wiped out, and your skin glowing softly, all the tenseness gone. That's one treatment.

This same beauty shop has a mild and nourishing bleach cream that also unfailingly works the miracle. Mix it with a little muscle oil, in the palm of your hand, smooth it over the face, work it in, only be careful

When Pictures puzzle

Learn to Choose, Frame and Hang them correctly

By MRS. CHARLES BRADLEY SANDERS

Department of Home Building and Furnishing Directed by MRS. CHARLES BRADLEY SANDERS

DO YOU KNOW

how to select pictures? If you were buying for your dining-room walls, would you select a Japanese print, a decorative flower group or an etching? If it had to be framed, how would you have it done? A dozen little ticklish questions may be answered by sending twenty-five cents for our bulletin, "How to Choose, Frame and Hang Your Pictures." Address the House Decoration Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

PICTURES on the walls of our houses are significant of the love and companionship that we find in our fellow creatures, in nature or in art. Nothing indicates our culture and education more definitely than does our taste in pictures.

It is far more restful to have a room without any pictures than to have it decked with an array of the wrong kind. Yet almost no article of house decoration is bought so thoughtlessly as a picture. Different subjects and types appeal to the different individuals who buy them. The matter of fitness to the room and its furnishings is too often a secondary consideration, if any at all.

SILK CORDS HANG THIS RESTFUL LANDSCAPE

ON LARGE WALL SPACES, CAREFULLY FRAMED PICTURES OF VARIOUS SIZES MAY BE EFFECTIVELY HUNG IN GROUPS

Very often in a family one member likes landscapes in oil, another engravings of animals, another water-colors of ships, and still another vivid colorful pictures in the modern manner. How can such an assortment be assembled in one room and still have that room considered well furnished? The answer is—it can not!

The most fortunate people are those who embark on their home-making careers unburdened with a motley assortment of pictures; or, if they are already well established, have the courage to throw away acknowledged mistakes or misfits of the past.

IT IS not advisable to buy oil-paintings or water-colors, if one knows nothing about them, without first asking the advice of an expert. If, however, there is no expert at hand, one is usually safe in selecting oils, water-colors, colored prints, etchings and engravings which are good reproductions from the masters.

At all times it is wise to avoid a display of "calendar art" or chromos in cheap, harsh colors. Photographs, too, are not exactly works of art, especially those taken in years gone by. These, if persons choose to display their family or friends, should be hung in rooms more personal than the general living-room; preferably in a bedroom or intimate sitting-room. Of course good paintings of the family or its ancestors are most decorative and appropriate when hung in a living-room or dining-room.

The first thing to do before hanging pictures is to make sure that they suit the room in which they are to hang. Second, assemble the various types and kinds and hang them in the same or in closely adjoining rooms. Never hang an oil-painting next to a family photograph or sampler, nor a silhouette next to a delicate water-color. Rather group these various types and hang them in separate rooms. If, however, they must be hung together in the same room, or even in closely adjoining rooms, they should hang on opposite walls.

For the living-rooms genuine water-colors, oil-paintings, etchings and colored prints are most suitable. Since we can not all own original and authentic works of art, reproductions of the works of famous masters in colors, in black and white or in sepia prints make interesting pictures. For the Early-American or Colonial living-room, colored prints of incidents of bygone days, samplers, water-colors of Yankee clipper ships, silhouettes and daguerreotypes are appropriate.

In a library or man's room may be hung etchings and engravings. The walls and woodwork, however, must not be too light in color, otherwise the drawings will give the walls a spotted appearance.

Decorative flowers, hunt subjects and architectural paintings are deemed most in keeping with the dignity of the dining-room, hall and living-room, provided the furnishings are not strictly of a period.

In family bedrooms may be hung photographs, old costume prints and pictures of the most intimate type.

For the guest-room one should select small water-colors or prints of a subject of general interest to all.

For the nursery be careful to select subjects and colors that are pleasing to the child who is to occupy it, for pictures make an impression that lasts long after the child has matured.

THE frame of a picture may be considered its "cloak" or "dress" and should be chosen in accordance with the type of the picture to be framed. The following suggestions should be remembered:

As a rule, oil-paintings are framed without either mat or glass in dull gilt frames, the width and type of which should balance the weight of the picture. A black-and-white picture is usually best in a black or gray frame, and a brown picture in either brown or dull gilt, or a combination of the two. Colored prints, water-colors, pastels and some oils may be framed with moldings which have a little color in them. It is well to have this color in the frame "pick up" the predominant color note in the picture. Generally speaking, gilt frames of simple design and correct width suit a great variety of pictures.

PLANT YOUR SPRING GARDEN NOW

By FRANCES DUNCAN

Author of "The Joyous Art of Gardening"

BEFORE YOUR GARDEN GOES TO SLEEP

If you want a lovely row of iris, gay daffodils or a clump of early blooming crocus next Spring, this is the time to plant them.

Read this interesting article and then follow one of the helpful garden plans you can get from THE DELINEATOR. On sturdy brown paper, large and easy to read, these plans will be an invaluable aid all year.

Tack a plan on the kitchen wall or in the tool closet and consult it regularly. It gives you detailed working instructions, a diagram of your garden plot, the seeds and material required, with their approximate cost, and the calendar that tells you what to do each month.

There are seven plans. A free sheet showing you all seven in reduced size will be sent you for just a two-cent stamp to cover postage. You can order the actual plan—which costs only twenty-five cents—from this sheet. Write to the Garden Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

"BESIDE THE LAKE, BENEATH THE TREES, FLUTTERING AND DANCING IN THE BREEZE"

THIS QUAINT LITTLE HOUSE, WITH ITS BORDER OF TULIPS, LOOKS LIKE A FAIRY-TALE COME TRUE

THE most delightful, most joyous of all gardens is the Spring garden. Not all the wealth of Summer blossoming gives us the vivid happiness of finding on some drab, gloomy, February day the first snowdrop, bravely venturing its delicate loveliness—or the first crocus!

Very fragile, very delicate are the earliest comers. In gardening, as often happens in life, it would seem that courage belongs to the apparently fragile, rather than to the robust. No peony or zinnia would risk its petals to the March winds as does that most ethereal of magnolias, the stellata, whose flowers are as exquisitely white as the Indian pipe.

The Spring garden blooms when its loveliness is a peculiar delight; when the suburbanite has grown weary of braving raw winds to catch the 7:58, when the longing for Spring is keenest. No one who has seen the ranks of gay daffodils, the sudden, vivid beauty of crimson peach-trees, the poetic loveliness of the little flowering cherry covered with blossoms as with a rosy mist, but wishes that he also had a Spring garden.

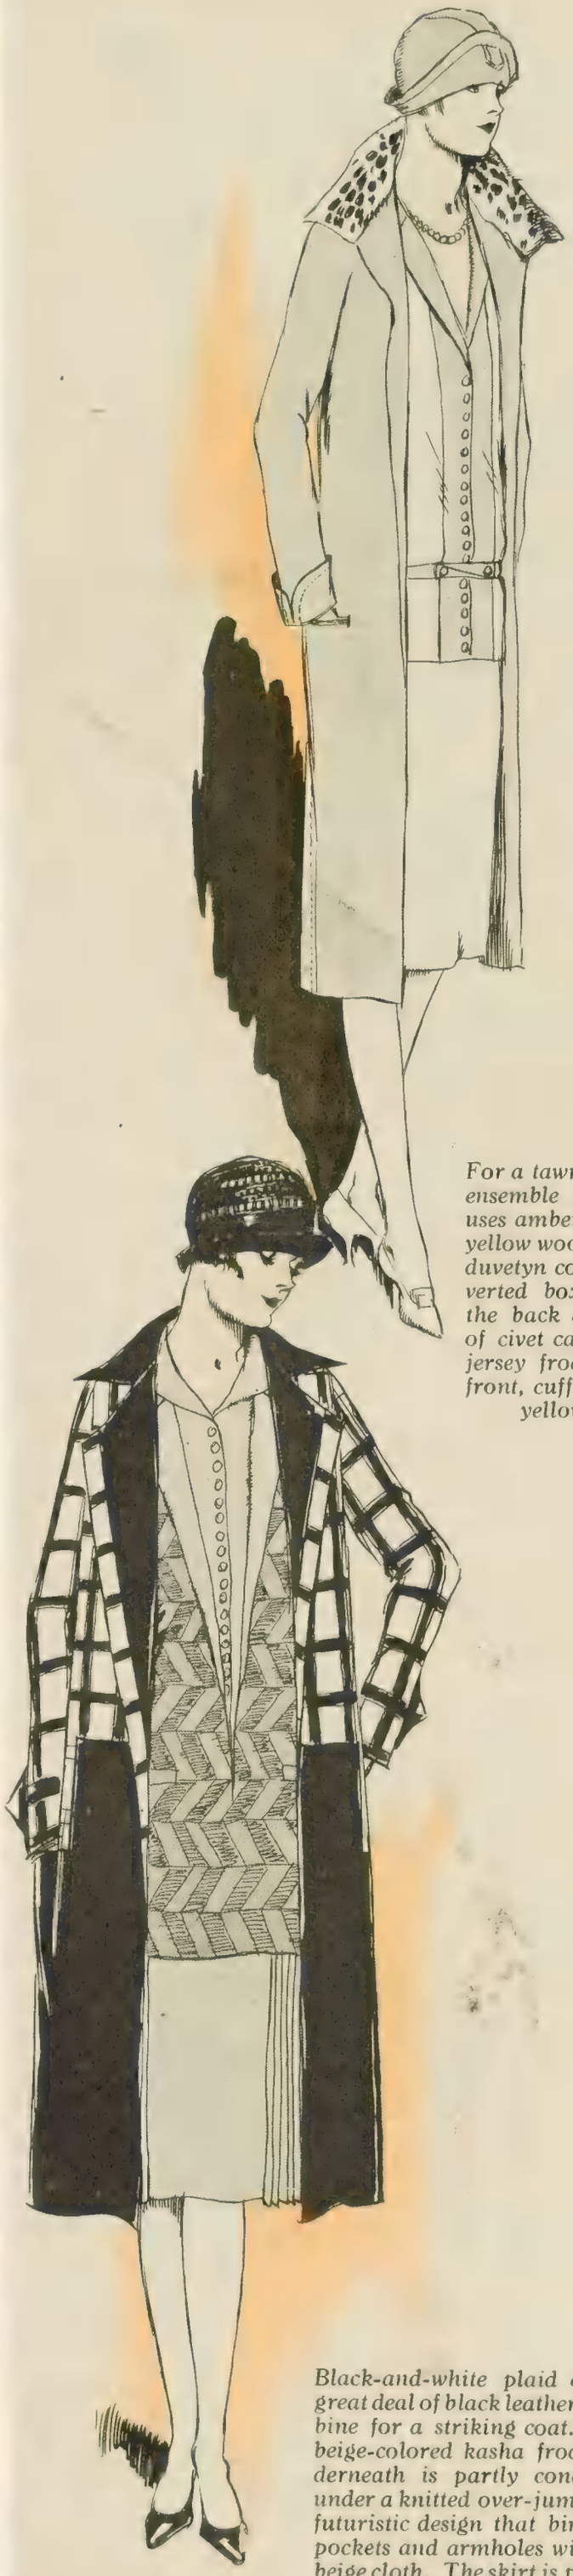
I believe every one would have a Spring garden if at the time of blooming he could betake himself to a florist and buy the narcissi, daffodils and crocuses and plant them then. But when a thing requires forethought, we don't get it so often. And the Spring garden has to be planted in the Fall. This is why there aren't more Spring gardens.

The best of all times to make a Spring garden, or for that matter any hardy garden, is now in September and early October. This especially is the time for putting in bulbs. Now the soil may be worked over, and the planting done leisurely. There is no need for disturbing the garden beds in the Spring; only the careful working in of manure or other fertilizer, and the sowing of annuals where vacancies occur—and your garden is in order!

To my mind, bulbs are the friendliest of all the garden denizens—like charity they "bear all things, hope all things, endure all things" —and of them it may almost be said "never faileth." You can plant daffodils and tulips deep, to have annuals grow over them; they will be a trifle longer perhaps in coming up, but will bloom serenely. You can plant the lovely little grape hyacinth of a soft, Delft blue (Muscari botryoides) and with it plant thickly forget-me-not; after the grape hyacinth has done blooming the mass of forget-me-not foliage covers it completely, but the hyacinth blooms the next year as radiantly as ever. Daffodils once planted will persist a hundred years or more; so will the poet's narcissi, although the grass has closed over them and all traces of the garden they once adorned are gone.

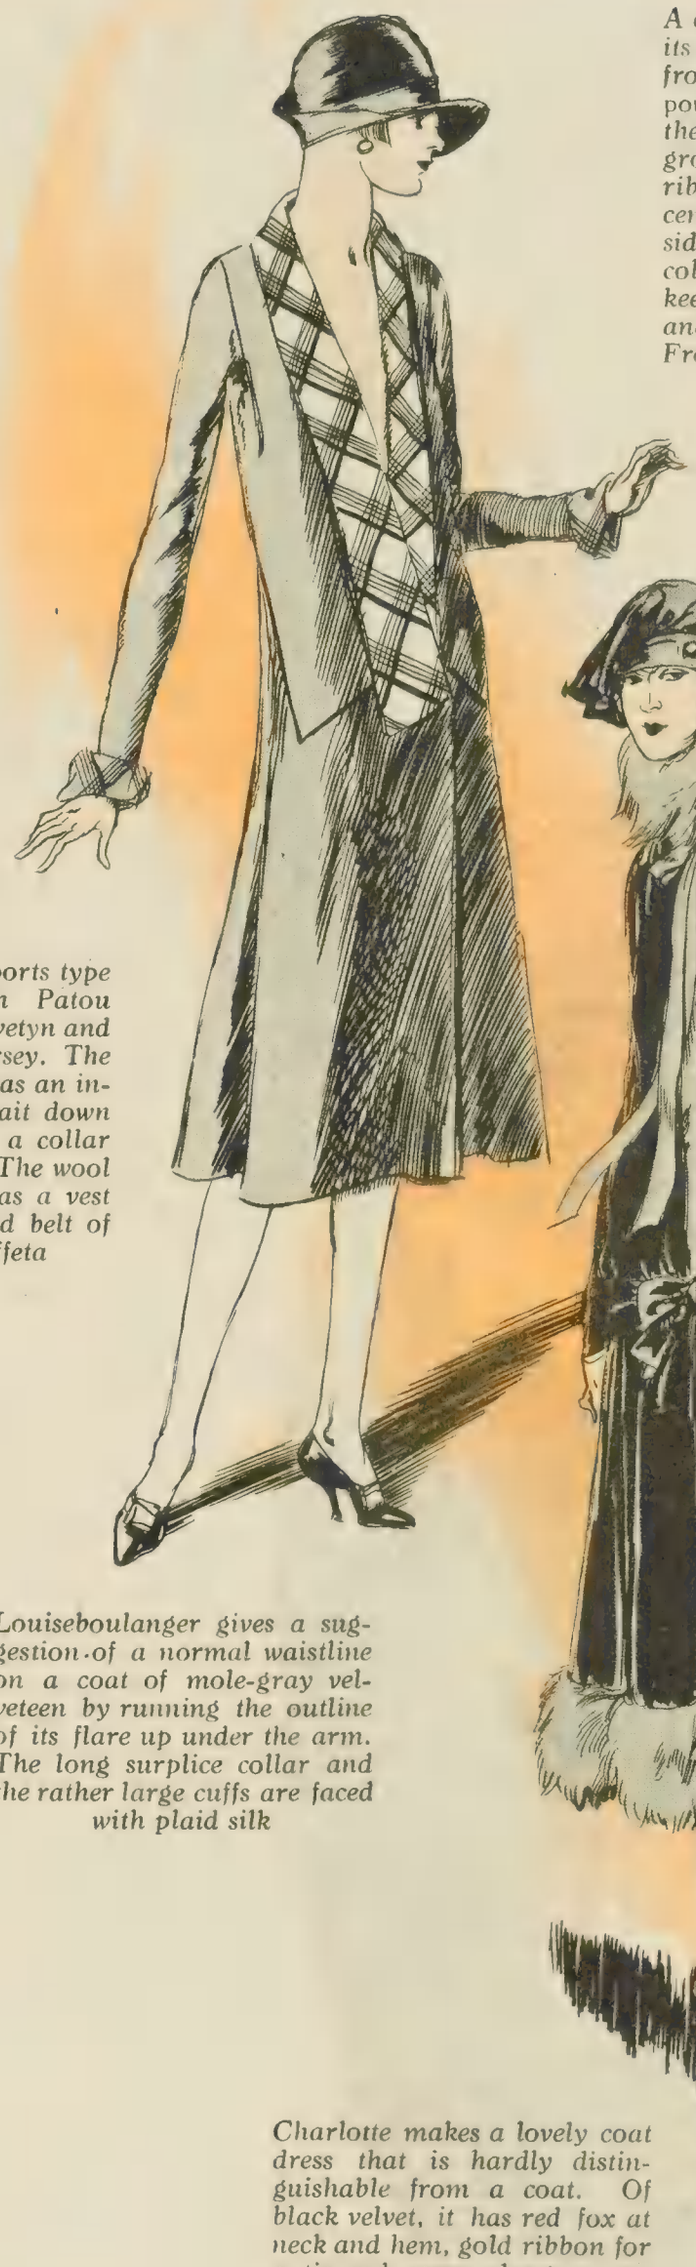
It is sad news for flower-lovers that this Autumn of 1925 is the "last call" for many of the so-called Dutch bulbs. The embargo will be on, and they may no longer be imported. The idea, presumably, is to stimulate the activities of American bulb-growers, but our climatic conditions are so different from those of Holland, our labor situation so different, that American growers have never found it profitable to produce these bulbs in large quantities, finding other forms of horticultural endeavor more remunerative. Our people are not given to skilled hand-work, nor does it seem likely that we shall produce that type of worker.

After this Autumn, bulbs of course may be had, but in smaller quantities and undoubtedly at a very serious increase in price—possibly five or ten times as much as we now pay.



AMONG the bulbs which will be excluded after this Autumn's importations are snowdrop, chionodoxa, scilla, ixia, the lovely little grape hyacinth (Muscari botryoides), the two fritilaries (Fritilaria imperialis—the "Crown Imperiall" which flourished in Queen Elizabeth's garden—and the Fritilaria meleagris); crocus may still come in, also lily-of-the-valley. Therefore gardeners everywhere are hastening to invite these adorable emigrants, for who would willingly miss the snowdrop, the charming sky-blue stars of the chionodoxa or the little scilla, blue as a fringed gentian, which was kind enough to bloom in March?

Another loss will be even more sorely felt when the exclusion sentence is on against the whole race of narcissi. This means not only poet's narcissus and others of the Poetaz group, but all daffodils and jonquils, the paper white narcissus—that most kindly and long suffering of bulbs, blooming in short enough space to content even the impatience of childhood, the bulb which any one can grow and under almost any condition, barring complete thirst. This too is to be brought in no more.



It is a cheering thought, however, that bulbs are not annuals and that if brought into our gardens now, embargoes may come and embargoes may go, the bulbs will continue to blossom year after year and to increase after their beneficent fashion. And crocuses we may still plant freely; tulips and hyacinths may yet come in, though the idea seems to be, ultimately, to exclude all.

SOULIÉ SKETCHES SENT FROM THE BUTTERICK PARIS SHOP SHOW NEW ENSEMBLES WITH PLAITS AND FLARES

For a tawny sports type ensemble Jean Patou uses amber duvetyn and yellow wool jersey. The duvetyn coat has an inverted box plait down the back and a collar of civet cat. The wool jersey frock has a vest front, cuffs and belt of yellow taffeta

Louiseboulanger gives a suggestion of a normal waistline on a coat of mole-gray velveteen by running the outline of its flare up under the arm. The long surplice collar and the rather large cuffs are faced with plaid silk

Charlotte makes a lovely coat dress that is hardly distinguishable from a coat. Of black velvet, it has red fox at neck and hem, gold ribbon for a tie and opens along a centered strip of gold lamé. The skirt is both gathered and flared—the gathers coming at each side

A black satin coat shines with kolinsky at its neck and hem. The coat fits closely at the hips, but just below there are gathers to give a flaring line which is intensified by the circular cut of the fur. Stitched bands trim the sleeves. From Rolande

A cape ensemble makes its cape and jumper frock of brown grain de poudre and borders all the edges with brown grosgrain ribbon. A ribbon connecting the center back and each side front of the cape collar acts as a lever to keep it standing up and out from the neck. From Suzanne Talbot

Black-and-white plaid and a great deal of black leather combine for a striking coat. The beige-colored kasha frock underneath is partly concealed under a knitted over-jumper of futuristic design that binds its pockets and armholes with the beige cloth. The skirt is plaited at each side. From James

BRIDES OF OCTOBER IN FLARED OR SOFTLY DRAPED FROCKS, LACE AND PEARLS

6349—This very young bride wears a two-piece circular skirt attached in an interesting outline. Make this slip-over frock of crêpe satin, satin Canton, etc.

18 years requires 3½ yards 35-inch satin. Lower edge 2¾ yards.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

6224—10285—The smart circular flounce of this slip-over frock lengthens its one-piece upper part. The embroidery is attractive. Work in pearls. Use satin Canton, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, etc. Lower edge 2⅝ yards.

36 bust requires 3 yards 36 or 39 inch crêpe satin (circular flare cut crosswise).

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6175—Lace for the frill and sectional flounce, attached in a curved outline, turns a simple one-piece slip-over dress into an elegant frock. It fits closely at the hipline. Use flat crêpe, crêpe de Chine, etc. Lower edge 44½ inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 35-inch crêpe satin and 2 yards 20-inch lace flouncing.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

Dress 6362 Dress 6360

6146—A slip-over one-piece wedding-gown has inserted godets of lace. The lace sleeves are on a separate one-piece slip. Use crêpe Roma, Georgette, etc., with satin slip. Lower edge of slip 44 inches.

36 bust requires 2¾ yards 39-inch crêpe satin and 2⅝ yards 35-inch lace.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6227—10340—Flowers and long stems almost cover this slip-over frock. Work in beads. The full straight skirt is attached at a low waistline. There is a narrow drop skirt and long camisole.

36 bust requires 3¾ yards 39-inch Georgette. Lower edge of dress 3 yards.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6362—Soft draperies attached to this slip-over one-piece frock make it particularly attractive. It fits closely at the hipline and has long sleeves attached to a separate one-piece slip. Use plain chiffon, chiffon voile, etc., with satin slip.

36 bust requires 4½ yards 40-inch Georgette. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6360—After the wedding this draped one-piece gown may become an evening dress by leaving off the separate one-piece slip with its day neckline and long sleeves. The armhole may be cut down. Lower edge of dress, plaits out, 2½ yards.

36 bust requires 2½ yards 35-inch satin and 1⅝ yard 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is for ladies 36 to 3 bust.

6360—This lovely draped dress, one-piece type, has an evening or a day neck, a normal or a cut-down armhole. The separate one-piece slip may have sleeves. Use black crêpe satin, satin Canton or satin faille, etc. The flower is hand made. Lower edge of dress, plaits out, 2⅛ yards.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 39-inch satin and ¾ yard 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is attractive for ladies 36 to 48 bust.

6362—The attached draperies are charmingly soft. This slip-over one-piece frock fits closely at the hipline and may have an evening or a day neck. The separate one-piece slip may be made with sleeves. Use plain chiffon, chiffon voile, etc., with satin slip. Lower edge of dress 44 inches.

36 bust requires 4¼ yards 40-inch Georgette.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6354—Inserted godets put motion into a slip-over one-piece dress which fits closely at the hipline. Use bordered wide Canton crêpe, etc., with at least a twenty-inch plain border at the bottom and with plain to match.

36 bust requires 1¼ yard 54-inch bordered crêpe satin and 1¼ yard 54-inch plain. Lower edge 2⅞ yards.

The dress is good style for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6356—The straight lower edge of this one-piece slip-over frock makes it suitable for bordered wide silks such as crêpe satin, Canton crêpe, etc. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 2 yards 54-inch bordered crêpe satin.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6364—The new bordered wide velvet brocades on Georgette, silk voile or crêpe voile, bordered wide crêpe satins, etc., are best displayed by a simple slip-over one-piece frock. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge 44 inches

36 bust requires 1½ yard 54-inch bordered Georgette.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

Dress 6360 Dress 6362 Dress 6354

6348—6359—Backed by a circular flare this slip-over frock presents a one-piece front to the world. Use worsteds, cashmere, wool crêpe, etc. The hat has a six-gored crown. Lower edge 1¾ yard. 36 bust requires 2⅛ yards 54-inch soft twill for dress.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 48 bust; the hat is for ladies and misses.

TO FLARE, TO PLAIT, OR TO FLY LOOSE PANELS IS PARIS' ADVICE TO FROCKS

6344—Loose panels, Georgette lined, are all of a flutter at the least movement. Make this one-piece dress of crêpe satin, satin Canton, satin faille, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or heavy crêpe de Chine with tie ends, cuffs, etc., of contrasting. The frock slips on over the head and has a straight lower edge. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 39-inch flat crêpe.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6342—The color that hides under the plaits comes out boldly for the vestee, collar and cuffs. This tailored one-piece slip-over frock has an inserted section at each side front and back. Use worsteds, cashmere, light-weight kasha, camel's-hair twills, wool crêpe or serge with contrasting, etc. The lower edge is straight. Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 2⅛ yards 54-inch twill and ½ yard 54-inch contrasting.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

Dress 6355

Dress 6353

Dress 6351

6355—This frock has an unusual one-piece back, for it is flanked by godet fulness. A circular flare ripples across the front. Crêpe satin or satin Canton with the reverse side and with a vestee of contrasting crêpe de Chine is smart for this slip-over frock. Or use soft satin, crêpe satin or satin Canton with contrasting.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 39-inch crêpe satin with reverse side for trimming (circular flare cut crosswise to avoid piecing). Lower edge 2¼ yards.

The dress is becoming to ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6353—Crêpe satin, satin Canton or soft satin is used to make this dress in redingote effect. Matching or contrasting silk crêpe or the same material in a lighter tone makes the undersection and cuffs. A circular flare is attached across the sides in a pointed outline. Lower edge, plait drawn out, 2⅜ yards.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 39-inch silk crêpe, with ⅝ yard 39-inch contrasting.

The dress is good style for ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6351—A little piece of good lace is the touch that makes a frock elegant. The one-piece upper part of this slip-over dress is lengthened by a lower part that has a circular flare across the front. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton, or satin faille with lace edging jabot; or use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, etc.

36 bust requires 3 yards 40-inch crêpe satin. Lower edge 1⅝ yard.

The dress is attractive for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6363—10189—A gathered flounce that is straight prefers to take a diagonal direction. The embroidery is interesting. Work in contrast. This one-piece dress fits closely at the hipline and slips on over the head. Use crêpe satin, satin Canton, satin faille, flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or heavy crêpe de Chine with Georgette, etc. Lower edge 44 inches.

The Tomato Soup people expect you to serve!

There are some few products—a very few—which are so well made that the public, consciously or unconsciously, takes it for granted they will always be used in homes where "only the best" is accepted.

People are so familiar with Campbell's Tomato Soup, they like it so much, they serve it so regularly themselves that whenever they lift a spoonful of tomato soup to their lips they expect it to be Campbell's. Anything less is a disappointment.

21 kinds 12 cents a can

We're living high, we're feeling spry,
To Campbell's we are grateful.
It makes us step with vim and pep,
There's joy in every plateful!

Third Installment of the LIFE and LETTERS of IVORY SOAP

EXCERPTS from the true story of IVORY'S adventures with the U. S. ARMY and NAVY its encounters with WILD ANIMALS and its contribution to ROMANCE

"ON a certain dog-watch one night far out at sea we were gathered around the good old java pot swapping yarns. There were the bosun, and the bosun's mate, and a seaman bold, and me. The seaman bold, unfolding to stretch his legs, delivered himself of the following chant:

'A boy stood on the burning deck,
The flames about did roar;
He took a cake of Ivory Soap
And washed himself—ashore.'"

The original author of the chant is unknown, but the "me" of the story is Byron T. Mills, of San Francisco, who was in the Navy during the war and for a period after the Armistice. He tells the following story, also:

"My ship was sent to Hamburg on a special commission. When we found that there wasn't a decent cake of soap in the whole port, we almost wished we had shifted our coal for a cargo of Ivory. We took our ship's supply into the town, and they almost mobbed us. Cakes that had cost us seven cents brought a dollar. I hired a big luxurious limousine for a whole afternoon for one cake of Ivory. I met a Hungarian countess who wanted me to marry her and take over her castle in Budapest—I couldn't see it, but I gave her a cake of Ivory and she seemed just as happy as if I'd accepted her proposal. If I ever lease myself out for another war, I'll pay high for the Ivory Soap concession."

IVORY buys laces and a MEXICAN welcome

"IN February, 1924," writes a member of the U. S. Naval Reserve Force, "the U. S. Destroyer 'Sumner,' off the west coast of Mexico, got orders by radio to put into Salina Cruz—that tiny agglomeration of huts and tents on a slope of sand which was then in the center of the revolutionary area. The U. S. landing party arrived on the heels of the Revolutionary Army which had raided the townsfolk six times. Nothing usable was left except, as we soon discovered, some exquisite native laces which had been successfully hidden from the marauders.

"The customary haggling began forthwith. But money was worthless to the natives—they couldn't buy anything with it. They were ragged, and they were dirty—great Scott, how dirty they were!

"Then occurred one of the anomalies of history—they called for Ivory Soap! For Ivory they would sell anything. Some of the finest laces ever brought into the United States were bought for a few cakes of Ivory. And some of the officers and men found special welcome in the homes of local dignitaries by the tactful presentation, to the daughters of the house, of a cake of Ivory Soap."

Our correspondent adds: "Ivory Soap has been with the Navy so long that it is regarded as a standard canteen article. The Naval man knows that Ivory is recommended by his doctors and surgeons because he finds it in almost exclusive use in the 'sick-bay.' Of several popular soaps, Ivory is in demand by perhaps more than three-fourths of the crew."

The ex-Army adds its IVORY story of the war

THE Army refuses to take second place in the war-story of Ivory. A former lieutenant sends in this lively item:

"There were fifteen inches of mud from a three days' drizzle in that slithering lizard's paradise known technically as a rifle-pit. A floating object touched my leg. I got hold of it, washed it off, and found myself gazing at a half-used cake of Ivory Soap. Visions of a clean-up party and a shave at the old iron tub back of the hill!

"Curses! It slipped. But presently I saw it poking a white corner up through the black soup. Before it could escape again, I carried it in both hands back to the tub, stripped, took a shower in the rain, shaved with Ivory lather, washed my teeth with Ivory foam, and then turned over the precious cake to Happy Zeke, who repeated my performance. And as he stood there in his shivering nakedness, Ivory-lathered from head to toe, he grinned, 'Well, old duck, 99 44/100 % pure again!'

"I carried that same cake of Ivory to Belgium with me after the Big Show blew up and finally gave what was left of it to a little Belgian 'femme de chocolat,' who said, 'Ah, savon Américain pour souvenir?'"

Apparently Ivory is as good as money almost anywhere in the world—to buy laces and limousine rides and ladies' smiles, and eggs—

A lieutenant of the Rainbow Division and his top sergeant traded a cake of Ivory to a French peasant woman for two dozen fresh "oofs."

"Look," said the Lieutenant, "this is lucky savon. As long as it floats you can be sure les Américains will win. If it ever sinks—like this, see?—you'd better pack up and leave la belle France, toot-sweet!"

They left her watching Ivory confidently afloat. Ivory still floats and the old woman is still safe in la belle France!

You CAN'T fool a chipmunk, either!

APPARENTLY Ivory, when available, plays an important part even in the life of discriminating chipmunks. In fact, it seems to be the prime winter delicacy of the chipmunk race, as witness two letters:

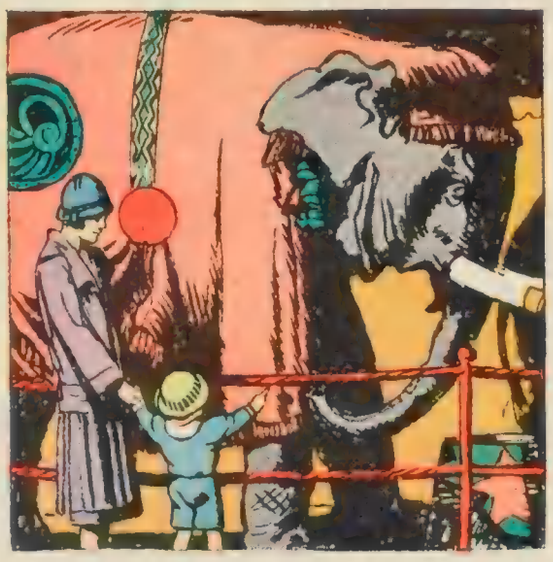
Our little friend Francis Throw, of Kimball, Neb., went camping with his parents in the mountains last summer. On the washstand behind the cabin were two cakes of soap, one pink, and one Ivory.

"One afternoon," writes Francis, "the Ivory Soap disappeared. Where had it gone? The next morning we missed another Ivory cake. Then we found where it had gone. The chipmunks had taken it! I was quite worried about them until I remembered Ivory was 99 44/100 % Pure."

"Safety first!" cry Nebraska chipmunks. And the chipmunks in New York State echo, "Safety first!"—

"Last year," writes Mrs. D——, "when we closed our camp on Goodyear Lake for the winter, we left two cakes of Ivory and two cakes of cheap perfumed soap in the bathroom. During the winter chipmunks got in and ate the Ivory, but would not touch the other. So I guess your advertisements must be true—99 44/100 % Pure."

Elephants and a poem with a MORAL



SPEAKING of wild animals, here is another story, from a railroad official:

His four-year-old grandson was watching a circus parade with his mother. Along came the elephants. Little Dicky pointed to the curved weapons carried east and west of the leading pachyderm's trunk, and asked what they were.

"Those," replied his mother, "are his tusks—they are ivory."

"Oh!" exclaimed small Dick excitedly, "then he has his soap with him, hasn't he?"

Now for our poem! It came to the Ivory biographer's desk not long ago, without a name, written on an old memorandum. Notice the quaint Quaker sound of it—can it be that some good Quaker lad, disillusioned as to the superficial values of pure romance, finally identified cleanliness as the one all-symbolic value of life, and then penned this pæan of exultation? We leave the answer to you:

Do not wed for money, Friend,
For money hath a sting,
Do not wed a pretty face;
'Tis but a foolish thing.
Do not wed for place or fame;
'Twill disappoint thy hope.
But when thee marry, choose the girl
Who uses Ivory Soap.

HIS MOTHER'S last gift

THE following story comes from the mountain country of Virginia, and it is about an ancient storekeeper.

Many years ago, when Ernest Adams, a tried-and-true Ivory Soap salesman, was making trips through his territory in a piano-box buggy, he sold this old storekeeper an order. As he was about to leave, his customer said to him:

"Some time, Mr. Adams, after I've got better acquainted with you, I want to tell you a story."

Years passed. At every visit Mr. Adams asked for that story, but the old fellow refused, until one fine day when the rhododendrons were in bloom and memories lingered in spring fragrance.

"Come with me," said the storekeeper mysteriously, leading the way to a dimly lighted room behind the store. From a cobwebbed corner he drew forth a battered leather trunk whose musty contents finally yielded an oblong object wrapped in an old piece of white silk.

"I treasure this more than anything I own or have owned," said he. "It was the last thing my mother gave me more than forty years ago when I left home to seek my fortune."

And with that he handed Mr. Adams what is probably the oldest cake of Ivory Soap in existence.

This Ivory is, as you see, a true cosmopolite, and has a share in the lives of all sorts of people the world over.

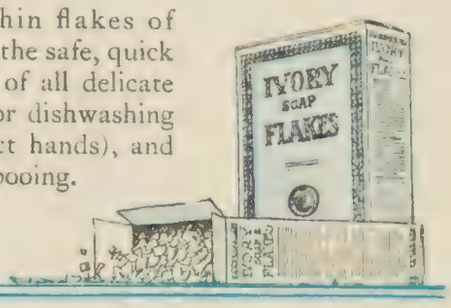
Guest IVORY

The dainty new cake of Ivory, made especially for the face and hands, just fits feminine fingers and the toilet soap holder. It costs 5 cents.

Bath IVORY

For the bath, most people prefer the medium-size cake of Ivory. "It floats," of course, so you never have to hunt soap on the tub-bottom.



Laundry IVORY

This economical cake is for general laundry and household use—it costs very little more than harsh soaps and protects both hands and clothes.

Tissue-thin flakes of Ivory for the safe, quick cleansing of all delicate fabrics, for dishwashing (to protect hands), and for shampooing.

My five favorite apple desserts

THIS Fall I have been making some old and new desserts with apples, and they are so delicious I want to share them with everyone.

In searching for different ways to use apples I read and studied over 160 recipes. I tested those which interested me most—15 in all. From these 15 I selected as my favorites the 5 on this page. When you make them, if you follow the recipes as I have given them to you, using Crisco for shortening I am sure you will find them as delicious as I have.

I use Crisco for every kind of cooking that requires a fat. It makes my pastry crisp, tender and flaky, my cakes light and dainty, with a fine even texture; and for deep or pan frying I have found it unequaled for it fries everything to a crisp, golden brown—and without smoke. There is no waste either, for Crisco, when properly used, doesn't soak into the food or carry the taste of one food to another. After one fry, just strain Crisco back into the can and it is ready for the next. It is a clean sweet shortening which stays fresh for months and is the only shortening you need ever use.

Apple Delights

2 cups pastry flour
1½ teaspoons baking powder
½ teaspoon salt
¼ cup Crisco
1 cup milk
1 egg
6 soft ripe apples

Sift flour, salt, baking powder together. Cut Crisco in with two knives. Stir in milk. Last add beaten egg. Drop tablespoons of batter into well-Criscoed muffin tins. Peel and cut apples in half, taking out cores, which will leave a little round hole. Put on top of batter, pressing it down a little. Fill the hole with sugar. Add cinnamon if you like. Bake in a hot oven (400° F.) for 25 minutes, or until apples are tender. Serve hot with sweetened whip cream dusted with cinnamon. This makes 12 delights.

Brown Betty

2 cups soft bread crumbs
4 cups tart apples, chopped or cut small
1½ cups sugar
¼ teaspoon salt
cinnamon
2 tablespoons Crisco

Put a layer of apples in a well-Criscoed pudding dish, sprinkle a little of the sugar and salt over them. Dust with cinnamon. Then put a layer of bread crumbs and dot with bits of the Crisco, and continue adding alternate layers of apples, spices, bread crumbs, etc., until all are used up, having the top layer of bread crumbs. Dot with the Crisco over the top. Cover and bake in moderate oven (350° F.) about one hour. Take cover off last fifteen minutes to brown it. Serve with hard sauce. This will serve six people.

Apple Cobbler

1¼ cups sifted pastry flour
¼ cup sugar
¼ cup milk
1 egg
2 tablespoons Crisco (melted)
1 teaspoon baking powder
½ teaspoon salt

Beat egg until light. Add sugar gradually beating until creamy. Sift flour, baking powder and salt and add to mixture alternately with milk. Beat until batter is smooth, then add Crisco.

4 medium sized tart apples ½ cup sugar cinnamon

Peel, core and slice apples. Put a layer in bottom of well-Criscoed pudding dish. Sprinkle a little sugar and cinnamon over them. Continue with layers of apples, sugar and cinnamon until apples are all used. Pour batter over them. Bake in hot oven (375° F.) about ½ hour. Serve with sweetened whipped cream and dust with cinnamon. Or use hard or hot sauce.

ALL MEASUREMENTS LEVEL. Recipes tested and approved by Good Housekeeping Institute.

Grandmother's Apple Crow's Nest

1 cup pastry flour
2 teaspoons baking powder
¼ teaspoon salt
4 medium sized tart apples
¼ cup sugar
¼ cup milk
3 tablespoons Crisco

Slice apples into Criscoed pie plate and dot with bits of Crisco. Sprinkle with sugar and cinnamon. Sift dry ingredients together twice. Cut in Crisco with a knife. Add milk to make a soft dough. Spread over apples. Bake in hot oven (400° F.) 25 minutes (or until the apples are tender). Turn upside down on plate with apples up. Mix together one-half cup sugar and one teaspoon cinnamon. Stir into apples with fork. Serve hot with whipped cream. Dust over top a little cinnamon and a few finely chopped nuts.

Apple Roly Poly

2½ cups pastry flour
4 teaspoons baking powder
1 teaspoon salt
¼ cup sugar
2 tablespoons Crisco
1 egg, well beaten
½ to ¾ cup sweet milk
4 tart apples

Mix and sift flour, baking powder, salt and sugar. Cut in the Crisco with a knife. Add the beaten egg and milk enough to make a rather soft dough. Roll to a thickness of about ½ inch. Spread surface with Crisco, then cover with coarsely chopped apples. Roll up, handling it lightly. Place in center of a well-Criscoed baking pan. Brush over top and sides of the roll with melted Crisco. Put in hot oven (450° F.) and when it begins to brown, reduce heat to moderate (350° F.) and finish baking, about 45 minutes. Serve with hard sauce.

4 new tricks for better pies

1. To keep the juices in.

Take a strip of cloth about 3 inches wide, wet it in cold water and put around the edge of plate as in picture. Put pieces of macaroni into 2 or 3 of the slits. The juices will bubble up into these and return to the pie as it cools. (Diagram at left)

2. To prevent soaking the bottom crust.

Brush it over with melted Crisco, dust a little flour over that, then add the filling prepared according to the recipe you are using.

3. To measure the Crisco.

To measure, for example, ¾ of a cup of Crisco I take a measuring cup, put in ¼ cup of cold water, then add enough Crisco to bring the water to the top of the cup, pour it off and I have an exact ¾ cup of Crisco.

4. To make a nice brown.

Before you put your pie in the oven moisten the top with milk. If you prefer a rich brown glaze moisten with an egg yolk mixed with a teaspoon of cold water.

THE FASHIONABLE WOOL SWEATER

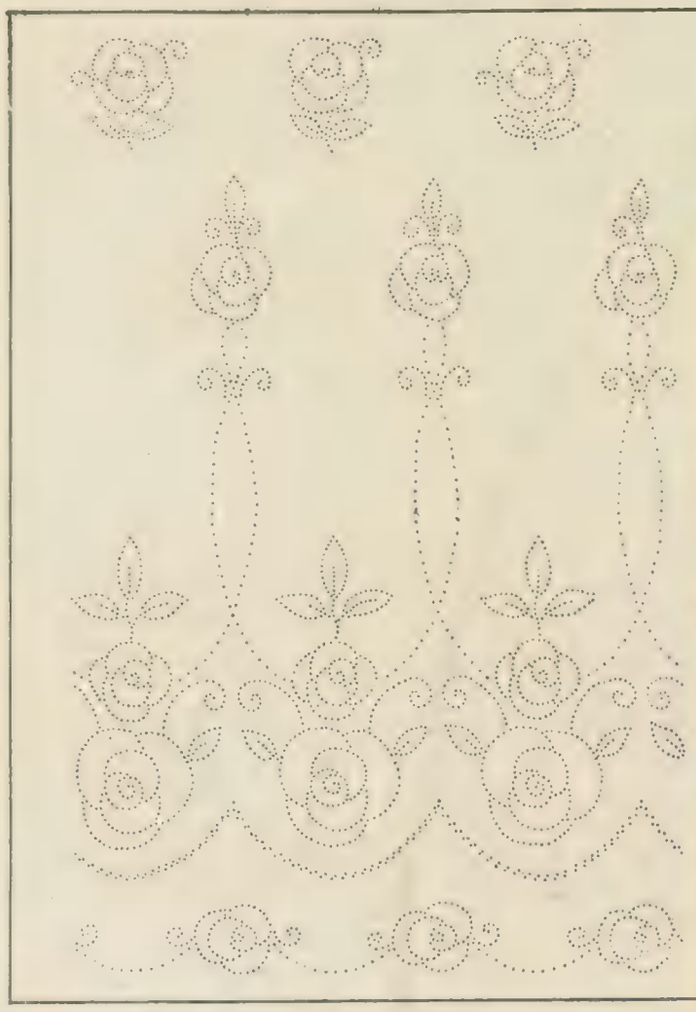
SWEATERS are smart again. October will see the college campus, the close-to-town golf green, the country road and city park spotted with them in the bright frost-bitten colors of Autumn. The sweaters illustrated here—the blouse sweater, the slip-on, the turtle-neck sweater and the knitted coat—are the types most fashionable.

Directions for knitting can be obtained by sending ten cents to the Embroidery Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

1. The smart blouse sweater is one of the first favorites. This one was made of peacock-blue Shetland floss worked in stocking-stitch with the chic collar, buttoned tab and band of plain knitting. The collar, being convertible, may lie open or close up snugly.

2. Dead-leaf brown is an appropriate October color for a warm slip-on sweater whose neckline retires beneath the collar of the underneath blouse. Two strands of Iceland wool knit together in stocking-stitch are the means to this charming end.

3. If the sweater is crimson, who cares whether or not the sky is gray, and if it has a turtle neck to snuggle into, what of chill winds? This is the same sweater described above, but, with the addition of the popular turtle neck, it is changed into one decidedly more on the sports type.



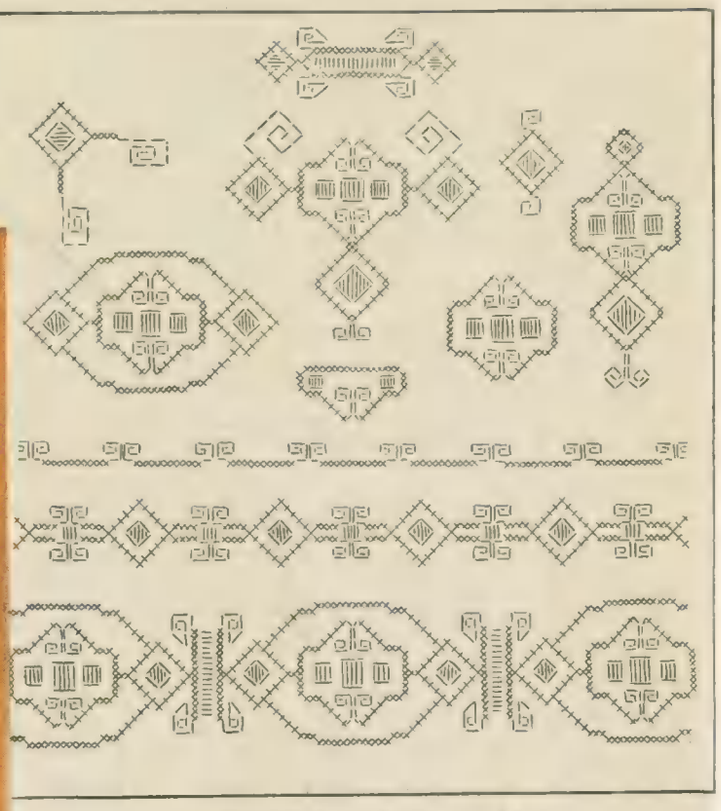
4. Camel's-hair wool in stocking-stitch with crosswise stripes of Shetland floss in orange, brown and green makes this very smart knitted coat and scarf which the sportswoman finds as practical as it is charming. The sleeve is made of the camel's-hair without stripes, and the bands, cuffs, pockets and wide scarf ends are of green.

5. The little girl's outdoor sweater is of the knitted-coat variety. Pussy heads (embroidery design 10934) embroidered on the patch-pockets endear it to the hearts of small wearers. Use brown Shetland floss in stocking-stitch with plain knitting for the collar and bands. The cats' heads are of camel's-hair wool with orange bows.

6. Blue and white awning stripes make an adorable little sweater with the fashionable Chanel neck. The dark stripes are worked with a double strand of blue Iceland wool and the light stripes are made with one strand of white and one of blue knit together. Knit in stocking-stitch, with plain knitting for collar and bands and ribbed cuffs of blue.

7. Autumn or Winter, cold has no terror for this turtle-neck sweater made warm by heavy wool and interesting by bands of cameo knitting. Knit it with an eight-fold Germantown yarn. The one illustrated was made in navy blue and brightened by tan and henna in the bands.

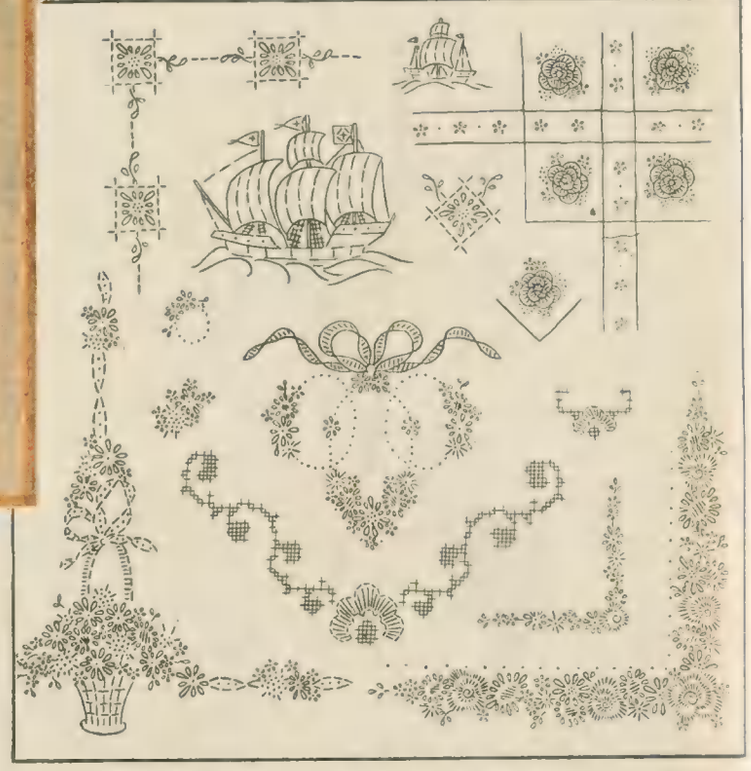
OCTOBER EMBROIDERY HAS PICKED ITS DESIGNS FROM SUMMER GARDENS



Embroidery design 10378

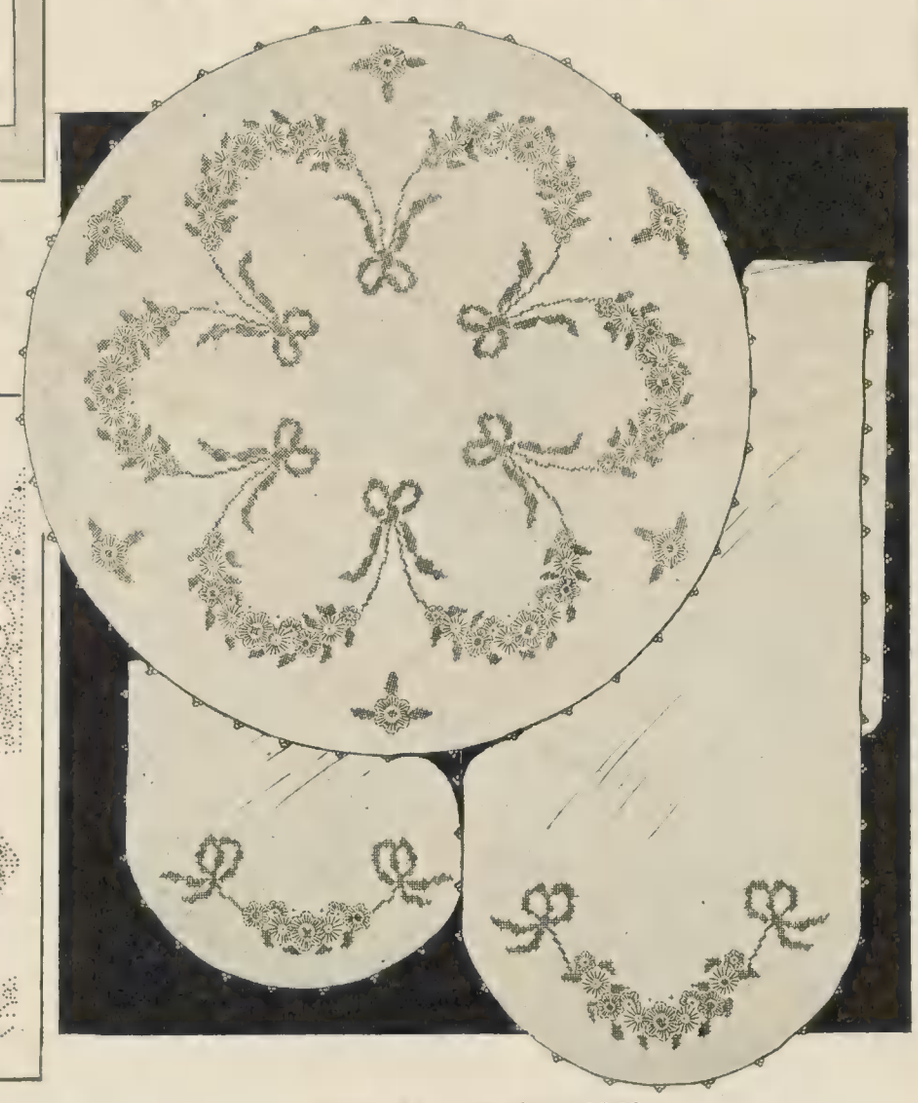
10378—Embroidered flowers bloom all the year 'round. Worked in beads or French knots this is a lovely design for dresses, blouses, scarfs, coats, etc. The design can be adapted to 2⅜ yards each of banding 28 inches and 2¼ inches wide.

10380—There is little work on a design that centers a bouquet of flowers and draws a border around them—yet it seems to cover the whole bedspread. Work in candle-wicking or French knots. This design can be adapted to one oval motif and banding for a single, double or three-quarter bed.



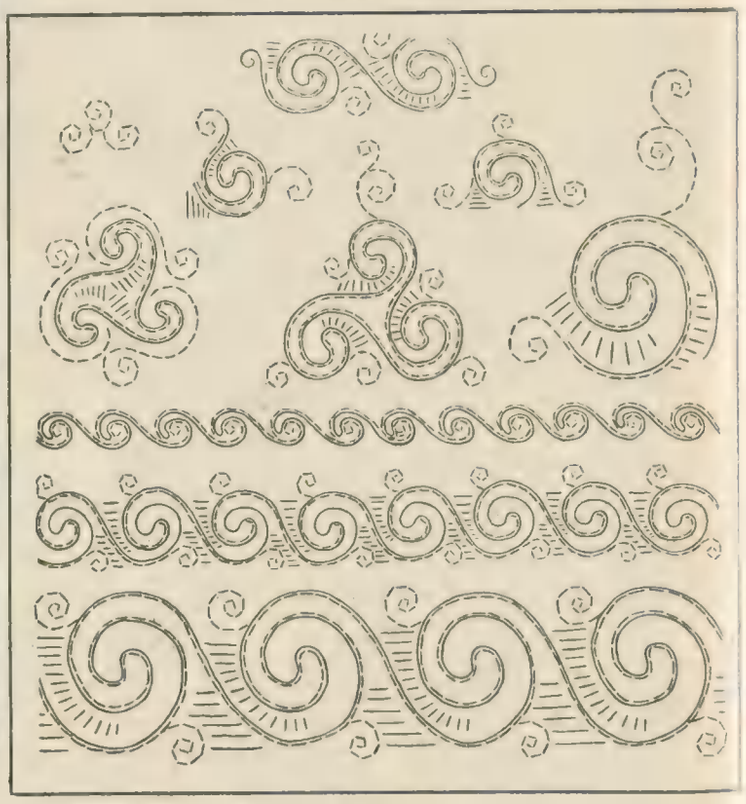
Embroidery design 10379

10379—This design for dresses, blouses, hats, scarfs, etc., is worked in a combination of one-stitch and cross-stitch and can be adapted to 3½ yards each of banding 3¾ inches and 1½ inch wide, 3⅜ yards ⅝-inch banding and 26 assorted motifs.



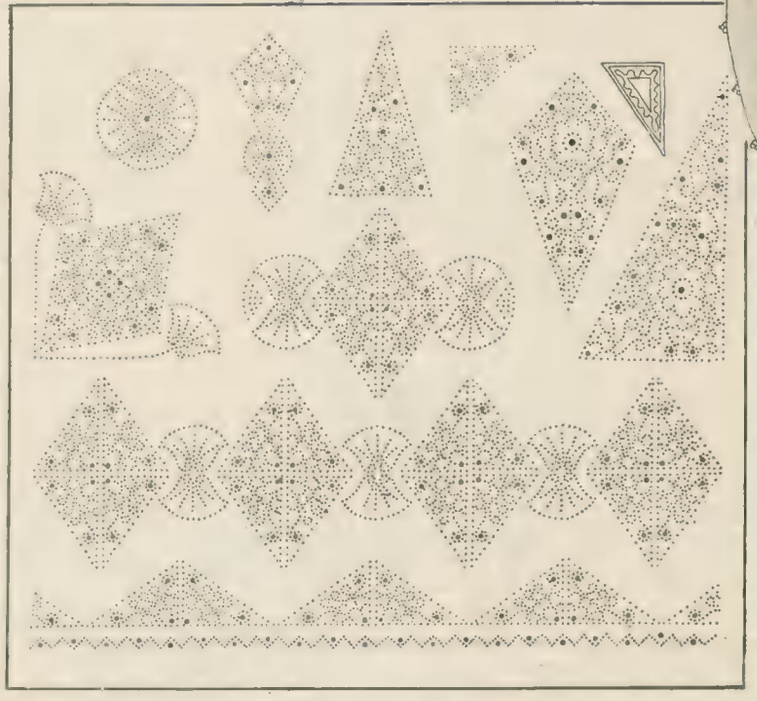
Embroidery design 10384

10384—This vanity set and scarf are worked in a combination of outline stitch, one-stitch, lazy-daisy and French-knot embroidery. The design can be adapted to two doilies for the sides of a dresser, three motifs for the center of dresser and ends of scarfs.



Embroidery design 10385

10385—These corners and motifs make charming tea-cloths and napkins, etc. Work in a combination of outlining, one-stitch, lazy-daisy, French knots and cross-stitch. The design can be adapted to 16 corners in four assorted designs and sizes and 32 assorted motifs.



Embroidery design 10382

10382—Buff-colored linen with yellow bow-knots and garlands of flowers in brown, orange and yellow makes a warm centerpiece and scarf for an October dining-room. Work in a combination of cross-stitch, one-stitch and French-knot embroidery. It can be adapted to one 36-inch centerpiece, three motifs 2 by 17 inches and three motifs 2 by 14½ inches.

Embroidery design 10383

10383—Braiding with one-stitch embroidery makes a smart trimming for Autumn frocks, blouses, hats, scarfs or coats. Or work it in one-stitch and outline couching or chain-stitch. The design can be adapted to 2⅝ yards each of banding 5 inches and 3 inches wide, 4⅜ yards of banding 1¼ inch wide, 33 motifs, 6 corners.

Embroidery design 10381

10381—A design reminiscent of old-world stained-glass windows is a lovely trimming for dresses, blouses, coats, hats, etc. It may be worked in beading, French knots or outline and satin stitch and is adapted to 1⅝ yard of 6-inch banding, 3⅜ yards of ½-inch banding, 3 yards of 2¼-inch banding and 62 assorted motifs.

"About eighteen months ago I was a complete wreck: could not eat or sleep, was anemic and my color had faded to a sickly green. My friends began to exchange pitying glances, and one day, an old lady insisted on giving me her seat. That was the crowning humiliation.

I decided to give yeast a trial. I started eating three cakes daily. In about six weeks found I could eat a real meal once more; in two months my natural color began to return. I kept on, and now, thanks to Fleischmann's Yeast, I am a well woman."

Mrs. F. R. Conner, Florence, Ky.

"I began to eat Fleischmann's Yeast to overcome constipation. My improvement was steady and permanent. To make a long story short: I am fighting fit in every way. Overwork does not bother me. My endurance is there. I eat and sleep like a he-man. The remarkable improvement in my health is a matter of record based on a physician's examination. Constipation? Banished forever. Fresh air, exercise and a few cakes of yeast a day did it."

Walt Marsh, Belleville, Ill.

A Story Told by Thousands

How they corrected their ills—regained the vitality of youth—through one simple food

NOT a "cure-all," not a medicine in any sense—Fleischmann's Yeast is simply a remarkable fresh food.

The millions of tiny active yeast plants in every cake invigorate the whole system. They aid digestion—clear the skin—banish the poisons of constipation. Where cathartics give only temporary relief, yeast strengthens the intestinal muscles and makes them healthy and active. And day by day it releases new stores of energy.

Eat two or three cakes regularly every day before meals: on crackers—in fruit juices or milk—or just plain. For constipation especially, dissolve one cake in hot water (not scalding) before breakfast and at bedtime. Buy several cakes at a time—they will keep fresh in a cool dry place for two or three days. All grocers have Fleischmann's Yeast. Start eating it today!

And let us send you a free copy of our latest booklet on Yeast for Health. Health Research Dept. C-21, The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington Street, New York.

"Scratches festered, pin pricks turned to boils—I was a rival for Job's 'laurels.' My nerves were chaotic; I developed a morbid, craven terror of pain. A neighbor suggested yeast and, though cynically doubting the remarkable cures narrated, I took 4 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast daily between meals for one month. The incredible happened. A boil just starting dried away painlessly, minor blemishes on my back, which I had had in series for years, totally disappeared; I grew steadily stronger, and life reassumed normal perspective. Finally I, who had dragged to my housework, half fainting from the least exertion, had surplus energy and wiped dishes dancing to phonograph records!" Mrs. R. G. Booth, Port Washington, N. Y.

This famous food tones up the entire system—banishes constipation, skin troubles, stomach disorders. Eat two or three cakes regularly every day before meals.

"This spring, desperate from years of constipation and unavailing attempts to cure its resultant evils, I read this definition by a physician: 'Yeast is an antiseptic and is effective in all diseases in which there is threatened putridity.' I began taking one cake in warm water before breakfast and at bedtime. My looks a month later demonstrated a release from cathartics. Continuing the treatment, I gained daily in vigor. Years of intestinal poisoning take their toll of youth; so I shall continue to drink my yeast."

Mrs. Carrie M. Crema, Philadelphia, Pa.

"This spring, just recovering from a serious illness, I asked my physician if Yeast would do me any good. He said that it was very good, so I began eating it. I am no longer troubled with indigestion, headaches, or stomach troubles of any kind, nor do I any longer wish to hide my face on account of the pimples. Instead of the pale sallow look, I have a good rosy complexion. And now I can eat a hearty meal, and enjoy it. Fleischmann's Yeast has wrought this wonderful change, for at present I use no other remedies."

MENUS FOR OCTOBER

By Jessie A. Boys

These menus were planned to provide correct nutritional food values and at the same time to meet the expenditures of the householder with an average income. They were edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

"UM-YUM"

That's what you will hear when dad marches briskly into the dining-room and when the children romp in with appetites sharpened by the keen Autumn air.

Shepherd's Pie, Chambéry Potatoes, Piccalilli Salad, Peach Sherbet—who wouldn't greet them with delight? Try these menus on your family. "OCTOBER'S bright-blue weather" lures one out for many meals and the cooler weather makes the camp-fire a necessity for comfort as well as cooking. The menu given for Saturday night is planned as a camp supper. Order a tender steak, cut as thick as the finger rolls. This is to be broiled over the fire on a grill or on a broiler, then cut into slices, which are at once placed in the buttered finger rolls, sandwich fashion. Corn is boiled in a large kettle and coffee made in a regular picnic pot or container of suitable size and material. The tomato-and-lettuce salad can be served as such to be eaten with a fork or made into salad sandwiches with the whole-wheat bread. This picnic menu may be shortened, but as it stands every dietetic requirement is supplied and satisfaction is the usual verdict.

Why Mrs. William E. Borah believes in this care for her skin

The wife of the distinguished Senator from Idaho speaks from a unique experience

"THE WOMAN who cares about the dignity of her appearance—in the political life of Washington, on the plains of Idaho—looks to the smoothness, the firmness of her skin.

"The Pond's method keeps the skin in the pink of condition, rejuvenating it from the strain of official entertaining and the fatigue of welfare work. Just as surely, too, do Pond's Two Creams protect the complexions of women who ride the sage-brush-covered prairies of our great West. For these two excellent Creams, in which I firmly believe, are made to serve women of all pursuits, in all climates, everywhere."

Mary McConnell Borah

MRS. WILLIAM E. BORAH, wife of the Senator from Idaho who is Chairman-elect of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee of the next Congress, is a prominent leader in Washington Society

DAUGHTER of a former Governor of Idaho and wife of its present Senator to the United States Congress, Mary McConnell Borah was destined from the first for public life. Her father, the late William J. McConnell, prominent in the development of the western frontier during the 'eighties and 'nineties, was one of Idaho's first governors and its first United States Senator after it became a state.

Mary McConnell rode her own ponies over the sage-brush plains. The young man who was her father's private secretary and who often accompanied her on these rides fell in love with this golden-haired slip of a girl who rode so fearlessly and well. Not long after they were married the Senatorial toga fell upon this young man's shoulders. And then came the test of formal officialdom at Washington!

Mrs. Borah met it with complete success. Her dignity, her graciousness, the girlish freshness of her appearance made her at once a favorite. Ever since, she has responded unceasingly to the countless official and social demands of Washington life.

NO woman is busier, yet Mrs. Borah finds time to work for sick Veterans of the World War cared for in three great Government hospitals in Washington. She visits them every week, writes their letters home, takes them cigarettes, magazines and, always, cheer!

Mrs. Borah believes in a rounded life, in a woman's looking after the details of her appearance. During a visit with her not long ago in her Washington apartment I asked her what she believed to be the best way of caring for the skin. "A good cream," she answered, "for cleansing and keeping it firm and fine. And another for protecting it." Then she told me how the women who live on the great western plains of our country must protect their skin as they ride or drive over the prairies. "The alkaline dust of the desert ruins their complexions unless they guard them carefully. This is just where Pond's Creams are such a help. They keep the skin from becoming parched and lifeless in this dry atmosphere."

EVERY SKIN NEEDS THESE TWO CREAMS

FEW women have had experience as wide as Mrs. Borah's. But women of important place and social prominence everywhere are pursuing this same balanced care for their skin in which Mrs. Borah so firmly believes. They are depending upon Pond's Two delicate Creams which you should daily use as follows:

Every single day cleanse your skin with Pond's Cold Cream. Always at night, and always, too, on returning from an outing, with your finger tips pat this purest, lightest, creamiest of creams over the skin of your face, throat, arms, hands—and its delicious fragrant touch will never fail to please you. Let it stay on long enough for its pure oils to seep down into the pores. They will bring to the surface every trace of the dust and dirt which clog them. Wipe off all the cream—and the dirt that comes too—and repeat the process, finishing with a dash of cold water or a rub with a bit of ice.

Over your newly cleansed skin, before you powder, smooth the thinnest possible veil of Pond's Vanishing Cream. Light as thistle-down, soft and fluffy, you won't wonder a bit that it makes your skin look lovely. Its surface has a positively damask smoothness now and you will find that over it your powder goes on beautifully and stays smoothly and ever so long. Moreover, this thin veil of Vanishing Cream acts as a protection, guarding your skin against the rigors of any weather, against drying, chapping and burning from sun and wind. So if you want to follow this method, to secure the best results always use Pond's Vanishing Cream before going out.

WHEN you buy Pond's Creams—as you'll surely want to right away—ask for the new big generous jar of the Cold Cream. The Vanishing Cream comes in smaller jars since you do not use it up as rapidly.

It is more efficient and more durable than any machine of tempered steel—yet the material which composes it has only a small fraction of the strength of steel.

The most wonderful machine in the world—the human heart!

The heart is so good we take it for granted. If it performs perfectly, we seldom think of it. But if it "acts up," we begin to think, and think hard. The proper course, then, is immediate and frequent consultation with the family physician.

Our common attitude of indifference toward our hearts—as long as they serve us faithfully—would be ideal, if it had worked out well. But it hasn't. It has resulted in heart disease becoming the greatest single cause of death.

It is possible that all heart disease is preventable; it is certain that much of it is preventable. Prevention, in this case, is not what the health officer does for us, but what we do for ourselves.

A well-known authority on the heart and its treatment lists "poisoning by caffein" among the major causes of heart disease.

Caffein is an artificial stimulant which "speeds up" the heart. And as the only time which the heart has for rest is the time between beats, this "speeding up" not only means a greater load of work, but less time to recuperate.

Eliminate caffein from your diet! You can do this without sacrificing the benefit and enjoyment of a hot drink at mealtime. Change to Postum!

Postum is made of whole wheat and bran, roasted to bring out the full, rich flavor. This is a drink you can enjoy every meal of the day, with no fear of the nervousness, sleeplessness, headache and indigestion which are so often only the first and minor effects of caffein.

You are the operator of the most wonderful machine in the world. To a large extent, the care you give it now determines how well it will run, and how long it will run. We suggest an easy step in the right direction. Accept the offer of Carrie Blanchard, famous food demonstrator!

Carrie Blanchard's Offer

"I want you to make a thirty-day test of Postum. I want to start you on your test with one week's free supply, and my personal directions for preparing it—both in the usual way, for yourself, and with hot milk, for children.

"Or, if you wish to begin the test today, get Postum at your grocer's. It costs much less—only one-half cent a cup.

CITRON—THE GAMBLER'S GAME

By Mary Hamilton Carter

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

HIGH STAKES

You may win clear, chewy citron for your fruit-cakes, spicy pickled citron and a golden blend of jam with pineapple or berries—if you gamble with this tricky fruit. It won't be tricky, however, if you follow the expert advice in this article and send for the directions we have in a new leaflet.

The leaflet tells you how to cut citron and prepare it, and gives you recipes for delicious preserves and jams. Just a two-cent stamp to cover postage to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., will bring it to you.

Cutting up citron is a gambler's game. Your thumb is the stake

LAST Fall a neighbor called me on the phone, asked what I was doing, and to my reply, "Doing up citron," exclaimed, "I pity you. Isn't it the trickiest, most tantalizing stuff? It's all a gamble what you get out of it. I do mine exactly the same every time, as far as I know, and it never comes out twice alike."

I had lived through my own troubles with citron and thought them unique until that moment, but when I came to ask around among my neighbors, every woman repeated the indictment in almost the exact words.

It's a gambler's game, citron, with the gambler's eternal hope that the next bet wins—that's part of the lure. "You fail, and you don't know why," say the women. Yet when you do produce a perfect batch, it gives you more satisfaction than anything else coming out of the preserving-kettle. Transparent, buttercup gold, lumps of solidified sunshine that seem to glow with their own light.

The two prime objectives in preserving citron are to get lumps of that color and to have those lumps—cubes, dominoes, prisms—keep the shapes into which you cut them from the raw melon; and the first and the commonest "meanness and trickery" you meet is finding those clean-cut forms crumbling in the kettle. Corners drop off, long blocks break in two, edges get a bitten look; and sometimes the crumbling continues until there is nothing left but a granular mush. The cause of this is the age of the melon; though it may look exactly the same in November, December or January as when it came off the vine in September, it has subtly ripened. The moral is: Do up your citron as soon as it comes from the vine, and don't wait a month or two or three until it has gone mealy. And just remember this one point also: No matter what any recipe tells you to do in the matter of parboiling—parboiling in plain water makes any vegetable and fruit fabric tender.

Trickiness of coloring, though, is more of a problem than trickiness of fabric. The "ambering"—the production of a range of yellows from pale honey to deep amber which no other fruit exhibits—depends to a certain extent upon the juices in the melon, and melons differ greatly in this particular, some showing the color an hour earlier than others, or two hours later. I find that a dash of lemon-juice hastens the ambering.

After cutting the citron-rind into cubes or any other fancy shapes, take as a general rule weight for weight of cut rind and sugar, a little less sugar than this when the melons are fresh early in the season. a little more late in the season, when they have ripened longer. Increasing the sugar tightens up the fabric.

Next, layer the cubes with sugar in the preserving-kettle or a crock and stand aside overnight. In the morning the citron will be swimming in its own juice. Remove all the pieces, put the juice on the fire and skim as soon as it comes to a boil. For each pint of juice allow half a lemon and a piece of ginger the size of a kidney bean, sliced or cracked into small bits. Also, for each pint add an amount of powdered alum that would make in size a large rice grain. This last is not for clearing purposes but for mold proofing, and a trace is sufficient. Without this trace of alum, citron is probably the worst molder on the list. See to it that the alum is completely dissolved, the lemon-juice strained, and the juice boiling when the citron is put in. Boil until the pieces become clear and translucent, for which I always allow an hour and a quarter at a gentle simmer, and continue boiling until the desired color comes.

Bring the citron to a boil in an open saucepan, then pour into a double boiler

Ambering is the result of time-heat, and with sufficient time-heat every fruit can be made to amber. While no exact time-table can be given for ambering citron—that's part

Residence of L. Martineau, Vandreuil, P. Q., Canada. Celotex was decorated and used on all walls and ceilings as insulation, sound deadener and interior finish. This home is warm in winter

Residence of Spencer Lainhart, West Palm Beach, Fla. Harvey & Clark, Architects. Celotex was used on all walls and ceilings as insulation and sound deadener with plaster applied directly to its surface. This home is cool in summer

Warm in January yet Cool in August

{ Enjoy all-year comfort in your home with Celotex Insulating Lumber }

THE day of the old-style, heat-leaking house is past. Home builders no longer put up with houses that are chilly and draughty in winter (in spite of big fuel bills) and hot and stuffy during the summer.

They don't have to! Modern homes are insulated with Celotex Insulating Lumber, at no extra building cost.

Celotex stops heat waste

Tests show that one-third of the heat generated to warm the old style, uninsulated house is wasted. It passes right through the walls and roof—just as radio waves do.

But Celotex stops heat. It means warm, cheerful coziness indoors when January's icy wind roars outside. And it means cooler, more restful rooms during the blistering days and sweltering nights of midsummer.

Other Celotex benefits

Celotex homes are more healthful. There is no danger to children from draughts and cold floors when Celotex is used. Because Celotex is an effective sound-deadener, a restful, nerve-relaxing quiet will pervade this Celotex home of yours. In it, you and your family will lead better, happier, more healthful lives.

And Celotex construction makes your home modern, as well as stronger. It insures the future resale value of that home.

Why Celotex comfort costs no more

You can have this Celotex comfort at no more than the cost of ordinary construction, because Celotex is not an extra. Wherever used—as sheathing, or inside the house, where plaster is applied directly to its surface—Celotex takes the place of wood lumber or some other material and any form of insulation. Celotex is the only insulating material that is not an extra.

In addition, Celotex construction saves from ¼ to ⅓ of your fuel bill and permits the use of a smaller, less expensive heating plant and fewer radiators, with fewer ashes and less stoking.

Ask your architect, contractor or lumber dealer

Ask about Celotex before you build or buy a home. Celotex insulation will insure the future sales value of any house in which it is used.

If you are going to build, use Celotex. It is available everywhere. Your architect, contractor, or lumber dealer will explain its uses fully—ask him to tell you about Celotex.

If you are going to buy a completed home, insist upon one built with Celotex.

"Cream of Tartar Baking Powder is Best"

Contains no alum. Leaves no bitter taste

TEACHERS of domestic science in universities and technical schools have wide opportunities to test foods.

These women were asked—"What kind of baking powder do you prefer—and why?"

88% of those replying said unhesitatingly, "Cream of Tartar." "Good results"—"No bitter taste"—"More dependable"—were the points they stressed.

FOR half a century Royal—in which are perfectly blended pure cream of tartar and soda—has been the most familiar package in millions of kitchen cupboards, the first ingredient set out when fine cakes or biscuits are being made.

An experienced cook knows she can always depend on the unvarying quality of Royal. Inexperienced cooks have better luck with it.

Pure cream of tartar derived, with expensive care, from choice grapes grown on the sunny hillsides of Southern Europe, and pure soda—these wholesome ingredients expertly blended in Royal insure the fine, creamy texture and full, sweet flavor of your cakes and biscuits.

2 cents worth insures success of large layer cake

It is false economy to use anything but the best when 2c worth of Royal is all it takes to make a gorgeous layer cake you'll want to show your neighbors.

CITRON—THE GAMBLER'S GAME

of the gamble with it—a table of reasonable expectations reads as follows:

During the first hour, citron will clear and slightly darken, and it will be a finished preserve in all other particulars at the end of an hour and a quarter. During the second hour the color changes from light honey to dark. During the third, from dark honey to good amber. During the fourth, to rich, deep amber. Buttercup gold may be expected in about two hours and a half. But if it has not appeared, don't be discouraged. Patience and boiling is the price of a perfect color. I have boiled citron for six, eight and even ten consecutive hours to get it.

Ambering should be carried on in a tight-lid agate pot at constant volume to prevent evaporation as far as possible; otherwise the fabric will be injured by the condensation of the sirup. For this purpose I always use a double boiler. Though it takes a little longer, it saves watching and prevents burning. By putting on the double boiler sometime in advance, and bringing the citron to a boil in an open kettle, then pouring it into the double boiler, I lose very little time at the start, and the boiler can then be left to simmer for hours with only an occasional stirring. As a general rule one may say that the longer the simmering the richer the coloring; in practise, however, the coloring will be complete in five hours; after that the change is scarcely perceptible to the eye.

Citron may be colored by the addition of grape-juice

If you wish to avoid ambering—which you must do if you are after pure pinks, reds, crimsons, purples or amethysts—time-heat must be reduced to the lowest quantity that will clear and cook the fruit; the preserving process must be carried out as rapidly as possible, and a double boiler should not be used. Boiled with a small quantity of red, purple or black grape-juice, or the juice of red-fleshed plums, citron can be dyed in exquisite shades of pink, rose, clover and amethyst. These shades, however, will often disappear mysteriously while you are getting your jars ready. The disappearance is due to ambering; the dyed shade is swamped in yellow, and to some extent bleached out by the lemon-juice which you put in. To retain these shades in their pristine beauty the citron must be taken from the fire as soon as clear and the lemon put in after boiling has ceased or, better still, omitted altogether, using spices instead, as a certain amount of bleaching is bound to occur in the jars if left standing for several months.

For coloring citron, either with fruit-juices or with artificial dyes such as are used for ice-creams and frostings, the best results will be obtained by cutting the slices about half an inch in thickness. These will be a finished preserve in less than an hour—that is, fifteen or twenty minutes ahead of noticeable ambering. The ordinary inch-thick cubes seldom color through or clear until ambering has set in. By keeping these two elements in mind—time, and the effect of acid in hastening the ambering—the coloring processes can be almost perfectly controlled, the only "gamble" being the acid content of the melon itself, or some peculiarity of the juices of an occasional melon that will vitiate the results. And here is another little point: In making a grape-juice dye use only the skins and extract the juice with dry sugar by mixing two packed measures of skins with one of sugar, allowing them to stand in a crock or pitcher for about thirty hours. Stir several times at intervals of a few hours and when every particle of the sugar has dissolved wring out the mass in a jelly-bag as dry as you can get it. A safe working rule for quantity is to add a cupful of juice to a quart of the preserving sirup and keep on deepening the color little by little until you have it about four shades darker than you want the citron to be.

Plain dry citron suitable for mincemeat, plum puddings or cake can be readily made by continued boiling down and subsequent drying on plates. The simplest way to get a pound of citron for mincemeat is to take the next-to-end slices of raw melon, which are usually seedless, pare and quarter them, put them through the regular preserving process with the rest, and leave them behind with the surplus sirup to go on boiling down until they become tough. Remove and rinse them with cold water, dry with a paper napkin and finish drying on plates in a slow oven.

Fragrant Orange Bread — original — exquisite — nourishing — a triumph!

One of the new delightful recipes created by Miss Betty Crocker in the Gold Medal Kitchen. New ones all the time. Kitchen-tested recipes with Kitchen-tested Flour—perfect results every time you bake! Send for the Gold Medal Home Service Recipe Box. Read Miss Crocker's unusual offer.

ALMOST every woman knows those heart-breaking days, when—in spite of everything—her biscuits or cookies or pastries insist on turning out wrong. You blame yourself perhaps. Yet only too often it is the flour!

The Gold Medal Kitchen-test on every batch of flour guarantees you uniform results—in all your baking

At least one-half of all baking failures can be traced directly to the flour!

For often the same brand of flour may not always act in the same way. It may never vary chemically. And yet it may act differently almost every time you bake. Hence so many baking failures.

So the only way a miller can be sure his flour will act the same way in your oven every time—is to Kitchen-test a sample of each batch—by actually baking with it before he allows it to enter your home.

That is why every batch of Gold Medal Flour receives this Kitchen-test. To save you from costly experimenting when you bake.

Tested in a Kitchen Just Like Yours

First the Gold Medal millers with their 60 years of experience carefully select the choicest wheat. Before they mill it they wash every grain in clear running water. Then samples of each batch of flour are sent daily to the Gold Medal kitchen.

In this cheerful kitchen, Miss Betty Crocker and her staff bake from these samples. They bake all kinds of small breads and pastries.

And each batch of Gold Medal Flour must stand up under this strict baking test and prove its absolute uniformity. Each sack must bake right for you before it leaves our mills.

The Gold Medal Unqualified Guarantee to You—

Order a sack of Gold Medal Flour from your grocer. Try it out as much as you please.

If it is not the best flour that you have ever tried and if it does not produce the most uniformly good results, you may at any time return the unused portion of your sack of flour to your grocer. He will pay you back your full purchase price. We will repay him.

Eventually — every woman will use only Kitchen-tested flour. It is the one way you can be sure that every sack will always act the same way in your oven. Why not now?

"Service to the Northwest"

Have YOU a PINEAPPLE RECIPE worth $50?

We want to buy 100 of them~

the very best recipes that the women of America have discovered for serving HAWAII'S "KING OF FRUITS"

You may have one that we want

Twenty-five years ago canned Hawaiian Pineapple was unknown. Today it is one of America's most popular fruits—and the recipes for serving it are legion.

For years this Association has been collecting recipes for serving Hawaiian Pineapple in every possible menu connection. Famous chefs and cooking authorities have contributed their favorite Pineapple fruit-cups, cocktails, salads, ices, desserts, pies, sauces and punches. We have searched the pages of cook-books and magazines. And, last but not least, we have collected the many original Pineapple recipes cherished by the people of its native land. The best of these we have published in our advertisements and in our recipe books.

At times it seems that every possible variety of Pineapple service must have been developed. And yet, just as we begin to think so, some enthusiastic woman sends in a new and delightful recipe that proves how limited our imagination has been and makes us realize that in the millions of homes where Hawaiian Pineapple is served, there must yet be many unique and original recipes which have never appeared in print.

We want to know what they are and we shall be glad to pay well for them. We want to publish a new recipe book that will contain the greatest variety of original ways for serving this delicious tropical fruit. And to prepare such a book, we know that we must draw upon the collective experience of all the good, practical cooks in the country.

How You Can Help

As a user of Hawaiian Pineapple, you may be serving it in some simple, yet distinctive, combination which wins the praise of everyone who eats it. This may be your own discovery. It may be so novel that only your immediate friends have ever tasted it. If so, that is exactly the type of recipe we want and we will gladly pay you $50 for it if it meets our needs.

The recipes we buy must be original. They must be new and tempting and yet so practical and economical that there is a place for them in the regular menu of the average American home.

We do not want ultra-fancy or extravagant dishes that only the few can afford. Nor can we accept recipes which closely duplicate the ones we already have. To avoid such duplication you should have our present book entitled, "99 Tempting Pineapple Treats". Send the coupon below for a free copy. Then check over your own favorite pineapple uses and see if you have anything new to offer.

Note the manner in which these recipes are prepared, and in sending us your own, be guided by the specific instructions in the lower left-hand corner of this page.

How New Recipes Will Be Selected

All new recipes submitted will be passed upon by a committee of nationally-known domestic science experts. After the judges have made their selection, checks will be mailed immediately to all whose recipes are purchased, and all other contributors will later receive a free copy of the pineapple recipe book.

This new book will receive the widest possible free distribution. The names and addresses of all contributors will be published and they will unquestionably represent the best practical cooks of America. To be included in this list will be an honor in itself. But to make it entirely worth your while, we are paying a much higher price for each recipe accepted than even the professional food authority gets.

To every woman who is proud of her cooking, we appeal for assistance in making this new book the most original and practical one ever offered for the service of Hawaiian Pineapple. Won't you help us? During the next few weeks try out your good pineapple recipes—get the opinion of your family and your guests of the best ones to contribute. And then send them along to us as promptly as possible. We will greatly appreciate your co-operation, and you may have exactly the type of recipe we are anxious to buy.

Conditions to be Observed in submitting Recipes

Please remember that Hawaiian Pineapple is canned in two ways for different culinary uses—Sliced for instant service right from the can, quick desserts and salads where the slices are to be kept whole; and Crushed, for ready use in sundaes, ices, pies, cakes, salads, desserts and all those other delicious made-up dishes where the crushed form is preferable. Both Sliced and Crushed are of exactly the same quality. They are simply packed in these two forms for your convenience.

Send as many recipes as you wish for the use of either Sliced or Crushed Pineapple, stating clearly which form is called for in each. Write each recipe on a separate sheet of paper and put your name and address in the upper right hand corner of each sheet.

The recipes will be selected by the following committee of nationally-known food experts: Miss Alice Bradley, Principal, Miss Farmer's School of Cookery; Mrs. Mildred Maddocks Bentley, former director Good Housekeeping Institute; and Miss Sarah Field Splint, Director Food Department, McCall's Magazine.

All recipes will be judged: 1st, for originality; 2nd, for tastiness; 3rd, for ease and economy of preparation; 4th, for appeal to the eye, and 5th, for suitability for frequent service.

From five to twenty recipes are needed under each of the following classifications: (1) Fruit-cups and Cocktails; (2) Salads; (3) Cold Desserts; (4) Hot Desserts; (5) Frozen Desserts; (6) Pies and Tarts; (7) Cakes, Cake Fillings, Frostings and Sauces; (8) Miscellaneous; (9) Punches and Drinks.

All contributions must be received by November 15th. Address them to Recipe Editor, Association of Hawaiian Pineapple Canners, 451 Montgomery St., San Francisco, Calif.

SELECTING YOUR BEDCOVERS

By Beulah Blackmore

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

HOW LONG ARE YOUR SHEETS?

Do you know the right sizes, or must you accept the guess of the clerk? Do you know how many sheets and blankets and pillow-cases you should have for each bed? Do you know how to select good blankets and comforters?

All these questions are answered in our leaflet on "Bedcoverings," which you can secure from the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, for just a two-cent stamp to cover postage. The list is a practical shopping guide which will be welcomed by every housewife, and the Autumn bride will find it invaluable.

When you furnish the bedroom, write to the House-Decoration Department and ask for the helpful bedroom leaflets it has prepared. Just a two-cent stamp for return postage will bring you the leaflet on "Adults' Bedrooms" or the one on "Boys', Girls' and Guests' Bedrooms."

THE secret of successful bedcoverings is that they should be fresh, pleasant to feel and warm without weight. This may be brought about not by heavy, compactly woven or quilted bedding, but rather by several layers of bedding light in weight and of such a texture that small chambers of still air are held imprisoned. These tiny chambers of still air are non-conductors of heat so that all the warmth of the body is retained.

Sheets should be long enough to turn back over the blanket

The points to remember in selecting bedlinens are warmth without weight, ease in handling and laundering, and appearance on the bed.

In a house with a number of bedrooms it is not necessary to multiply the list required for one bed by the number of rooms, as the emergency linens would very infrequently be needed all at one time, but when one is fortunate enough to have a house so planned that there is comfortable storage space, then it may be economical to take advantage of January white sales to lay in a reserve supply.

THE most essential points to give consideration to in making or buying sheets and pillow-cases are the suitabilty of the quality to the use, the size of the sheet and the method of finishing the sheet. There are many grades of cotton sheeting, from heavy coarse unbleached muslin to the finest quality of bleached muslin sheeting called percale. Sheeting should feel firm, smooth and rather leathery. The yarns of the cloth in both directions should be strong, evenly and smoothly spun and woven close together. When possible, the most practical test for sheeting is to wash a sample thoroughly and then examine it closely. Ravel out both warp and filling yarns and break them. The strongest yarns make the strongest cloth. When comparing similar materials, observe the twist of the yarn, as the strength of similar yarns is proportional to the twist.

When purchasing ready-made sheets or when purchasing sheeting without testing a sample, rub the sheeting vigorously between the thumb and first finger of each hand. If a white deposit is left on the thumb, the material is sized or starched too much and the material will be sleazy after washing. Sizing or starch may often be observed if the material is held to the light. A limited amount of starch is legitimate, as it is necessary to give the material a good commercial appearance, but more than a modest amount of sizing is used to make a poor piece of material look better than it really is. Unbleached muslin sheets give excellent wear, but are difficult to wash while new.

Percale sheets are woven and finished in such a way that there is practically no fuzz on the surface. This gives percale sheets a more linen-like appearance and prevents them from soiling as quickly as other cotton sheets. They are to be desired beyond all other sheets when beauty of texture is wanted.

A sheet should be from twelve to eighteen inches wider on each side and longer at each end than the mattress. The top sheet will then be long enough to turn back for the protection of the blankets and comforts. One hundred and eight inches is a desirable length for sheets for the average full-length bed. The width depends upon the width of the bed. Large sheets have the one disadvantage of being difficult to launder.

It is always desirable to buy both sheets and pillow-cases that are advertised as being "torn." This means that the sheet or case was torn before hemming and, consequently, it will be much straighter along the hems after it has been laundered.

Linen sheets wrinkle easily, and are very expensive, but are beautiful and feel very cool when in contact with the body.

Most persons prefer pillow-cases made of tubing, as they are less cumbersome, and if they become worn along the edge the seam at the end may be ripped, the position of the edges changed and resewed, thus lengthening the life of the case.

Sheets and pillow-cases come either hemmed, hemstitched or scalloped. The hemmed sheet is the most practical, as many launderings will whip off a hemstitched hem and will tear the sheet between the scallops of a scalloped edge.

BEAUTIFUL all-wool blankets are a luxury in these days, but a very desirable one. No other type of bedcovering, unless it is a down puff, will give the same degree of warmth without weight as will fluffy all-wool blankets. It is the nature of the wool fiber to be very elastic; therefore in the weaving and spinning of wool each fiber springs back from its neighbor, causing a tiny air-chamber to be formed between fibers. It is these tiny chambers of still air which make the blanket or any other wool material comparatively light in weight and warm. If these little chambers of still air are forced out of a blanket, as when a blanket mats or packs down in laundering, then the blankets will feel heavy and will have lost warmth. In selecting a blanket, therefore, choose one that feels rather spongy, slightly wiry, light in weight and has a deep fuzz or napped surface. Look carefully to see that a heavy nap does not cover weakly constructed cloth. Pull the blanket between the hands; if the foundation yarns have a tendency to separate, the blanket will not give satisfactory wear, as too many fibers have been pulled up from the foundation yarns to make the nap.

It is a question whether the commercial all-wool (ninety-eight per cent. wool) blankets are as satisfactory as those in which there is about twenty per cent. cotton. In the first place the yarns of a blanket seem to be somewhat strengthened with a small percentage of cotton added, and secondly, a very small percentage of cotton assists in keeping the wool fibers from matting when laundered.

Blankets are usually sold double, but they are much more easily handled if cut apart and bound. The most satisfactory blanket binding is a fine quality of sateen, though many prefer binding blankets, especially

AN ELIZABETH ARDEN TREATMENT Photographed in Paris by Baron DeMeyer

Has a summer of neglect left your skin coarse, your contour relaxed?

You can tone the skin and firm the contour only by a scientific method which stimulates circulation and nourishes and quickens the tissues into natural health. This is the method of Elizabeth Arden.

YOU CANNOT wipe away sunburn—or the coarseness and sallow color which follow sunburn—with a single cream. No toilet preparations are magical. Elizabeth Arden has proved that the only really effective method of skin treatment is that which aids and stimulates the natural activities of the skin.

Summer has relaxed the tissues of your beauty. Tone and stimulate the cells, and your coarse-textured skin will grow fine in grain. Brace and firm the muscles, and your contour will grow smooth and firm. Waken the lazy circulation and new cells will soon replace those that are sallow and brown. This is the scientific method of Elizabeth Arden.

An Elizabeth Arden Treatment is based on three fundamental steps—Cleansing, Toning and Nourishing. Venetian Cleansing Cream is used to remove dust and impurities from the pores without robbing the skin of its natural oils. Then the toning—with Ardena Skin Tonic and Special Astringent—closes the pores and invigorates the muscles by arousing swift circulation. Finally, the Nourishing—with Orange Skin Food or the delicate Velva Cream—supplies the nourishment to strengthen and firm the skin tissues. These three steps should be a part of your every Self Treatment at home. Elizabeth Arden recommends these Preparations for your daily care of the skin:

Venetian Cleansing Cream. Dissolves and dislodges all impurities in the pores, leaves the skin soft and receptive. $1, $2, $3, $6.

Venetian Ardena Skin Tonic. Tones, firms and whitens the skin. Use with and after Cleansing Cream. 85c, $2, $3.75, $4.75.

Venetian Orange Skin Food. Keeps the skin full and firm, rounds out wrinkles and lines. $1, $1.75, $2.75, $4.25.

Venetian Velva Cream. A delicate skin food for sensitive skins; nourishes without fattening. $1, $2, $3, $6.

Venetian Muscle Oil. A rich penetrating oil, restores sunken tissues or flabby muscles. $1, $2.50, $4.

Venetian Special Astringent. Lifts and firms the tissues, tightens the skin. $2.25, $4.

Venetian Pore Cream. Closes open pores, corrects their inactivity. $1, $2.50.

Venetian Bleachine Cream. A bleaching and nourishing cream, made of fresh lemons. Softens and whitens the skin, removes tan and redness. $1.25.

Venetian Amoretta Cream. An exquisite protective cream, gives a soft, smooth, natural bloom to the skin. An excellent powder foundation. $1, $2.

Poudre d'Illusion. Exquisite powder, fine, pure. Illusion (a peach blend), Rachel, Ocre, White, and a new becoming shade called Minerva, $3.

when new, with satin ribbon. Regular mohair blanket binding may be purchased at a notion counter. It is easy to use and makes a satisfactory, durable finish.

Woolen blankets should be long enough and wide enough to tuck in a number of inches. A double blanket should be folded so that one piece is longer than the other, thus allowing a generous length of at least one thickness about the shoulders. If blankets are folded in this way, it is economical of laundering and more sanitary to place a little washable cotton case about twelve or fourteen inches deep over the end of the blanket which will come next to the face. This case then takes up the soil and the blanket is protected. Sheets which are long enough to turn back over the blanket will save it greatly. Frequent airing of blankets and allowing the wind to blow through them will keep blankets fluffy.

Blankets must be laundered carefully to keep them from matting. The main causes of shrinking are changes in temperature of water, too vigorous rubbing, using soap that contains a strong alkali, and drying where the blanket steams.

COTTON blankets are usually woven in the same manner as wool blankets, also in pairs. Cotton blankets, even when new, are not a satisfactory substitute for wool blankets, as the number of cotton blankets to keep one warm would make an unbearable weight. Their best use is as a substitute for sheets in the coldest weather and as Summer blankets.

Pull the blanket between the hands; the foundation yarns should not separate

Comforters are made from cotton wadding, wool wadding or down covered first with cheese-cloth; then a second cover is made from a more decorative material. Cotton wadding in comforters will by the very nature of the cotton fiber make a heavier and less warm padding than wool. It packs rather quickly and launders with great difficulty.

Wool wadding makes a light and very warm comforter which may be laundered successfully.

Because of the weight of Winter bedding, down puffs are most to be desired. They are extremely light and very warm. In selecting a down puff be reasonably sure that the blanket is filled with down instead of feathers and that the covering is down-proof—that is, that the down is first encased in a down-proof material. The puff should be quilted only enough to keep the down from shifting to the sides or ends. The usual coverings for down puffs are satin, China silk or a very fine quality of sateen. Down puffs launder successfully. The initial cost of down puffs is far beyond that of cotton or wool filled comforters.

If you wish to make your own spreads, there are many materials from which to choose, such as cretonne, chintz, heavy crocheted or knitted lace, combined with heavy round-thread linen, crapes, unbleached muslin tufted with candle wicking and fringed with twine fringe, or unbleached muslin simply decorated with bands of contrasting material. Unbleached muslin is of course a very simple and inexpensive material, so to be most artistic it must be handled or decorated in an extremely simple craftsmanlike manner.

If spreads are purchased ready-made, the selection is practically limited to three general types: the dimity, or seersucker, in one of its many modifications, the crocheted or honeycomb, and the Marseilles. Each of these may be secured in various qualities.

To test the quality of sheeting before you buy it, rub it vigorously between the fingers

The dimity, or seersucker, spread is highly recommended because of its lightness and ease in laundering. It wrinkles easily, but if pulled taut it makes a bed appear very fresh and agreeable. These spreads are inexpensive, may be secured in all white, cream or white combined with delicate colors and in almost any size desired.

The Marseilles spread is the most expensive and durable of all types, and will last a lifetime if purchased in one of the fine, closely woven qualities. It is very heavy to launder, but at the same time its satiny surface with raised or puffed figures stays clean much longer than any other spread.

AS IN mattresses, the filling for pillows varies. Hair, kapok, feathers and down are the fillings most often used. In case of sickness, as in fever, or in the Summer, hair pillows are often used. They are unyielding, cool, but rather unpleasant to use. Hair pillows are often used as second or bolster pillows on a bed.

Kapok-filled pillows are soft and inexpensive, but are not suitable for a bedpillow, as the kapok is inclined to mat and powder. It is not unfrequently used for decorative couch pillows.

Feathers are the most satisfactory filling for pillows. Feathers may be secured in a number of qualities. Chicken feathers are the poorest as they are heavy and lack elasticity. Duck feathers are the second quality, and goose feathers are third and best. Goose feathers are the best investment, as the feathers make a fluffy light pillow and can be successfully renovated. These feathers should be taken from the live bird in the Spring. A little saving in money may be made in choosing a gray instead of a white feather.

Down may be combined with goose feathers fairly successfully. Used by itself it mats too easily-

Split feathers are those from which the largest part of the quill has been removed. This makes a very desirable pillow, but it is very expensive, on account of the handling necessary to prepare the feathers for the trade.

MARY PICKFORD · and the costume that could not be duplicated

TINY, clinging hands—oh! so dirty—soiled the soft, silken folds of "Our Mary's" gorgeous gown. It could not be replaced . . . the scenes must all be retaken at a cost of thousands of dollars. Consternation reigned. Then someone . . . but read Miss Pickford's own story of how this seemingly tragic situation turned out to be only an amusing incident!

"BEFORE making 'Little Annie Rooney,' my latest picture, I did two costume plays, and the silks and satins I wore were a continuous source of care.

"However, I knew from experience with my own gowns, that there is a remedy when accidents happen—that Lux dissolved in hot water will restore dainty fabrics to their original state of spotlessness.

"When a costume is made of the only piece of silk of its kind in Los Angeles and a dozen scenes have been made showing that costume, an accident to it brings a difficult and often costly situation. Such an occasion came to my attention recently.

"A costume had been used in a very expensive picture, when a child rubbed a dirty little hand on my dress. Consternation reigned. The director saw visions of retakes costing thousands of dollars if the costume could not be duplicated.

"A lady who was standing nearby approached and said: 'I'm so very, very sorry! Let me take the dress and see what can be done about it.' She took the gown and in the course of time returned it as good as new.

"She explained that Lux had accomplished the result. 'But why were you so sorry?' she was asked. 'Why, you see it was my little girl that soiled it,' she explained."

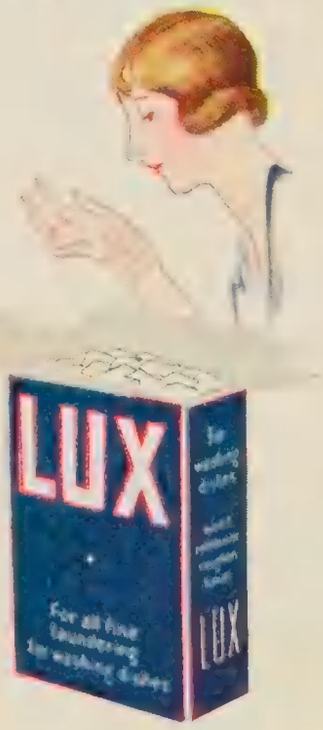
MISS PICKFORD as "Little Annie Rooney"

In her newest picture, "Little Annie Rooney," which has just been released, Miss Pickford achieves one of the finest screen characterizations of her career.

All of Monday's Laundry treated like fine fabrics now

Your hands, too, deserve the utmost kindness



ONE day "Why not Lux for the hardest job of all—Monday's laundry?" you said. "All my things are so nice and cost so much nowadays—they simply cannot stand the wear and tear of strong soap." Joyfully you call on Lux to work its wonders. And it does!

Your becoming little housedresses, the children's cheery ginghams, your nice house linens—all come out of its cleansing suds fresher looking than ever before, colors unfaded, whites snowy clean. Everything lasts longer, too.

There's nothing in Lux to injure the delicate fibres—just the same bubbling suds you've always trusted your fine things to—gentle, magically cleansing. And Lux is such a relief to your hands after harsh laundry soap! Really, they don't mind Monday any more. Such a little Lux does the whole laundry, too.

Gone! those in-the-dishpan HANDS

Now dishwashing has lost its old terrors. Three times a day you plunge your hands into the dishwater and Lux leaves them soft and white. No tell-tale in-the-dishpan look. Just one teaspoonful of Lux is enough! Lever Bros. Co., Cambridge, Mass.

Now the Big New Package, too

A little Lux goes so far it's an economy to use it

You Do It with Quick Quaker!

Apples Made Wonderful

You'll never know how wonderful a baked apple can be till you've tried one in this way, its fruity tartness contrasted with the smooth deliciousness of creamed oatmeal . . . an almost perfectly balanced dish.

2 cups Quick Quaker	½ cup sugar	6 tart cooking apples
4 cups boiling water	1 teaspoon salt

Cook Quick Quaker in usual way. Place washed, cored apples in greased baking dish. Pour oats in and around apples. Sprinkle with sugar. Cover and bake in moderate oven for 35 minutes. Then uncover and cook 10 minutes longer. Serve warm with milk for breakfast, or cold for lunch or supper.

Oatmeal Cream Pudding

To the delicate enticement of quickly-prepared gelatine is added the creamy lusciousness and essential food quality of oatmeal to make the gayest and daintiest of all puddings.

2 cups Quick Quaker	1½ tablespoons gelatine
½ cup sugar	1 cup milk
1 teaspoon grated lemon rind	1 cup cream or evaporated milk

Soak gelatine in cold milk for five to ten minutes. Add sugar. Stir soaked gelatine and the sugar into hot oatmeal. Rub through strainer. Fold in whipped cream or evaporated milk, flavor with lemon rind. Chill in mold.

Scotch Oat Cakes

Real Scotch oat cakes are an adventure to the American palate . . . rich food in the form of tid-bits to prove the Scotch are canny in more ways than one.

1½ cups Quick Quaker, ground		1	teaspoon baking powder
		½	teaspoon salt
⅓ cup Quaker flour		1	tablespoon sugar
⅓ cup milk		3	tablespoons shortening

Grind oats and mix with flour, sugar, baking powder and salt. Rub in fat, turn out on board and make a well in center. Add milk slowly with spoon or hand. Roll into thin cakes on board sprinkled with oats and flour. Bake brown in moderate oven.

Plus The World's Fastest Cooked Hot Breakfast

QUICK QUAKER cooks in 3 to 5 minutes. A new kind of Quaker Oats that makes hot breakfasts now the quickest! It's quicker than toast, quicker than coffee! .... vigor food, savory and enticing, in less time than it takes to tell! All the richness, all the flavor of Quaker Oats. Quick Quaker cooks faster, that's the only difference.

MAKE TIMBALES OF LEFT-OVERS

By Freda Winn

Recipes have been tested and approved by the New York College of Home Economics at Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

ONE of the easiest as well as one of the most unique and attractive methods of combining and utilizing small quantities of left-over meat, fish or vegetables or combinations of meat is the timbale.

The simplest kind of timbale is made with a custard foundation. If one remembers to use one egg to each half cup of liquid and as much seasoned chopped meat, fish, or vegetable as liquid, no other recipe is required in order to achieve great variety.

In cooking custard timbales, the first precaution is to grease the mold well in order to facilitate the process of unmolding; the next is to set the molds in a pan of hot water; and the third is to cook the timbales in a slow oven, about 300 degrees Fahrenheit, until a knife inserted in the center comes out clean. The time of cooking varies with the size of the timbale. A timbale cooked in an ordinary custard-cup requires thirty to forty minutes. Overcooking or too hot an oven will cause the timbale to whey just as it does a custard or a bread pudding.

SALMON TIMBALES

2 eggs
1 cup milk
¾ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
1 cup flaked salmon, well drained
1 pimiento, cut up very fine

Beat the eggs just enough to mix the yolk and the white; add the milk and the seasoning, then the salmon and pimiento. Mix well, turn into well-greased molds and bake as directed. Serve with tomato or green-pea or caper sauce.

CHICKEN-GIBLET TIMBALES

1 tablespoon fat
1 cup chicken, or chicken giblets, cut very fine or put through the food-chopper
2 stalks celery, minced
2 slices onion, minced
1 cup stock
2 tablespoons green pepper, minced
1 small cooked carrot, diced
¾ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
2 eggs

Melt the fat. Add the chicken, celery, onion and green pepper to the fat and cook for five minutes, stirring occasionally. Beat up the egg just enough to mix the yolk and white. Add the stock and browned meat and vegetables and seasonings. Mix well. Pour the mixture into well-greased custard-cups or timbale-molds and cook. Serve with bechamel sauce.

Ham or other cooked meat may be substituted for the chicken. In this latter case, serve with tomato sauce.

Custard timbales may be made from any kind of vegetable as well as from meat.

GREEN-PEA TIMBALES

2 eggs
1 cup milk
¾ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
1 tablespoon minced parsley
1 cup of well-drained cooked or canned peas
1 tablespoon minced onion (may be omitted)

Prepare as for salmon timbales and serve with tomato sauce.

Timbales may also be made from left-over or canned asparagus, spinach, from cauliflower or greens—in fact, from any vegetable or combination of vegetables.

CODFISH TIMBALES

2 cups scalded milk
2 tablespoons butter
½ to 1 cup of soft bread-crums
1 onion, minced
1 pimiento, minced
½ teaspoon pepper
2 cups flaked fish
2 eggs, slightly beaten

Mix the ingredients in the order given, turn into well-greased custard-cups and cook. Unmold on individual plates or on a platter. Serve with tomato sauce and garnish with watercress.

CANNED-SOUP TIMBALES

2 eggs
1 can of asparagus, pea or tomato soup
¼ cup cream or 2 tablespoons melted butter
1 pimiento, finely minced
1 small onion, finely minced
½ green pepper, finely minced
¾ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
A dash of Cayenne

Prepare as for salmon timbales. This may also be baked in a large casserole.

A pleasing variation to this dish is made by adding a cup of hot tomato purée and covering the whole with a cup of grated cheese. It is then returned to the oven just long enough to melt the cheese and is then served at once.

MACARONI TIMBALES

For this timbale, macaroni is boiled whole. This can be done by first putting the ends of the macaroni in water. As the macaroni becomes soft, it will bend and can gradually be fitted into the kettle without breaking. When the macaroni is done, it should be well rinsed in cold water and laid straight out on a towel so that it will not twist during the draining process. It is then ready to form the lining of the timbale-mold. The mold is well greased and, beginning at the bottom, the macaroni is coiled around the inside of the mold so that it will form a complete covering to the timbale when it is unmolded. When the macaroni is in place, the center may be filled with any timbale mixture. These timbales are very attractive, but require time and care in their preparation.

Another attractive timbale is made by placing a pimiento in each mold and filling with the timbale mixture. When it is unmolded, the timbale has a gay red coat which is very effective.

TIMBALES may be served on individual plates or from a platter. Unless very highly seasoned or accompanied by a creamed vegetable, they should be served with a sauce. There are a number of sauces which not only improve the flavor but also enhance the appearance. In selecting a sauce for any particular timbale care should be taken that the sauce chosen shall not only blend and harmonize with the timbale but with the other food served on the same plate as well.

Additional recipes for timbales and for sauces to serve with them will be sent in return for a stamped envelope addressed to THE DELINEATOR'S Home-Makers' Department, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

SAVE DOLLARS AND HOURS

Hints from successful housewives

If you have discovered some clever little way to save time or labor or fuel or food or anything else connected with housekeeping, tell us about it—and if we can use it in these columns we will pay you five dollars for it. Write on only one side of the paper, and address your letters to The "Savers" Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. (If you wish to have your suggestion returned in case we can not use it, please enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope.)

SAVE IN CLEANING THE FLOOR-MOP

MY ELECTRIC sweeper saves me from the dirtiest and most exasperating task in my home; that is the task of keeping clean the floor-mop. Shaking it is not really effectual; to wash it is repulsive. After each mopping I start my electric-cleaner, tip it back from the floor to a convenient angle, and run my mop back and forth across the vacuum opening. The suction disposes of the lint, and if your sweeper has a revolving brush three or four strokes of the tips will help to make the mop almost unbelievably clean. The secret is in moving the mop across the cleaner, rather than the cleaner across the mop. This method is even more successful and quicker than using the vacuum attachments.—MRS. J. R. MCW., Tulsa, Okla.

Lint and dust are drawn out of the mop by your electric cleaner

SAVE TIME IN ACCIDENTS

With six children running in with hurts and cuts I instituted our first-aid box. In a box the size of a cigar-box I placed an antiseptic wash, a roll of sterilized gauze, adhesive tape, liquid courtplaster, a box of absorbent cotton, a pair of small scissors and a paper of needles for splinters, and a jar of good salve. When any one was hurt he came bringing the "first-aid" box, saving me steps and time. The best result was that soon the children were doctoring their own hurts and learning how it ought to be done. The training in self-reliance and first-aid knowledge was worth more than several lectures.—MRS. C. P. K., Bristol, Tenn.

SAVE GRIMY WINDOWS IN WINTER

Why have dirty, unsightly windows during the Winter months just because the water would freeze on them if we were to attempt to wash them? Give them an alcohol rub and they will be clean and shiny with very little effort on your part. The alcohol also tends to prevent the windows from steaming over.—MRS. J. R. F., Columbus, Ohio.

SAVE ON PUMPKINS FOR JACK-O'-LANTERNS

One pumpkin may serve for two lanterns when the Hallowe'en decorations are being planned, or one-half of each pumpkin may be used for pie, using the other half for the lantern. Cut the pumpkin through the center and substitute a piece of cardboard as a back in place of the other half of the pumpkin. Cut the face in the pumpkin. A flash-light may be used instead of a candle if there is danger of fire, or an old radio battery may be attached to a test tube on the inside of the pumpkin and the battery pasted on the back of the cardboard with adhesive tape.—MRS. M. C. F., Pottsville, Pa.

SAVE ON CHOCOLATE

In making cookies which call for chocolate and nuts, you find that there is still a considerable quantity of chocolate that can not be removed from the saucepan with the spatula or knife. But if you pour the chopped nuts into the saucepan and stir them around well, the remainder of the chocolate is salvaged and the pan left almost clean.—F. T. E., Concord, Mass.

SAVE CLOTH AND LACES FROM TURNING YELLOW

It has been found from experience that if these precious bits are wrapped carefully in bright or dark blue tissue-paper they are less likely to turn yellow. Crush pieces of tissue and place between folds so that no parts rest heavily on each other. Wrap all in another piece of blue paper, tie and label. Place all in a suit-box before storing away.—A. D., Ithaca, N. Y.

SAVE A LOOSE MOP-HANDLE

If the wooden handle of the floor-mop becomes loose and can not be screwed into the mop, instead of attempting to make it tight by winding cloth around it, try soaking this end of the mop-stick in a bucket of warm water for approximately an hour. The handle will screw tightly and will remain tight for some time.—MISS F. B., Riverside, Calif.

SAVE SEARCHING FOR STOCKINGS

For years I always searched through my supply of stockings to find just the pair I needed. Now I have a way of keeping them in perfect order and it is possible to find any pair quickly. I made a bag resembling a shoe-bag, but with one large pocket across the top and several smaller pockets below. In the large pocket I keep the stockings that I wear around the house. The next row of stockings are for my street hosiery, and the bottom row for the very best.—MRS. A. J. J., Minneapolis, Minn.

SAVE LEMON-PEEL BY SOFTENING IT

I found in making fruit-cake that my supplies of dried lemon, orange peel and citron were hard as a rock, and that I was unable to put a knife through them. I have found as a time and patience-saver that if I put them in the oven for a few moments they became as soft as fresh orange or lemon rind.—MRS. B. M. P., Akron, Ohio.

SAVE TIME IN USING BINDING

I have found a very easy as well as satisfactory way of sewing silk-binding braid on dresses. I fold the braid almost in the center, then press with an iron, folding and pressing at the same time, then I baste the folded braid over the edge I wish to bind. It is possible to stitch both sides at the same time.—B. O. MCF., Tiffin, Ohio.

SAVE BUYING AN ASBESTOS PAD

All housewives who even occasionally use a tablecloth on their polished dining-room table need an asbestos pad to protect the table-top from hot dishes. They are rather expensive; but I made mine at a cost of a little more than a dollar. Buy a square piece of wall-board the size of the diameter of the table. Then with a piece of string tied to a pencil draw a circle on the wall-board the size of the top of the table. Draw a line cutting the circle in half. Divide this line into three equal parts, and draw lines through these points perpendicular to the diameter. With a pair of tinner's shears or a saw cut the board on each of these lines. There are now six pieces. Cut a piece of Canton flannel the size of the table-top; next cut the flannel into half-circles. Fit the three pieces of wall-board closely together. Cover them with a half-circle of Canton flannel, the cloth and three pieces of board being exactly the same size. Cover the backs of the wall board with blue, and fit them on the flannel. Proceed in the same way with the other three sections of wall-board and the half-circle of flannel. The flannel side of course goes next to the table-top.—E. A. A., Leadville, Col.

And now–Puffed Sun-Maids a seeded raisin that isn't sticky!

With all the nectar of the Muscat grape to flavor your RAISIN COOKERY··

TO THE millions of women who have learned how immeasurably raisins add to the enjoyment of simple everyday foods, this message is particularly addressed.

For here we offer a new delight in Raisin Cookery—a new convenience and a new measure of goodness.

So different from the old kind

Always for certain foods you have known the special value of seeded raisins. You remember how your mother even seeded them herself to get their winey flavor into her holiday fruit cakes.

So you have used them in spite of their bothersome way of sticking together. And yet, as you have sat at your kitchen cabinet, with floured fingers, picking them apart, no doubt you have wished someone would make seeded raisins really convenient to use.

Now Sun-Maid has done it—in an entirely new and better form of seeded raisin called Puffed Sun-Maids.

Now you get the full flavor

From our finest Muscat grapes they come—large white grapes, so tender skinned, so bursting full of sweetness that they must be left clustered in the vineyards till the sun has cured them into raisins.

By a patented Sun-Maid process the seeds are extracted without crushing the raisins or causing the juice to run, as in ordinary seeded raisins.

Hence, Puffed Sun-Maids are larger, plumper. And they are more savory because they retain more of the natural fruit sugar. You will notice the difference in the very first dish you make with Puffed Sun-Maids—a richer flavor, a fuller fragrance.

Use them right from the package

And it's so easy to use Puffed Sun-Maids. They are not sticky to handle, but separate easily as they come out of the package. You can whisk them right into your batter!

Or if you choose to cut them for your fluffy white cakes, you can do it in a jiffy—with scissors!

Whole raisins, untorn, they "stay up" in the batter far better than ordinary seeded raisins and make more tempting the dishes you serve.

They cost no more.

Ask your grocer for a package of Puffed Sun-Maids today. They cost no more. For pies and cakes and puddings; for breads and sauces and candies, you will find Puffed Sun-Maids the best and most convenient seeded raisins you ever used.

Also from Sun-Maid come the finest SEEDLESS raisins

Just as the Sun-Maid Raisin Growers of California now offer you the perfect seeded raisins so do they supply the finest seedless raisins, clean, uniform, full-flavored.

From the culture of the vineyards to the final packaging of the raisins, everything is done to make Sun-Maids your favorite brand.

In buying Sun-Maids—Puffed in the blue carton, Seedless in the red carton—you get the product of these 17,000 cooperating California growers who for years have set the raisin quality standard of the world.

EASIER, QUICKER THIS WAY

If you want to cut PUFFED SUN-MAIDS for your pound cakes, do it in half the time—with scissors!

"JOHN now eats more than his father, and I know Mary eats at least as much as I. I can't understand it." Thus speaks many a mother who, as family purveyor, is faced with the problem of keeping the children fed and fit. She has long known the inroads on food a healthy child can make, but it nevertheless comes to her as a surprize when her active boy or girl, just now in the neighborhood of twelve years of age, begins to eat as much or more than father or mother. It looks to her as if something may have gone wrong with the child and she wonders if there is anything she should be doing about it. It is not uncommon to hear her perplexity take the form of a remark such as I heard recently when a mother said of her active, perpetually hungry son, "John eats so much I'm sure it keeps him thin to carry it." The truth of the matter was that in this case John was eating neither enough food nor the right kind of food.

Some of the facts the mothers should know are these: All through childhood children need and should eat an amount of food which is much larger in proportion to their weight and size than the adult needs or should eat. The child's body is making big demands on food, first to keep it in condition and to feed its activities, and secondly, to supply materials for storing in the new tissues and for building up the reserves that are a part of normal growth.

Further, when healthy, vigorous, active boys and girls reach the teens, and in many cases as much as two or three years ahead of this age, some stimulus from within causes an increase in their need for food that makes it reach a point where it often equals or exceeds that of the grown-ups in the family. In adjusting themselves to this phenomenon, trying to keep hungry youth satisfied, parents get the idea that their children are like bottomless pits into which food is being poured with little to show in the way of results.

For the peace of mind of these parents it may be said that if most abundant growth and health and vigor are their objectives, only two limitations need be set on the amount of food given to the average normal, active, hard-playing child: the first of these is that the child shall eat each day the prescribed amounts of those foods that are vital to its protection and growth; the second is that the kind and amount of food shall not exceed the child's powers of digestion. Having carefully observed these precautions, the parent may under normal conditions allow the child to eat to repletion.

There is growing evidence that there are numbers of children in our midst whose growth and development could be greatly improved if their food supply was modified and increased. Instead of wondering whether the child eats too much, the effort should be placed upon providing conditions which will encourage eating on the part of the average child. We should see to it that he plays and exercises out-of-doors; that he spends time in the sunshine; that he sleeps long hours in well-ventilated rooms; that his diet encourages appetite. When all this is done, we should supply him with the abundance of food that is needed to satisfy a lusty appetite. If we are working to give him the best that food can supply, we shall see that his daily dietary always yields the following: A quart of milk; an egg; a piece of meat; an orange or half a grapefruit or some lemon-juice or tomato; at least one serving of some other fruit; a green vegetable; a serving of one other vegetable besides potato; one or more servings of potato; all the bread and butter and breakfast-food he needs to fill in the corners; a simple dessert at least once a day. These foods should be his daily background if possible. We may not be able to do all of this for our children, but at least this is the ideal we should seek to follow if we wish to feed rightly and abundantly these boys and girls whose future efficiency is being determined by us now.

ASK US

Ask us anything you want to know about housekeeping and we will answer it personally. From our recent correspondence we publish the following questions and answers as being of general interest to all home-makers

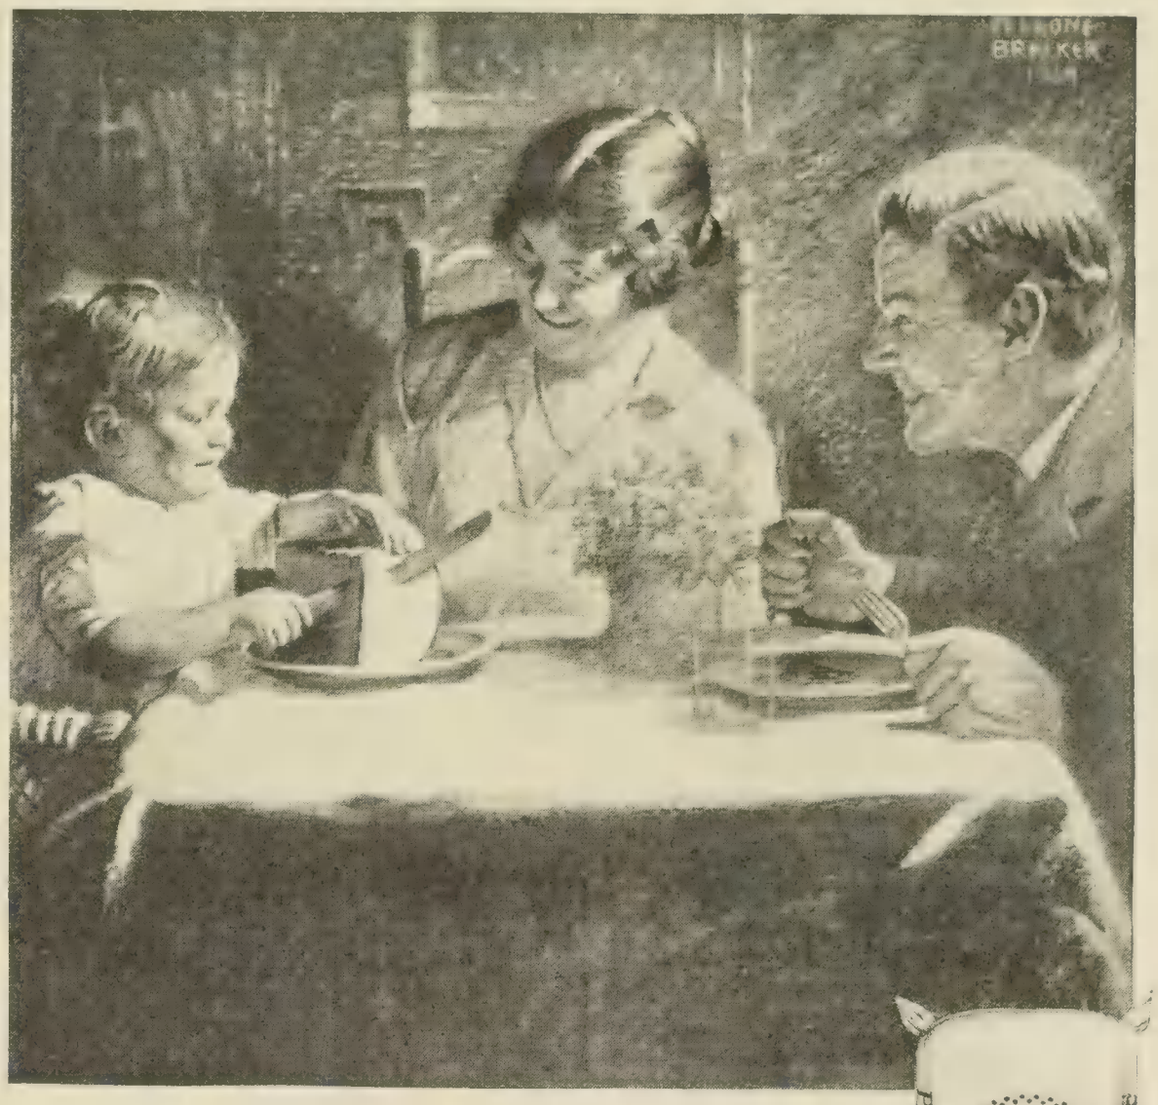
QUESTION—What is the best way for me to clean a rusty stove top?

Answer—When the stove is cold, brush it well with kerosense and let it stand half an hour. Then rub well and wipe off with soft paper. Give a second application of kerosene, let stand and then rub thoroughly with steel wool until the rust is removed. Clean it thoroughly with soft paper and old cloth. Repeat this treatment for several days or until the surface of the stove improves in smoothness.

Question—I have been told that something called viscogen will help in whipping cream. How can I get this and how is it used?

Answer—Cream to whip well should be thick. Good whipping cream should contain from twenty-five to forty per cent. of butter-fat, should be from twelve to twenty-four hours old and should be cold (35 to 50 degrees Fahrenheit are the best temperatures). If cream is too fresh or too warm, it will be thin. Thin cream is thickened and whips more easily if one teaspoon of viscogen is used to each two cups of cream.

Viscogen is a harmless solution of lime. All milk contains lime. It is made by mixing thoroughly three-tenths of a cup of milk of lime, half a cup of sugar and five cups of water. Put in bottles or jars and allow to stand twenty-four hours before using. It will keep indefinitely.



Question—How can I renovate my window-shades?

Answer—Holland-cloth shades may be laid flat on a table and washed with a damp (not wet) cloth, using lukewarm water and mild soap. Care should be taken not to let water soak into the shade. Wipe with a dry cloth. Other shades may be cleaned by rubbing with art gum, corn-meal or dried bread, taking care not to scratch the surface.

Removing the shade from the roller and turning it upside down, nailing the bottom edge to the pole and finishing the top edge like the bottom, will help to give the effect of a new shade. Painting with a thin coat of a good oil-paint in the desired color gives fairly satisfactory results.

Question—Will you tell me how to renovate velvet that has been packed a long time and is badly matted and creased?

Answer—Stand a hot iron on end and cover the bottom of it with a wet cloth. Over this pass the velvet, holding the wrong side next to the damp cloth. The steam from a teakettle may be used for large and heavy work. This is especially easy with a spreading device put into the spout of the kettle. Have very little water in the kettle so that it will not sputter out with steam. There should be some one to assist with this work, because the velvet should be shaken dry and not allowed to crease while damp.

A Special Message to Diabetics

ARE you tired of having the same prescribed foods day after day? Of never having the good things you like?

Do you long for something different?

Knox Sparkling Gelatine will vary your diet amazingly. It makes diabetic dishes that are appetizing and delightful. Moreover, your physician will tell you that a plain unflavored gelatine, because of its protective colloidal action, increases the digestibility of the prescribed foods and is thus a most important dietetic factor.

Grape Juice Jelly—One Serving

⅔ teaspoon Knox Sparkling Gelatine
2 teaspoons cold water
5 tablespoons boiling water
8 drops, or scant ½ teaspoon, lemon juice
2 tablespoons grape juice
⅛ grain saccharin

Soak gelatine in cold water, dissolve in boiling water. Add saccharin, lemon juice and grape juice. Pour into molds and chill. This furnishes about 7 grains of carbohydrates, the fat and protein are negligible. If a high fat requirement is to be met, a tablespoon of cream, whipped, served on top adds approximately five grains of fat.

Another variation, when the mixture is partially set, beat it until frothy, then mold, making grape sponge.

Delights That Grow on Trees

FRESH Fruit! Grapes, apples, oranges, pears, peaches—what a wealth of health they give us—especially the children. Eat more fruit, fresh or canned. Increase its natural benefit and make it go further by combining it with Knox Sparkling Gelatine in a different dessert or salad every day.

Take the apple, for instance, one of the most wholesome of all our fruits. Make an Apple Charlotte, and revel in the most fascinating dish you ever tasted. Here is the recipe:

Apple Charlotte—Six Servings

½ envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
½ cup boiling water
1 cup sugar
Lady fingers or stale cake
1 cup apple or peach pulp
¼ cup cold water
Whites of three eggs
2 tablespoonfuls lemon juice

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and dissolve in boiling water. Add sugar and when dissolved add lemon juice. Strain, cool slightly and add peach or apple pulp. When mixture begins to stiffen beat, using a wire whisk, until light; then add whites of eggs beaten until stiff and beat thoroughly. Turn into mold lined with lady fingers or stale cake. One pint whipped cream may be used in place of whites of eggs.

Knox Gelatine recipes are not only so easy to make but they are economical as well—each package makes four different desserts or salads—each sufficient for six persons.

Just how should dates be eaten?

Which way do you prefer this interesting food?

Dates come to you just as they leave the trees—they are golden ripe from the sunshine—a nourishing fruit—good to taste.

The woman who has tried dates stuffed, as a confection, or cooked, knows that dates have a flavor that blends unusually well with other foods. And if she is a woman who thinks of the values of foods (and most women do) she knows that dates are as good for her as they are good to taste.

She knows that natural foods are best—the fruit of the soil and the trees—untouched by the modern refinements that so often rob us of essential nourishment.

Natural foods retain the constructive properties on which our bodies depend. The woman who serves all the fruit and vegetables she can is guarding the health and happiness of her family.

Dates are a natural food, with a generous content of mineral salts. Calcium, one of the important minerals, is the essential food for bone and teeth—iron, as you know, is nature's finest tonic. The date contains natural sugar which is immediately absorbed by the body as energy. This digestible date-sugar is developed by the sun. For dates are a sun-food, reflecting the color of imprisoned sunlight.

And with all their nutritive value, dates have a delicate flavor. They are good to eat. And they are a cooking ingredient as well as a hearty fruit or tempting between-meal snack. This page tells you some of the best ways and some of the best times for serving them.

. . . . . .

Dates are delicious in so many ways

Luscious pies, sweet with the rich fruitiness of dates and cranberry; salads gently spiced with the goodness of dates; cereals and sandwiches—see how transformed they become when you add this simple ingredient.

Luscious dates stuffed for tea to tempt your appetite

Rare flavors and appetizing delicacies are appropriate for tea. The date suggests itself as a confection instead of cake—or as filling for dainty sandwiches. Take some pitted dates and stuff them with pimento-filled olives, or cream cheese. Stuff the dates till they are plump and large and luscious. For sandwich filling, mix sliced dates with one of the ingredients mentioned for stuffing.

Dates with grapefruit— a marvelous salad combination

Make this salad by adding Dromedary canned grapefruit to the lettuce, four slices to a serving, garnished with pitted dates and a dainty pattern of mayonnaise. Salads depend upon just such pleasant combinations. Dates belong in all fruit salads, for they are one of nature's most nourishing gifts. For another salad delicacy, combine a slice of Hawaiian pineapple with three dates, stuffed with cream cheese.

Serve dates in or on your cereals

Allow four sliced dates to a serving. When your cereal is just ready to come off the stove, mix the dates right in it. Stir, making sure the dates become heated—then serve. Remember also that uncooked cereals are perfectly delicious if sliced dates are placed on top before adding the cream. Perhaps the best reason for using dates with cereal is that no sugar is necessary. This is a much more healthful way to eat cereal—and children like it. And you can combine dates with rice, just as with cereals.

A new flavor—date and cranberry pie

Blend 1½ tablespoons of flour with two tablespoons of water. Stir this into 3 cups of hot cranberry sauce. Cook for three minutes. Add 1 cup of pitted and sliced dates. After cooling, pour into pie-dish, which has been lined with crust. A lattice top-crust is most appropriate for this delicious pie. Bake for 35 minutes, with hot oven for first ten, then reducing temperature. Another delicious pie is made by adding sliced dates to the usual custard-pie ingredients.

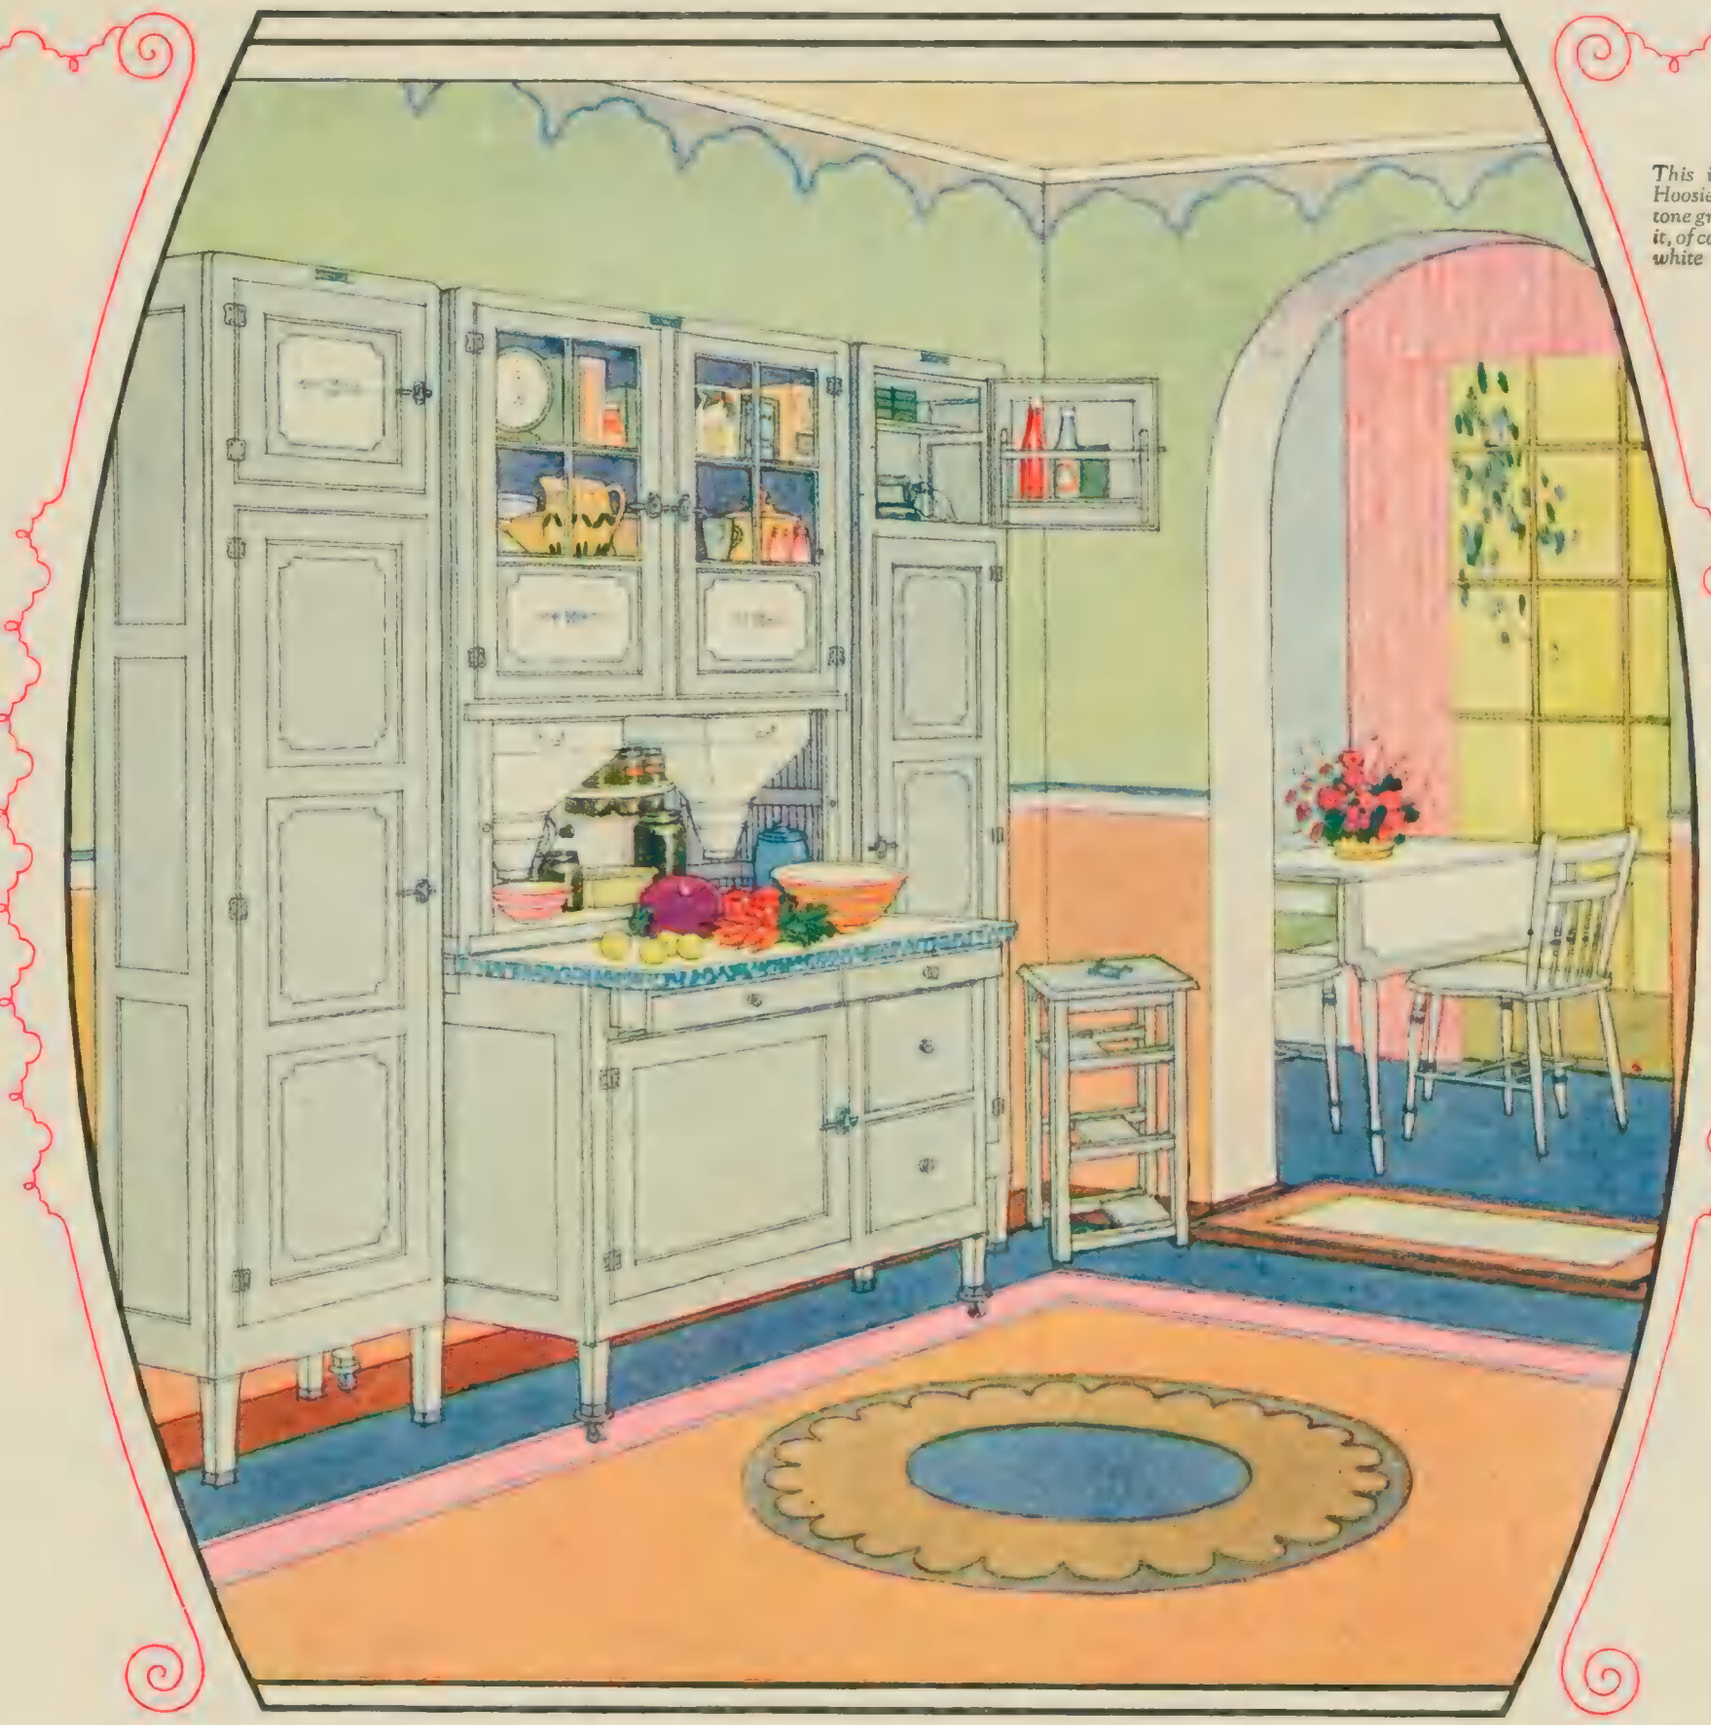
Except for oil-paintings, most pictures look well either with or without mats. Dark pictures or photographs with dark backgrounds are less likely to need mats or margins than lighter-colored pictures. However, in framing etchings and engravings, one must remember to leave margins on. It seriously detracts from their value if the margins have to be cut off and replaced by mats.

In the matter of hanging pictures correctly, the most important rule is to hang them so that the center of the picture will be about on a level with the average eye.

Give large pictures large wall-spaces and medium-size pictures medium-size wall-spaces. Never hang a long, narrow picture in a short, broad wall-space or panel, or an oblong picture in a long, narrow wall-space; rather, fit all pictures to suitable wall-spaces. Few things are more annoying than to gaze constantly on a picture which has been placed in a wall-space or panel too small for its size. Such an arrangement gives a cramped feeling which becomes very irritating. Picture-frames should never touch wall-panel moldings.

A picture or mirror of any considerable size may be placed over a piece of furniture, such as a cabinet, console or chair. Mirrors have a distinct decorative value in a room, for by their reflections they create charming vistas and open up greater spaces.

In the room of ordinary height, the picture molding is usually just below the ceiling, so placed that a picture-hook can just slip over it. If the ceiling is high and the room not a formal one, the effect of livableness is increased by lowering the picture molding to a line eighteen inches down the side wall.



When hanging pictures, be sure they stay flat and close to the wall. They should not tip forward at the top. This can be avoided by inserting two screw-eyes in the back of the frame near the top of the picture. Then if they are to be hung by wire to picture-hooks in the molding, pass a long strand of wire through both screw-eyes, measure off the desired length, make a loop in the wire at both ends and slip these loops over two hooks in the molding, which should have been placed the width of the picture apart. If two or more pictures are to hang over each other, the wire from the second and third pictures may be hung over the same hooks that were used for the top picture.

Sometimes silk cord is used instead of wire, and the loops at the top of the molding are finished with tassels or medallions. In the case of small pictures, it is possible to hang them invisibly by inserting into the wall a small nail with a hook attached. These come in a variety of sizes to hold a variety of weights. They make scarcely a tack hole in the wall-paper.

When choosing a place for pictures, be careful to consider a good light. The varnish of oil-paintings and the glass over other types of pictures reflect light in such a way that if wrongly placed the subjects of the picture can not be seen.

Light should come largely from one direction to make the subject distinctly seen and appreciated. In general, it is wise to avoid placing a picture between two large windows or in a place where light falls on it from two directions at once.

This is the newly designed Hoosier suite in beautiful, two-tone grey. You can always get it, of course, in the old favorite white enamel or golden oak Beauty makes its autumn début in the kitchen!

—with this artistic new Hoosier suite in lovely two-tone grey

It's just plain "human" to feel better, think better, work better where things are orderly and beautiful. And here's new beauty, now, for a room too often neglected heretofore. The kitchen!

In the newly designed Hoosier suite, there's beauty hitherto undreamed of for this old work room! Until you see it you can't imagine how really artistic kitchen furniture can be.

The color scheme is a perfectly charming idea in two-tone grey. You know the soothing, restful effect of grey. And where would you need it and enjoy it more than in a busy kitchen?

The body color is soft, rich Hoosier grey. Then for trimming contrast there are panels of satiny Dove grey. These panels are outlined with a narrow band of bright rich blue and ornamented with conventional flowers of the same live blue.

It's so dainty and feminine and so easy to keep looking spic and span! Spots and stains don't seem to crop out so vividly on a soft grey background.

But beauty is not the only motif of this new Hoosier suite. It is as practical as it is beautiful.

Hoosier Kitchen Furniture has always embodied the latest labor saving ideas science could devise. Domestic science authorities recognize Hoosier as distinctive in design and fittings.

Imagine your kitchen completely furnished with the Hoosier suite! What an inviting place you could make it and how comfortable and efficient to work in—with this Hoosier equipment:

Hoosier Highboy. The most perfectly planned and constructed working center that the modern kitchen knows. Scientifically designed in every detail of storage space, drawer and shelf arrangement and working accessories.

Hoosier Shelf Unit. A new constructive aid to save steps and strength. Ample storage space right where you need it—for dishes, utensils and supplies.

Hoosier Broom Closet. A handy, roomy place for all the cleaning things—brooms, mops, vac, etc. Specially fitted with racks and holders.

Hoosier Breakfast Set. And here's the finishing touch for a handy, cozy kitchen! You'll never see a breakfast set with more charm of line and loveliness of finish than this one. The table is drop leaf; the chairs have a dainty grace yet are sturdily built.

Just $5 Down
That's all you need to pay now

And here's the best news of all! Just $5 down will put any Hoosier Cabinet in your kitchen and you can finish paying in weekly payments so small you will never miss the money! And you can have any other piece of Hoosier equipment on equally easy terms.

FREE! An interesting book on beautiful kitchens

We have published a book on kitchen planning and beauty in the kitchen, which we want every woman interested to have. It is beautifully illustrated in color and is free—won't you write your name and address in the coupon below so we may send it to you?

The new Hoosier suite is on display this week at the Hoosier store in your town. Be sure to see it and the other favorite models in white enamel and golden oak. They will explain the new Hoosier Easy Payment Plan. Or we will gladly give you details when we send your copy of the Hoosier book.

love for the child. You see, the experience of child-bearing develops certain latent instincts in the most inefficient——"

"Doctor Whalen!"

The doctor hushed at once.

"That is a positive insult—coming from Peggy. If I can't take care of a baby, it's the first thing in life I couldn't do better than Peggy Harkaway. I'll show her."

"And you, too!" her tone implied. Then she picked up the undesired blue bundle.

"I am glad that you have decided to accept the responsibility after all," said the doctor. "And for fear that you might become confused, I had directions typewritten and put into the basket of the baby's clothing which a messenger is taking to your apartment."

"Very well."

"And don't forget to call me every day for a while."

"Very well."

Still he stood grinning at the predicament of Elizabeth Harkaway.

"One thing you have forgotten already. You haven't asked the baby's name."

"I didn't suppose she had one—yet."

"Oh, yes. Her mother would like her to be called Elizabeth."

"What?"

"Yes. Elizabeth Whalen."

"Wh-a-a-t?"

"I hope you don't mind. I took the association as a compliment."

"It sounds exactly like Peggy Harkaway!"

With which uninterpreted fling, Elizabeth fairly ran from the scene.

SHE was still seething when she reached her studio. She carried the still marvelously sleeping baby into her little bedchamber, laid it gingerly crosswise on her narrow bed and returned to her Jacobean reception-room, where she slumped weakly on a bench.

The baby cried. She was hungry. A glance at the clock and at the neat schedule prepared by Doctor Whalen, which with the baby's wardrobe had reached home ahead of Elizabeth, told the new guardian that much. There was even one bottle of food in the baby's basket. The baby consumed it, released the surplus with further suggestions of sour cheese, and went back to sleep. But, my stars, in another three hours Elizabeth must secure from the specified dairy enough Bulgarian buttermilk for five more feedings to carry over twenty-four hours. She must negotiate for corn-sirup from the grocery store and bottles from the drug-store.

Later, having five bottles filled with thick white stuff in a row on a shelf in the kitchenette, Elizabeth went in to look at her baby. At the bedroom door she caught her breath. One little hand had again made its way out of the blanket, but, instead of being a feebly-moving pink flipper, it was a human hand, unbelievably small, waxen white and motionless. And when Elizabeth in a spasm of terror snatched back the blanket to find that the baby had simply gone to sleep in a queer position and the blood had run out of the one upraised arm, her hands closed upon a little body and the last drop of her reserve courage forsook her. She groped for the bedside telephone. And called the hospital.

"Doctor Whalen," she gasped, when she heard his calm voice at the other end of the wire, "it's the baby! No, nothing's wrong—really—but I'm frightened to death——!"

"Oh, could you? Thank you!"

For a large body he reached her apartment very quickly. And he didn't laugh at her this time. He sat holding one of Elizabeth's slim strong hands between his two broad ones and patiently, even respectfully, explained to her the extent of peril and the margin of safety in handling infants.

Though Elizabeth felt lighter in spirit for his visit, for the rest of that day she circulated among four points—thermostat, bathroom, kitchenette and baby. And in the evening, when she was making the infant comfortable for the night and the little body lay on her lap looking more like fresh squab than anything human, her knees shook again.

"Bulgarian Bet," she pleaded, "have a heart!"

BULGARIAN BET, as it happened, turned out to be a rather good baby. She displayed at first an equable temperament and a predilection for sleep that was amazing if you considered her parents. If Bet hadn't been good, Elizabeth would have gone raving crazy. In those three months she came to understand how women, when they became mothers, lost the love of their husbands. Certain personal niceties which had been as casual and essential to every day as food and sleep were eliminated at once without time for argument. The half-hour or more which she spent on relaxing and toning up her hair and complexion each afternoon went now for washing out inevitable extras in the bath-tub. The apartment reeked of buttermilk. Already social callers at the studio were dropping off. Nobody now came regularly except Doctor Whalen—and Elizabeth suspected him of being soft on Peggy.

Then there was the effect of the child on Elizabeth's professional standing. On one of his early calls the doctor, speaking of Peggy, advised (since the mother's symptoms had been of incipient tuberculosis) that the baby be given as much outdoors as possible. He said that the crib on the fire-escape balcony was not enough. He specified a perambulator. Thereafter for a half-hour every morning and a whole hour every afternoon Elizabeth pushed a baby-carriage up and down Patton Boulevard. As a publicity stunt the parade was a success, and emphatically something to look at. All the literati, intelligentsia, and members of allied groups found reasons for coming or came without reason those days to Patton Boulevard. Their taunts and giggles she swallowed with sufficient difficulty—the thrusts which began with purrs of sympathy she would not down.

"You poor dear!" said a woman whom Elizabeth especially disliked. She was the wife of a photographer so entrenched in public favor that both he and his wife had been absolutely genial to all others of their profession up to the rise of Elizabeth Harkaway. "You poor dear!" said his wife to Elizabeth with the perambulator. "How queer it seems for you to have a baby!"

"It would be queer under the circumstances," said Elizabeth, "if I really had one. This is my married sister's. I'm just borrowing it."

"Dear me! I didn't mean that! Did I sound like that? I meant—we all never dreamed that you would endure such interference with your work."

"Babies don't interfere with your work. That is, they needn't. I'm doing splendidly this Spring. Did you see the pictures of the Haynes-Burford wedding in Sunday's paper? Precious Bet, is there a fly on oor nose?"

"Yes, we were talking of the Haynes-Burford pictures at dinner last night. They were good, but we wondered if they didn't seem a trifle hurried—that is, neglected, for you. But then, they were splendid, of course! I suppose you'll be entering something very fine in the competition at the national convention in June?"

"Yes, oh yes, I'll enter," said Elizabeth and cut two laps off her morning walk because right then she found herself at the door of her apartment.

ALL the way up on the automatic elevator she sputtered because she had risen to the bait of a woman ten years married, who bred Persian cats out of deference to her husband's artistic temperament. By the time she had settled Bet on the fire-escape and changed into a fresh studio frock to be ready for an appointment, some of the inflammation had gone out of her feelings. Coldly critical now, she realized that the quality of her recent work did trouble her. It had always dissatisfied her because she was ambitious. She still labored conscientiously, often stealing precious hours out of her broken night to finish a folio of prints which must look like so many crayon portraits etched by a gifted hand, that the lay world should not guess her weariness, her distraction. And the lay world did not guess, had not so far. Even the dig of that morning had been only a masked cry of envy. The Haynes-Burford pictures had meant a big check, went far toward covering nursery and sanitarium charges for that month. It was just what Elizabeth alone knew that troubled her. She had gone to take the bride pictures, protesting to herself and Doctor Whalen (as she arranged for a temporary

It really doesn't seem possible, does it, that happiness can depend on the teeth? But ask your dentist or your physician. You will learn that not only happiness but often health and good looks are lost when teeth start to decay.

Bad Teeth May Take The Joy Out of Life

Poisons of Tooth Decay Sap Bodily Strength and Destroy Good Looks.

Use Colgate's

It removes causes of tooth decay

PEOPLE who care how they look are concerned first of all with their teeth—for the mouth is the front door of personality. Not only are good teeth important to beauty; they are essential to health, to happiness, and sometimes even to life itself.

Modern dentists are urging preventive dentistry. Its aim is to combat disease by preventing tooth troubles—to fight tooth decay before it starts.

Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream always has been in the forefront of this scientific move for better teeth and health.

Colgate's is Safe and Effective

Colgate's is a modern dentifrice—widely recommended by modern dentists. It "washes" your teeth thoroughly clean—does not scratch or scour them. Causes of tooth decay thus are safely and effectively removed by Colgate's. It is safe to use for a lifetime.

Brush your teeth after each meal. No matter what kind of tooth brush you like, use Colgate's with it. The taste of Colgate's is pleasant. It is made sensibly, advertised sensibly, and sold at a sensible price—25c for a large size tube.

Consult your dentist twice a year. It pays.

Restful Sleep at Night and buoyant days

A new way now to banish wakeful nerves and sleepless nights and keep your youthful looks and spirit

Over 20,000 leading doctors recommend this simple way. See what 3 days will do. Make this test.

When you go to bed do your nerves stay up! Leaving you dragged out on the morrow—your morning logy, your energies drained by afternoon?

Modern science has found a natural means to overcome this: A way to restful sleep that quickly restores your tired mind and body.

Morning finds you a new woman. You are fresh, clear-eyed, buoyant. Youthful in looks and spirit. And you have the energy to carry you right through the day and the evening's social activities.

A 3-day test will show you. We urge you to make this test. It is well worth while.

Luxurious Sleep That Restores

Taken at night, a cup of Ovaltine brings sound restful sleep, quickly and naturally. This is why:

First—it combines in easily digested form, certain vitalizing and building up food-essentials in which your daily fare is lacking. One cup of Ovaltine has more real food value than 12 cups of beef extract.

Second Ovaltine has the power actually to digest 4 to 5 times its weight in other foods which may be in your stomach. Thus, a few minutes after drinking, Ovaltine is turning itself and all other foods into rich, red blood.

There is quick restoration for your tired mind and body. Frayed nerves are soothed. Restful sleep comes.

In the morning you awaken, looking and feeling years younger. You are a new being for a new day. You are alive with energy to carry you buoyantly through the day.

When you go to bed do your nerves stay up? Ovaltine brings sound restful sleep quickly, naturally.

Hospitals and doctors recommend it

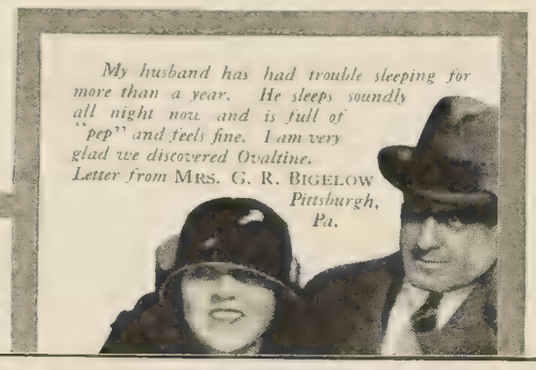
Ovaltine is a delightful pure food drink. It has been used in Switzerland for 30 years and is now in universal use in England and its colonies. During the great war Ovaltine was included as a standard war ration for invalid soldiers.

A few years ago Ovaltine was introduced into this country. Today it is used in hundreds of hospitals. More than 20,000 doctors know and recommend it not only as a restorative but also for nursing mothers, convalescents, invalids, backward children and the aged.

Many take a cup of Ovaltine two or three times a day for its natural stimulation. It's truly a "pick-up" drink.

A 3-day Test

Drug stores sell Ovaltine in 4 sizes for home use. Or drink it at the soda fountains. But to let you try it we will send a 3-day introductory package for 10 cents to cover cost of packing and mailing. Send in the coupon with 10 cents in stamps.



Energy to meet the evening's social demands.

nurse) that she was dead sick of making hard-boiled flappers look like Madonna lilies in tulle veils. And any artist admits to himself, if to no others, that success can not be built on work which one's heart has forsaken.

But, oh, what a let-down for Elizabeth! She remembered well how she had felt that day two months back, just before Peggy's descent, when she had heard of the prize award to be made at the June convention for the most strikingly individual and artistic portrait studies made by professional photographers of the nation. Elizabeth had sung and chattered and beamed inside and out over an audacious notion that possessed her then. She had made her mark locally, but here the gods had given the chance to show the world that she was something of what she meant to be.

THE very appointment for which she now dressed concerned this ambition. The model was a girl, the lovely, fragile daughter of an old, old family. She was to pose in period costumes, for she was delicately formed enough to manage the belts of any of her grandmothers. Elizabeth had counted on piquancy and dainty charm in these pictures—but the sitting went wretchedly. Elizabeth had always known the girl was a little stupid, but she had been able before to inspire a semblance of personality. To-day the best she could capture was the girl's prettiness. Prettiness wasn't enough for prize-winning pictures. And, before the hour was over, Bet began to cry.

"Mercy, what was that?" said the girl, feigning to be startled.

"Sounds like a baby," said Elizabeth, crossly.

"Here?"

"On the fire-escape."

"Why, the idea! I didn't know you had a baby."

"I haven't. It's my sister's."

"Visiting?"

"Yes."

"Oh! Hadn't somebody better see what's the matter? It's crying dreadfully."

"Nothing's the matter."

"My! Then why should it cry so?"

"Babies," pronounced Elizabeth, "cry chiefly for two reasons—perversity and exercise."

"Exercise? How funny!"

"Yes." Elizabeth made an involuntary pass with her hand over her forehead.

"Does your head ache, Miss Harkaway? I've a new bromide that's really awfully good."

"Thanks. I don't take bromides."

"Don't you really? I know they're not supposed to be good for you. But I never could be a martyr."

"No, I don't suppose you could."

"Miss Harkaway, would you mind telling me if you have some especial purpose in taking these pictures? I mean, were you going to use them for some public exhibit? You see, I happen to be engaged. It isn't announced yet, but it will be next week. Peter Roderick. And Peter's an awfully good sort himself, but his family's very stiff. Mother said I ought to find out why you wanted these pictures. The Rodericks wouldn't like me hung at a world's fair or something. So I thought I'd better tell you before you started."

Elizabeth had ruined twelve plates.

"For cat's sake!" she said, "is this your idea of telling me before I started?"

THE girl left in great offense. But by that time Bulgarian Bet was screaming at such a rate that nothing else mattered much. Again Elizabeth repudiated her blood kin.

"Bet," she said sternly, laying hold of the crib on the fire-escape, "you're a living disgrace! If you must holler like that and ruin my business, come inside and at least keep it in the family."

The baby went on howling, though Elizabeth could find no external excuse for the noise and knew that she couldn't be hungry for another hour.

"I wish you could see yourself," said Elizabeth. "I do wish you could see yourself in one of those purple spasms, though you wouldn't appreciate it. You haven't sense enough. You haven't any sense. I doubt if you ever will have—but, if you should develop, I wonder how you'll feel about this dirty trick you've played me. I've got a good notion to take your picture so and keep it for evidence. By hookey, that's what I will do—I'll take your living image this minute."

With angry bangs and pushes she placed her camera and fired off a few rounds at the screaming child—and when the noise still persisted after that, Elizabeth vented her despair in some tears of her own. It was a rare scene.

"No," said a voice in the door, "the bell is not out of order. It can't be heard above the uproar. What is this—a contest? Do you need a referee?"

Doctor Whalen with characteristic disregard of formality had entered the apartment. He was hatless and carried a steaming pail that smelled Spanish.

"Don't try to be funny," sniffed Elizabeth. "Any funnier than you are."

"Do you find me funny?" with a wistful lifting of heavy brows.

In spite of herself Elizabeth sputtered into a species of hysterical mirth.

"Only fair," commented Doctor Whalen. "Now, what's the matter with—hello! She's going to laugh, too."

"She'd better laugh—now," threatened Elizabeth. "What do you think possessed her?"

"Temperament. She's going to be an artist-photographer when she grows up."

"God pity her, then."

"Oh, she'll do right well, I expect, if somebody doesn't thrust a baby upon her. In which case she's apt to sort of smash things. You know, forget to eat properly and—which brings me to my excuse for appearing thus. Have you ever tasted my chilli mac?" continued Doctor Whalen.

"No, of course not."

"Yet here I am, the best dresser of macaroni on this continent and feeding my delicacies to a lot of saintly sisters, when right in the block is a lovely young lady so occupied with bottling buttermilk that she's starving. And so I——"

Elizabeth's mouth shaping a rebuke suddenly lost its mobility.

"Hold it!" she cried imperiously. "Don't you blink or move until I say so."

THERE he stood, an eminent doctor, pursued continuously by telephone and telegram, immense in his way, impressive for all his absurdity, dominating and yet pudding-soft in his kindliness, a mountain of a man personally and physically with a silly steaming granite kettle at the end of his bared arm—and so Elizabeth took his picture. And felt poise and power flow back into her.

"There are dishes in the kitchen cupboard, " she instructed the model after that, "and a bottle for Bet in the ice-chest. Would you mind serving lunch while I try to capture that air of heavenly grace which Bet is trying to put over on us right now? I'm collecting evidence on her. Personally, I think she's going to be Peggy all over again."

It was a pleasant lunch. The baby cooed and the doctor's eyes were less tired than Elizabeth had ever seen them.

"You are a nice person," she said impulsively when it was past time for him to go, "for a baby doctor."

"Thank you." He smiled at her almost shyly. Over Elizabeth swept a wave of tenderness.

"I can see why you are a doctor. But why did it have to be babies? The most exhausting things in the world. They take up all your waking hours and call you up in the nights besides. You haven't a minute to call your own. You're a slave to those babies. Didn't you know how it would be—or were you just sentimental that way?"

Doctor Whalen completely obscured a chair which usually served Elizabeth as a good background. But there he sat, and smiled with increasing shyness.

"I knew," he said gently, "and I was just sentimental. You see, I was an orphan and I had a tough time of it. Anyhow I thought it was a tough time until I saw what others had to endure. There it was. The babies come into the world. They must come if the race is to go on. Helpless, unwilling, they come under conditions and in places which I cannot describe and which I pray God you may never know from your own

Maple Apples: 1 cup Log Cabin Syrup; 1½ cups water; 6 tart apples. Pare and core the apples. Heat the syrup and water to boiling; then drop in the whole apples. Cook slowly, but turn frequently to insure even cooking. When the apples are soft remove from the sauce pan and allow the liquid to cook down until thick; then pour over apples. Serve either warm or cold with cream

Log Cabin Sweet Potatoes: Cut cooked sweet potatoes in half lengthwise and lay in a buttered baking dish; spread with butter and pour over them Towle's Log Cabin Syrup. Bake in a moderate oven, basting often with the syrup in the pan. Chopped nuts may be sprinkled over the potatoes while they are baking

One of the really great discoveries in preparing foods

The special knowledge of maple sugar that has made Log Cabin America's most popular high grade syrup

The moments of contentment that come to us with the flavor of foods we really like—how unthinkingly, how calmly we accept them! Yet back of the rarest flavors, lies almost always a drama of human struggle and triumph.

It is the richest gifts of nature that have most required the skill of creative minds and practiced hands. Years of experiment and patient toil in combining and blending ingredients, have brought us the foods we most enjoy today. And so it is with maple sugar.

The joy of maple at its best—perfect flavor in a clear-golden liquid sweet—has come only with the development of a special craft, the art of blending sugars.

It is recognized today that the Towle Process of blending represents one of the really great discoveries in preparing foods. In Towle's Log Cabin Syrup choice maple sugar from Canada and Vermont is blended with granulated cane sugar in a way that wonderfully enriches and enhances the flavor of the maple. That is why Log Cabin has become the favorite syrup of America from coast to coast, the most popular high grade syrup in the world.

What new goodness there is in waffles or pancakes with Towle's Log Cabin Syrup! Watch the new sparkle of pleasure in the eyes all around the table, when you serve it. Use it with Hot Breads, Fried Mush and French Toast, too.

If you have never tasted Maple Apples or Log Cabin Sweet Potatoes, prepared according to the simple recipes given above, you and your family have a pleasant surprise ahead. Just try these dishes and see! They are only two of many tempting foods that can be easily prepared with Towle's Log Cabin Syrup. seeing. Poor little mites, crushed under a weight of sin and heartlessness, even cruelty—oh, I can't speak of it. To give them a fairer start, to lighten the suffering that attends their coming—it seemed to me——"

"Hold it!" cried Elizabeth.

The teacup in her hand crashed on the floor—the baby yelped in fright—and Elizabeth dived under the black pall of her camera. She took the doctor's picture, yes and quickly, for the glory of God fades quickly from His mortal images—but she lingered unduly under her curtain to wipe her eyes.

THE photographic convention met the first week in June. The awards in the prize competition were to be made the first day from exhibits hung in the Rose Room of the old Buckingham Hotel. Shortly before the date, Elizabeth walked the floor of her studio in an agony of indecision. The wife of her rival in business had spread the report that she was to compete. There was no self-respectful possibility of withdrawal. But Elizabeth had nothing to offer. This called for something better than she had ever shown her little world, something striking in workmanship and character. In all "that mess" there was only one set of portraits which she could be proud to exhibit and she was ashamed to be proud of those. They were bound into one old black folder.

"Well, why don't you?" said Elizabeth's professional opinion. "Nonsense!" said Elizabeth. "Just because the whole thing's been on your mind and nerves day in and night out for three months? They're not really good pictures. They're just your private experience." And she paced some more.

But in the end she combed her hair, put on a hat, snatched up the folio and some posterboard and set out. This was the eve of the exhibit. She returned to her apartment, head up, cheeks burning and the light of combat in her eyes.

Bet was sleeping peacefully in her crib watched over by a sad-eyed woman who crocheted endless lengths of lace. She was an emergency nurse recommended by St. Mary's, a Hungarian widow from the charity ward who had lost her baby.

"Be here early to-morrow," said Elizabeth. "Seven o'clock. I expect to be out all day and I want to be sure you understand everything to do for the baby."

AT EIGHT the following morning Elizabeth left her studio, but she did not appear at the Buckingham until eight-thirty that evening. She knew she looked well, that the jade green of her gown brought out the freshness of her skin and the brightness of her perfectly dressed hair, that everything about her was just right from the tight band of pearls at her throat to the new brocaded slippers on her feet. But she also knew that her best beauty would not explain the murmur that arose when she entered the assembly. Out of the murmur a dozen voices cried tidings to her.

"Elizabeth Harkaway, where have you been? We've been combing the town for you, almost called for detectives. Haven't you heard? You've won first place. Yes, you have, over everybody. Such darling pictures! Perfectly splendid! So, that's what you've been doing, staying at home so tight! We thought you'd fallen in love or had a skin disease or something! And you look absolutely stunning! Come and see!"

Trembling, Elizabeth let herself be led into the Rose Room, where the group of six portraits which she had reluctantly submitted the night before had now been separated and the individual numbers thrust out in various conspicuous places. There was Bulgarian Bet, three phases of her, and these not commonplace idealizations of infancy or the conventional revelations with which mothers are known to embarrass their grown young. They were perfect likenesses, finished with Elizabeth's pet trick of crayon etching—but each was a ludicrous embodiment of human character in a primitive stage—the puny, impotent, screaming rage, the materialistic, kicking content over a well-filled bottle, and the cherub sweetness borrowed from the angels. There was the sad-eyed Hungarian nurse, her lap inadequately occupied by her roll of crochet, her hands not twitching only because they were busy with a needle. A Niobe dumb in her bereavement. There were the two of Doctor Whalen.

"Marvelous! Irresistible! Full of appeal! Masterly in technique!"

Elizabeth had to know that the work was good. Her head turned a bit dizzy. So she couldn't credit her eyes when they presented to her a vision of the doctor himself, moving through the crowded room—the doctor buttoned into immaculate, formal evening dress, his face almost as fresh as her own, his hair cut within an inch of totally eclipsing his personality.

"Why," she said, "how did you get here?"

Then she blushed.

"I beg your pardon. You can go anywhere, of course. You're always making me forget what a personage you are."

She blushed again—distressingly. They stood before the smiling image with the steaming kettle.

"Are you angry?" she wanted to know.

"Angry? No. Why in the world—oh, you mean the pictures. I'm proud. Prouder than I was when I got my diploma."

ELIZABETH turned away and held herself in a sort of tight anticipation. She had a feeling that in another minute she might be hugged. She wasn't. In that other minute she recalled that such a thing couldn't happen—there—and felt oddly forlorn.

"See how I used you and Bet!" she faltered.

"We owed you at least that much, Aunt Elizabeth. And we're decidedly taken with your looks to-night, I must say. Triumph becomes you. It's done you good to hobnob with your old friends again for a whole day."

Elizabeth laughed.

"I've spent the day in a beauty parlor," she confessed.

"Good for you. It was worth the expenditure—of time."

"And money. You see, I didn't dream that this would happen. I was rather desperate last night. I couldn't see a chance for an award. I couldn't cut the whole thing, and I was bound no one should look at me and say, 'Poor Elizabeth.' But you're rather fine yourself now. You haven't come directly from the hospital this time."

"Haven't been there since early morning."

"What?"

"No, I haven't. Walked out and left my first assistant in full charge. I spent to-day in a Turkish bath."

Even Elizabeth's sympathetic indignation wouldn't keep her from laughing.

"Of course, in a way I deserved it," snorted the doctor. "On occasion, you yourself have mentioned absurdity, diet, exercise."

"It's the pictures," said Elizabeth. "They do offend you. But I didn't take them because you were absurd—or overweight. I thought you splendid. And see what you've done for me against my will. Remember how I fought against keeping Bet? And do you know what I'm planning to do now?"

"Yes. You'll hire a secretary to write your waiting-lists of mothers of beautiful offspring, fat men who want to be idealized, and disillusioned women who want to look at their own sorrow. You'll photograph the world, if you will."

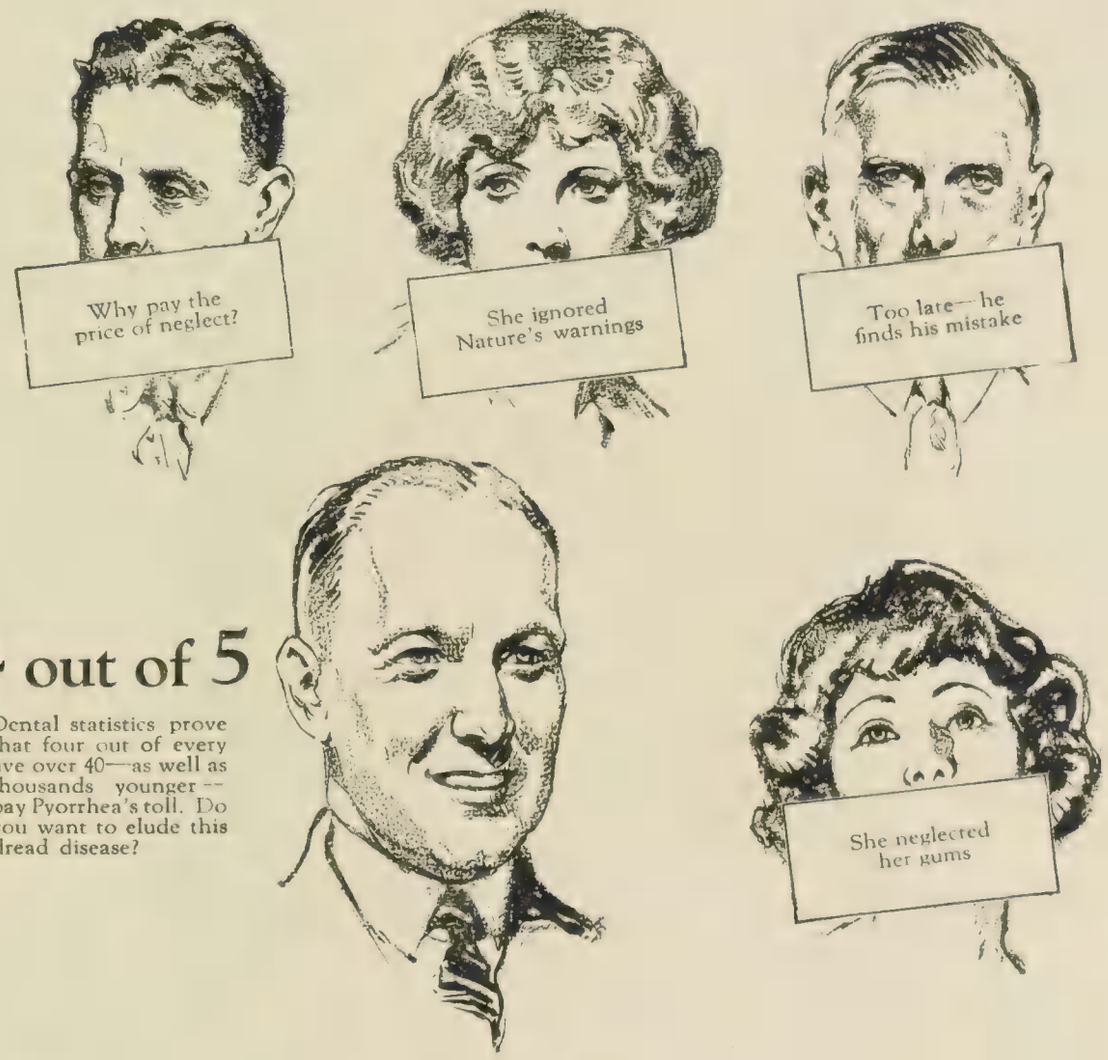
"But I will not. I am going to take Bet under my arm and Sophie Ahrens by the hand—to help with the housework—and hunt a pleasant cottage in the country and spend three months being a perfect aunt to that infant to make up for the three which I have spent in abusing her."

"No."

"Yes. And you can come down for a holiday once in a while if you like."

"I'm strong for that and everything else about the plan except the baby. You deserve a real vacation—without a care. You have done your part well and your release is past due."

"But I don't want to be released—now. I don't want to be released any more than I wanted to be bound in the beginning."



Doctor Whalen shifted his neck in his collar, a sign of uneasiness.

"And again you aren't master of your fate," he said.

"Why? Is Peggy well—all of a sudden?"

"No, she'll have to stay where she is a little while longer. It's the father. I heard from him last night."

4 out of 5

Dental statistics prove that four out of every five over 40—as well as thousands younger—pay Pyorrhea's toll. Do you want to elude this dread disease?

Your teeth are only as healthy as your gums

The gums are the keys to health. You must keep them firm, strong and healthy or your teeth will begin to loosen and eventually come out. This is one of the penalties of Pyorrhea.

But there are others even worse. Pus pockets form and generate poisons that drain through the whole system, causing much of the rheumatism, neuritis, anaemia, indigestion and other diseases so prevalent in middle life.

Prevent Pyorrhea with Forhan's

Don't wait for tender, bleeding gums to warn you of Pyorrhea's coming. Ward it off by going to your dentist regularly and using Forhan's For the Gums twice a day.

This safe, efficient, pleasant-tasting dentifrice counteracts the effects of harmful bacteria, hardens soft, tender gums, keeps them sound, firm and pink. Furthermore, it cleans and whitens the teeth and keeps the mouth fresh, clean and wholesome.

Ordinary tooth pastes are powerless to prevent or check Pyorrhea.

Even if you don't care to discontinue your favorite dentifrice, at least start brushing your gums and teeth once a day with Forhan's.

It is a preparation of proved efficacy in the treatment of Pyorrhea. It is the one that many thousands have found beneficial for years. For your own sake, make sure that you get it. Ask for, and insist upon, Forhan's For the Gums. At all druggists, 35c and 60c in tubes.

HELEN CUTLER

9 year old daughter of Mr. & Mrs. Ralph Cutler

25 West 125th Street, New York, N. Y.

The foundation for lifelong health

Nine years ago, Helen Cutler was born in the United States Government Hospital at Ancon, Panama. When mother's milk failed, the baby was fed on the hospital formula containing Eagle Brand Milk.

"Three months later the family came back to the States but little Helen was doing so well on Borden's Eagle Brand that this food was continued," writes her father.

Today Helen is a wonderful example of the permanent health that usually results from the right start early in life. A fine athlete, an excellent swimmer, and an accomplished musician—with her splendid physique as a background for her talents, Helen faces a brilliant career.

If mother's milk is not available for your baby, use Eagle Brand Condensed Milk, tried and proved by three generations. Eagle Brand is pure country milk and refined sugar, especially combined to make a highly digestible, nutritious food for baby. Let Eagle Brand start your child, too, on the road to lifelong health.

Thousands of mothers can testify to the benefits of Eagle Brand Milk. Read their interesting experiences and see the beautiful babies' pictures in What Other Mothers Say. For practical suggestions on the care of babies, send for Baby's Welfare, written by a physician. BULGARIAN BET

"No!"

"Yes. He's a very contrite and lonesome person. He was quite desperate over quarreling with your sister and he didn't know about the baby. Now, of course, he's willing to take her."

"Willing? Well, he can't have her."

Of all the emotions that she'd been forced to experience in the past three months Elizabeth now felt the climax.

"Do you think, after what we've been through together, that I'm going to surrender that poor, mistreated child to a trombone-player with sideburns?"

"Sh! Consider that he is her father."

"He is not."

"Didn't you tell me that your sister married a Francis Quesnay?"

"I don't care about that. I was the one who saw that Bet got here safely. I kept her alive when she would have died for want of any care he provided. She is mine. He isn't fit to care for her. What does he know about babies?"

"Now, my dear! He plans to set up a studio in the city near the mother's sanitarium and provide a trained nurse until his wife can come home. It's only a matter of time, anyhow, when she would want the child."

"I know about these studios. Doctor Whalen, excuse me, please. I'm going home."

"Elizabeth, don't——"

"I'm going home to Bet."

The doctor fairly held her by her arm while a taxi was summoned. In it, Elizabeth turned to him with a sob in her voice.

"If he really comes for her, I'll have to give her up, won't I? The law will say she is his?"

"Yes. I'm so sorry. I never dreamed that you would feel like this."

"How did you think I would feel?"

"Well, I could only go by what you've always said. About the interference to your career. Truly I was sorry for you. So I went to a great deal of trouble to hunt up this father and remind him of his duty."

"Doctor Whalen!"

And that was the last word she spoke to him until they stood at the door of her apartment.

"You said the other day the baby must have a change of diet beginning to-morrow. Could you give me the instructions now? It will save me troubling you again."

"Elizabeth!"

But he took a memorandum book and wrote a schedule including sweet milk, orange-juice and cereals.

"I didn't dress up to write a diet sheet," he said as he handed over the paper.

"It doesn't matter to me how you dress," said Elizabeth.

"No," said Doctor Whalen and turned away.

Elizabeth went in, to dismiss the nurse and order a taxi to call in half an hour.

EXACTLY two weeks later, when the hush of sleep lay over most of the city and heavily over peaceful Patton Boulevard, Elizabeth Harkaway rang the night-bell beside the main door of St. Mary's. She was wrapped in a long dark cape and on one arm under its folds she held the bundled form of a baby. While she waited for her summons to be answered, she turned back a veil from the baby's face and put down her own as if seeking reassurance, then raised it in anguished prayer to the moonlit turrets of the building. Soft shoes slip-slipped over the tiled floor of the hall and a Sister in voluminous skirt, tight basque and medieval bonnet peered out for a moment at Elizabeth before she unfastened the heavy chain and opened the doors of St. Mary's to another call of need.

However, when she saw Elizabeth in the hall, the Sister looked surprised, even a bit put out. In the dark a cape is a cape—but even a night-light will tell the difference between silk crape and shoddy. This apparently was one of the hospital's wealthy neurotics.

"I want Doctor Whalen at once," said Elizabeth.

"I'm afraid you can't see Doctor Whalen."

"Don't tell me that. Isn't he here?"

"Yes. He had a difficult operation at eleven-thirty and has just now gone to bed. I can't call him out except in a matter of life and death. If you will tell me your trouble or his assistant——"

"This is life—or death, Sister. Tell him that Elizabeth Harkaway is here and the baby is dreadfully sick. Please call him."

She actually looked as if she might crumple, but there was no need. The Sister drew back another step.

"Oh!" she said, knowingly. "You are Miss Harkaway. Wait here, then, while I telephone to his room. Will you sit in the parlor?"

But Elizabeth paced the corridor, her head bowed over the infant. So, when the doctor came down the steps a bit later, there was not a great deal of difference between the looks of the living woman in her somber rôle and the painted marble Madonna who guarded the door to the reception-room. Had Elizabeth realized his expression as he contemplated the hovering posture of the two women, she would not have troubled at his first stern word.

"Well?"

Elizabeth actually cowered as if a lash had been laid over her shoulders. Then she drew herself together and raised her head, turning resolutely to face her accuser, whose trousers folded ominously loose about his ankles and nestled in the tops of his enormous slippers. He had girt about him otherwise a brown bathrobe, so worn and disreputable as to be famous in hospital annals, tempting every woman patient of sufficient means to offer him a futile parting gift of a new one. His eyes were heavy and, she thought, cold.

"I don't care what you do to me," she said. "You can put me in jail if you must—afterward. Now it's the baby. I think I've killed her."

Still coldly, but with the old capability that thrilled her now, he took the baby from her. He uncovered the face, touched the cheek, pushed up one eyelid.

"Feverish," he said. "It may be that she has had some impure milk——"

Elizabeth moaned.

"Or it may be measles. Sister Angelica! Will you please take this baby to the third floor to Miss McCarthy and ask her to bathe the child and put her into bed. I'll be up presently."

"Don't be so casual!" cried Elizabeth. "She may die."

"Ultimately she will. Not to-night."

THE hall was empty, save for the marble Madonna, the physician and Elizabeth Harkaway, artist-photographer.

"Where have you been, Miss Harkaway? You've had me in a fine stew."

"Down the river, hiding."

"Why did you do such a thing?"

"I don't exactly know. I thought—I must. I'd got so used to the baby or something. I couldn't give her up to a temperamental father who wanted her only in a spell of emotion and might later neglect her. I thought he wasn't fit to have her."

"And your career?"

"I don't know. I just wanted to save the baby. And now see!"

"I see. Of course we will keep the child here now until the father comes for her."

"Yes." Humbly.

"Elizabeth Harkaway, there is a severe penalty for kidnaping!"

"I suppose so. I don't care. You can reach me at the apartment."

Doctor Whalen smiled at her back.

"No, you don't," he said. "Stay right here until we settle this. If I live to be a hundred—which I won't—I'll not get over the fright I had when I thought you'd closed a door on me for the last time. Elizabeth Harkaway, a week ago I boiled myself and put on all the fine linen I could find excuse for, to propose to you in decent style. To-night I feel—and I must look—like the devil's combings. But my sentiments remain the same. Now I know your sentiments perfectly. You long ago chose never to marry—but, Elizabeth, will you do me the honor of refusing my hand, too?"

"What?" In amazement Elizabeth looked back. The turning was as fatal as that of Lot's wife in the Bible. For the doctor smiled and held out his capacious arms.

"Elizabeth, honey, you're the doggondest, sweetest, contrariest, prettiest, all-round woman that I ever saw. You're the only woman I ever wanted to marry, but I do want you. And you can trample on me for the rest of my life if you'll only consider me."

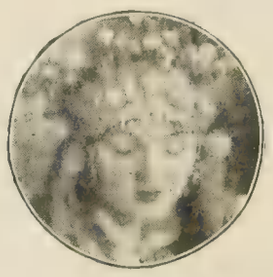
Elizabeth went all to pieces. After the freshet, she rubbed her head over that awful bathrobe, lifted that head, looked at that bathrobe and sighed.

"You're going to live to regret this," she warned. "Nothing's going to be the same ever—for either of us. First thing, you're going to burn this."

"That's all right, my Bet. If I'm not mistaken, we'll both have rubbish to burn."

"Bulgarian Bet burned a lot of mine before this," said Elizabeth.



"God bless her! I'll bet you wouldn't have looked at me except for Bet."

"No. Would you have looked at me?—But I wouldn't have touched you."

"Now, what about that career?"

"Well, I won't take as many pictures—but they'll be worth taking now."

In the dimness the saints on the walls smiled at the situation.

ONE DAY TO LIVE

the Princess and the stranger youth. A broad window let in a gentle light above their heads.

"Love is the key to joy, Lo Chun," the Emperor murmured. "See these two. They sit in the timeless Valley of Happiness. Death is an avalanche unseen upon the distant mountain-top of To-morrow.

"He kisses her hands. How tenderly! No custom of ours—but sweet. Zephyr could not meet flower more gently. She bends over his bowed head and her loosened hair enfolds them. Like a tent. A tent our beautiful Lady of the Moon might have pitched to shield her love.

"She is very like her mother."

And Yeng Ti suddenly pushed the sphere from him and light flooded back into the Council Tower.

"Lo Chun," he cried, "I shall give my daughter happiness. This being her last day, she shall spend it as her heart urges. I shall wed her to the Foreigner."

And then, without waiting for a word from Lo Chun, he called sharply for his chief eunuch. And the chief eunuch hurried up.

"The Princess Budding Moon will be wedded within the hour in the Green Mound Pavilion," the Emperor informed him. "You will prepare all things needful, and tell the Princess this is my favor."

WHEN the chief eunuch had retired, the Emperor went to the window of the Council Tower. Up to his ear floated the unceasing plea of the multitude: "Mercy for the Princess and the Foreigner. They love."

He espied the Greatest Noble circulating through the crowd. And he observed that wherever his servant stood the agitation was intense. He smiled. He smiled still when Lo Chun renewed his warning.

"Take heed!" said the sorcerer. "I see the hand of Heaven reaching against you who assume its power."

"Let Heaven take heed!" exclaimed the Emperor defiantly. "It is my fancy to do as I do. None shall stay me. No man nor any Heaven."

And the Emperor called for servants to bring wedding robes for himself and for Lo Chun. And after donning these they waited, the Emperor scornfully aloof, until the chief eunuch returned.

"The pavilion is prepared, O Son of Heaven. The Princess and the Foreigner rest in it. All await you. Even now the musicians play upon harps of cassia wood."

So the Emperor descended to the foot of the Council Tower. And Lo Chun followed, after he had lingered behind to fling his arms high, as though in prayer.

After the formal rites, the stranger youth performed a curious service. From a little pouch he drew a gold circlet, very worn and old. This he placed upon the third finger of the left hand of the Princess. Then, reverently, he uttered six words in his own tongue. When all was over, the Princess shyly touched her lips to the Emperor's hands. And the stranger youth bowed before him. At one side a handmaiden with a face like a Spring flower wept softly and unceasingly.

"You are like a god, O Emperor!" exclaimed the stranger youth. "You have accorded us Heaven to-day. Even that other Heaven will not make room for us until to-morrow."

"I am a god!" the Emperor cried triumphantly. "With one hand I give you death, but with the other I give joy incomparable. And no law halts or urges me. I am myself the law and the judge."

The ceremony over, Lo Chun, the sorcerer, departed, his face white under the frosty pinch of anger. The Emperor followed, but stood in the curtained portals of the pavilion for a long moment. He saw the stranger youth stoop slowly and cup the Princess's slender face in gentle hands. Humbly the youth bent to her waiting lips.

Night, falling gently, darkened the path of the Emperor and Lo Chun.

"Stay with me through this night, Lo Chun," the Emperor commanded.

And they went to the Council Tower where Yeng Ti dropped upon a divan and fell into profound sleep. Confused fancies pressed his mind. The Princess Budding Moon fled before the army of Wu T'ang. Lo Chun slew the giant Li Kong Ho. Once the mother of Budding Moon appeared and she was sad. But no matter what other pictures grew, the splendid banner of his own creation floated ever. "Yeng Ti and God!" It danced in his sleep like a flame. And then a bright sun rose below it. The bright sun advanced. It seemed to threaten, and thereupon the Emperor Yeng Ti leaped to his feet. And he observed with relief that the bright sun was only the true sun of Heaven shining into the tower. Day had come.

LO CHUN was gone and, again vaguely disturbed, the Emperor called imperiously. His own voice gave him courage and he called again arrogantly. And this time his voice had scarcely lifted when the sorcerer hurried in. Faintly from below came the still uttered prayer of a multitude: "Mercy for the Princess and the Foreigner."

The Emperor was bursting with speech.

"All night long they have been crying," he exulted. "And now I will make them marvel at my greatness and magnanimity. I will forgive my daughter and the Foreigner. Will I not then be hailed as a god?"

"O impious man!" warned Lo Chun. "You have planned thus to exalt your person in the eyes of your empire. But what plans has Heaven made?"

The Emperor drew up audaciously.

"Heaven will make no plans on earth which conflict with mine. I go now to take the welcome news to my daughter."

And he hurried down to his palanquin. Lo Chun followed.

"Humble yourself," rebuked the sorcerer, "and you yet may be spared. I warn you again that the hand of Heaven is raised vengefully against your head."

But the Emperor gave no heed and, climbing into his palanquin, he was carried to the Palace of Delight. Lo Chun followed hastily.

At the top of the Green Mound's spiraling stairway the Emperor bade the guard announce him. Lo Chun arrived as the guard came back.

"I have knocked," the man said, "but I receive no answer. Yet I saw the Princess and the Foreigner not two hours ago, watching the dawn upon the balcony."

The vague fears of his awakening returned to the Emperor, although he could not say why, save that the eyes of Lo Chun, the sorcerer, seemed full of omen.

"Open the door!" he cried.

And to rout his own terrors he rushed at the barrier and hammered upon it. The echo of his blows rolled back, the only answer.

"Open me this door!" he commanded a spearsman.

ONE DAY TO LIVE

And when the door had been forced he leaped through into a lifeless void. He hurried into an inner chamber and was still.

When he came back, his face was buried in his hands. His fingers tore at his eyes as though to blot out a sight of horror.

"Lo Chun," he stammered. "Lo Chun!"

They reentered together. Upon a divan lay the Princess and the stranger youth. They held each other loosely. The silken draperies of the Princess did not quite conceal the handle of a double-bladed dagger. And the blades were buried in the breasts of the two who were coldly immobile.

"In your vainglorious planning," Lo Chun rebuked, "you never reflected that these two, believing your mock death sentence, would not await your headsmen. Yet I warned you Heaven's plans would not match yours. This is your punishment. You, who would have divided Heaven's power, are stripped of the one being you love."

THE overbearing pride of the Emperor Yeng Ti was shorn away. He shivered in the bleak wind that brought him understanding. In that moment he knew how deeply he loved the Princess, his daughter. And he knew that his empire meant nothing without her.

"This is my punishment," he whispered. And then, because he could no longer endure the sight of his handiwork, he groped a blind way out of the pavilion.

A soldier leaped from a lathering house at the foot of the Green Mound and rushed to Yeng Ti's side.

"I herald the victory of your general Wu T'ang," he gasped. "Your enemy is slain. His army is in flight. His leaders are in chains."

"Now, indeed," murmured Lo Chun, the sorcerer, "it is 'Yeng Ti and God.'"

The Emperor shuddered. To a spearsman he cried:

"Go. Have my new banners brought."

And when they had come he went with his own hands and made a pyre of them. As the flames rose, he bowed his head in supplication.

"Heaven stands alone," he affirmed.

LO CHUN, the sorcerer, nodded as though he had been waiting for these words a long time. He seemed evanescently to rise up and up in his slender height until his head vanished in the sky. But this could have been no more than the fantastic swaying of his mysterious figure as he took the Emperor's hand.

And he led the sorrow-laden Emperor back to the Princess and the stranger youth. He bent over the recumbent pair and pulled gently at the double-bladed dagger. It left their breasts, leaving no mark upon the two who now stirred faintly. Under the eyes of Lo Chun, the sorcerer, they sat up and brushed their eyes, as though aroused from sleep.

The Emperor Yeng Ti fell upon his knees. Without understanding, without asking, he clasped his hands in joy. His eyes lifted humbly to Heaven. He prayed.

The Princess Budding Moon smiled a welcome at him and then turned in a flash to the arms of the stranger youth.

Above these three, Lo Chun, the sorcerer, stood erect and reverent. And as he looked through the little window of the pavilion down upon a people who would be happier now with a more humble ruler, he smiled.

His face was filled with that content which spells the end of a mission.

VALIANT - FOR - TRUTH

Gardens, there came a rippling hush over the people and word was sent along: "The Pope is passing." Teedy, reared in a Protestant home, whispered his disapproval of popes to the child nearest him.

Then, by one of those inexplicable happenings of this world, the crowd parted and there appeared before the astonished eyes of the children a page from an old story-book. There was a colorful procession of sumptuously dressed men bearing among them a saintly, white-haired and fragile old man, reposing in a sedan chair. His Holiness saw the eager little children stretching their necks to see the wonderful pageant and, smiling, he extended his hand in blessing. Instantly Teedy, the bristling Protestant, the fierce democrat, dropped on his knees and kissed the gentle hand that blessed him. For an instant after it rested upon his tousled head and then Pope Nono passed on. I like to think that this fine sensitiveness toward spiritual beauty was the direct result of the teaching of his father.

Not that one would leave the mother out of this picture. Her part was not negligible. She had a rare sense of humor, that blessed sense of proportion that so often saves us in time of crisis. She was a Southerner, her family was fighting with the Confederate armies, and her heart must often have been torn during those terrible years. Teedy, with the keen insight of youth, discovered that his mother had a certain sympathy for the South, and with the unknowing cruelty of the very young used his knowledge.

One evening as he knelt at his mother's knee he remembered that she had disciplined him during the day for some childish breach of discipline and decided to do a little disciplining on his own account. At the top of his mighty lungs he prayed long and earnestly for the victory of the Northern army and asked God to grind the Southern forces into powder. His mother, as he well knew, would not interrupt his petition to Heaven and he made the most of it. When he had finished, she told him gravely not to repeat the performance, but she used to laugh heartily at the recollection.

Along with her sense of fun there was a sympathetic understanding of childhood in Teedy's mother, a willing unselfishness to give joy to children which richly blessed her son. It was the custom of the family to make each birthday as it came along a high day set apart for the enjoyment of the child. When Teedy was eleven, he asked that for his treat the family dine in state and that his father and mother attend in full dress. To please the child they arrayed themselves in the ceremonial clothes they had recently worn at court and behaved with becoming dignity.

Donning court dress was not the most trying thing they had to do. Teedy's great interest was in nature, especially in the animals. If you will remember how many live things a little boy with but an ordinary interest in animals will bring into the house, and then multiply that about ten times and increase the span of interest into years, you will have some idea of what the family endured for Teedy's sake.

He carried frogs and snakes and eggs and beetles and turtles in his pockets. Anything that came his way on the earth or under was promptly bagged and faithfully carried home.

AND so Teedy grew up into Teddy, the beloved, adored President, a man every inch of him, a man proudly American, a leader, brave and honorable and true as steel. Behind him was the spirit of his great father, his example, his teaching, his inspiration. If you would raise a great son, or daughter, be the sort of father or mother from whom such children could spring.

It is true that a Teddy Roosevelt comes but once in a generation; but it is true, too, that he came of a fine family, fine in the sense of what we call character. Money and position helped him on his way, but they do not account for the splendid character of the man; they do not account for the qualities that made the whole nation say "Amen" to Senator Lodge when he said, "Valiant-for-Truth crossed over and all the trumpets sounded for him on the other side." For that we know was the mark of his father upon him and it was his hand that helped him up the bank on the far side.

WHAT IS THE MATTER WITH TEACHING?

IF I have assumed the rôle of a Jeremiah, I have indeed left out of the account many true and encouraging things which might have been said. But I have not invented or exaggerated the dark spots. As are the teachers, so are the schools. That is the one fundamental and unalterable principle of sound pedagogy. But when we take stock of the work of the schools, when we criticize and undertake reforms, we are willing and anxious to tinker with everything else. We are not willing to ask just what keeps out of the occupation of teaching mature, rich, free, independent personalities.

I should look upon the present situation with more equanimity, if there were more disposition to drop our preoccupation with the mechanics and externals of efficiency, and concentrate upon one question. What can be done to liberate teachers, to free their personalities and minds from all the petty economic, social and administrative restrictions which so frequently hem them in and repress them?

TEARS AND LAUGHTER

decided to make a trip to Italy the following year. I had barely enou h money for the trip, but I started anyhow, with my "game" little mother and a dear friend, Miss Kathrine Head. I had written to people in New York to whom I had letters, and to some of the critics who had been kindest, that I would be at the old St. Denis Hotel upon a certain date. A number of the art critics came. among them Mr. Rupert Hughes—also Mr. Daniel Chester French, Mr. Robert Underwood Johnson, Mr. Richard Watson Gilder and dear William Dean Howells, bringing me letters of introduction to people in Italy.

Among Mr. Howells's letters was one recommending me to his brother-in-law, Mr. Larkin J. Mead, a sculptor who had lived in Italy for many years. Because it expresses better than I can the ideal I was striving for in my statuettes, I am going to quote it here. He wrote in part:

> I think she has put new life into your old dry bones of an art. Her work, while it is as Greek as the Tanagra figurines, is as utterly and inalienably American as you are, and perfectly modern. It is simply a joy to me, for it gets into sculpture the thing I am striving to get into fiction.
